

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. NEW YORK COURT OF APPEALS.

PEOPLE OF THE STATE OF NEW YORK
EX REL. KINGS COUNTY LIGHTING COMPANY, Respts.,

v.

WILLIAM R. WILLCOX et al., Composing the Public Service Commission for the First District, Appts.

(210 N. Y. 479, 104 N. E. 911.)

Public service corporation — fixing rates — “going value.”

1. “Going value” is to be considered as a distinct item in fixing the rates to be charged by a gas company.

Same — elimination of item of going value.

2. The item of going value is eliminated in fixing rates for a gas company if it has already received a fair return on its investment, either by charging rates which give it a fair return from the start, or which give it more than a fair return after the business has been developed.

Same — when allowed.

3. Where a gas company paid no dividends for a number of years after it began to do business, going value is to be allowed in fixing its rates where it was not due to bad management, the accumulation of surplus, or to betterments which have been allowed for in the structural valuation.

Definition — going value.

4. Going value, for the purpose of fixing the rates of a gas company, is an amount equal to the deficiency of net earnings below a fair return on the actual investment, due solely to the time and expenditures reasonably necessary and proper to the development of the business and property to its present stage, and not comprised in the valuation of the physical property.

Public service corporation — valuation of property — cost of replacing pave- ment.

5. In ascertaining the value of the property of a gas company or the amount of capital actually expended for the purpose of fixing rates, the cost of replacing pavement now in the streets, but not there at the time the mains were laid, is not to be taken into consideration.

Same — appreciation in land.

6. In ascertaining the gross receipts of a gas company for the purpose of fixing its rates, the annual appreciation of the value of its land should not be considered.

APPEAL by defendants from an order of the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court, First Department, reversing on certiorari a determination of the public service commission fixing a maximum rate for gas to be charged by the relator in a certain ward of the borough of Brooklyn, city of New York. Reversed in part.

Statement by Miller, J.:

The relator was organized in 1904, and merged with the Kings County Gas & Illuminating Company, which was organized in 1889, and began supplying gas in October, 1891. The appellate division held that the determination of the commission was wrong in three respects, which are presented by four questions certified for review, viz.: (1)
Was the relator entitled, upon the facts shown in the record, to have the commission make an allowance for going value in determining the value of the relator's property used in the public service? (2) Was the relator entitled, upon the facts shown in the record, to have the cost of reproduction of paving now in the streets, but not in place at the time the mains were laid, allowed for in ascertaining the value of its property used in the public service? (3)
Was the relator entitled, upon the facts shown in the record, to have the cost of reproduction of paving now in the streets, but not in place at the time the mains were laid, allowed for in ascertaining the capital actually expended? (4) Was the commission entitled, upon the facts shown in the record, in ascertaining the amount which should constitute a proper return, to consider, as part of what accrues to the relator as gross receipts of its yearly operations, the annual appreciation in the value of its land?

Messrs. George S. Coleman and Oliver C. Semple, for appellants:

It is not necessary that the item of going value should be estimated as a separate and several item in the calculation of value.

Miller, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

It is now generally recognized that "going value," as distinct from "good will," is to be considered in valuing the property of a public service corporation, either for the purpose of condemnation or rate making, but there is a wide divergence of view as to how it is to be considered. The commission in this case says it was taken into account in valuing the plant as a "going," and not as a "defunct or static," concern, and that it was also considered in fixing the fair rate of return. The appellate division says that there is no proof of the latter fact in the record. Thus, the first question certified requires us to decide whether going value is to be appraised as a distinct item, or whether it is sufficient to regard it as something vague and indefinable to be given some consideration, but not enough to be estimated. The valuation of the physical property was determined by ascertaining the cost of reproduction less accrued depreciation. Preliminary and development expenses prior to operation were included, but no allowance was made for the cost of developing the business. By that method the plant was valued in a sense as a "going concern." In other words "scrap" values were not taken; but to say that that sufficiently allows for going value is the same as to say that going value is not to be taken into account. The problem is to determine what is fair to the public and the company. The public is entitled to be served at reasonable rates, and the company is entitled to a fair return on its investment on the value of the property used by it in the public service. Smyth v. Ames, 169 U. S. 466, 42 L. ed. 819, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 418; San Diego Land & Town Co. v. National City, 174 U. S. 739, 43 L. ed. 1154, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 804; San Diego Land & Town Co. v. Jasper, 189 U. S. 439, 47 L. ed. 892, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 571; Minnesota Rate Cases (Simpson v. Shepard) 230 U. S. 352, 57 L. ed. 1511, 48 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1151, 33 Sup. Ct. Rep. 729. It would have been entitled to a return on the valuation adopted by the commission, if it had no customers, but was just ready to begin business, whereas it had a plant in operation with an established business, which every one knows takes time, labor, and money to build up.

If going value is capable of ascertainment, it will not do for the commission vaguely to consider it in fixing the fair rate of return. That no appreciable allowance was made in this case is shown both by the rate fixed and by the following statement in the opinion of the commission: "It should be noted that the plant has been in operation for nearly twenty years, and it might be argued with considerable force that two decades should be sufficient for the company to recoup its early deficiencies below a fair rate of return, if any such deficiencies ever existed. If the company has not recouped itself by this time, under such circumstances it is doubtful whether the present consumers ought to be burdened for this reason."

The first question certified then resolves itself into two heads: (1) Is going value a distinct item to be appraised and included in the base upon which the fair return is computed? (2) Was the evidence in this case sufficient to justify an allowance for it?

The opinion of Mr. Justice Clarke below saves me the necessity of citing and analyzing the cases bearing on the first branch of the question. We concur fully in what he has said on the subject, and in his conclusion that there is no "logical difference between allowing 'going valuation' in the valuation of a plant when it is to be taken entirely by the public, and allowing the same element when valuing the same plant for rate-making purposes." A case since decided should be added to the rate cases cited by him, in which going value has been allowed, i. e., Public Service Gas Co. v. Public Utility Comrs. 84 N. J. L. 463, 87 Atl. 651.

It is no answer to say that in condemnation cases the exchange value is taken, and that that depends on the rates charged, the thing to be determined in rate cases. Of course, a rule of valuation might be adopted in a condemnation case which would not work in a rate case; but if the cost of reproduction, less depreciation, rule be adopted, as appears to have been done in National Waterworks Co. v. Kansas City, 27 L.R.A. 827, 10 C. C. A. 653, 27 U. S. App. 165, 62 Fed. 853, and Omaha v. Omaha Water Co. 218 U. S. 180, 54 L. ed. 991, 48 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1084, 30 Sup. Ct. Rep. 615,—the leading condemnation cases in the Federal courts in which going value was considered,—it is impossible to see why the going value could not be determined in both classes of cases in precisely the same way.

The difficulty of determining the going value will not justify the disregarding of it. Rate making is difficult. But that will not justify confiscation. The difficulty, however, will lessen, as it does in most cases, when we cease to think about the subject vaguely. What, then, is going value, and how is it to be appraised?

It takes time to put a new enterprise of any magnitude on its feet, after the construction work has been finished. Mistakes of construction have to be corrected. Substitutions have to be made. Economies have to be studied. Experiments have to be made, which sometimes turn out to be useless. An organization has to be perfected. Business has to be solicited and advertised for. In the case of a gas company, gratuitous work has to be done, such as selling appliances at less than a fair profit, and demonstrating new devices, to induce consumption of gas and to educate the public up to the maximum point of consumption. None of those things is reflected in the value of the physical property, unless, of course, exchange value be taken, which is not admissible in a rate case. The company starts out with the "bare bones" of the plant, to borrow Mr. Justice Lurton's phrase in Omaha Waterworks Case, supra. By the expenditure of time, labor, and money, it co-ordinates those bones into an efficient working organism, and acquires a paying business. The proper and reasonable cost of doing that, whether included in operating expenses or not, is as much a part of the investment of the company as the cost of the physical property.

The investors in a new enterprise have to be satisfied as a rule with meager or no returns while the business is being built up. In a business subject only to the natural laws of trade, they expect to make up for the early lean years by large profits later. In a business classified among public callings, the rate-making power must allow for the losses during the lean years, or their rate will be confiscatory, and, of course, will drive investors from the field. In the former class, the value of the established business is a part of the good will, and may be determined by taking a given number of years' purchase of the profits, or exchange value may be considered. In the latter case, a different rule must be adopted.

Referring again to the Ames Case, supra, the public is entitled to be served at reasonable rates, and the corporation is entitled to a fair return on the property used by it in the public service, no more, no less, always assuming, of course, that the return is computed on a proper valuation. That was not made so by statute, but was the rule at common law, which justifies legislatures and commissions in fixing rates. If then a public service corporation has received more or less than a fair return, it has received more or less, as the case may be, than was its due, irrespective of whether a rate had been fixed by public authority. If a deficiency in the fair return in the early years was due to losses or expenditures which were reasonably necessary and proper in developing efficiency and economy of operation, and in establishing a business, it should be made up by the returns in later years. If there was a fair return from the start, the corporation has received all it was entitled to, irrespective of how much of the earnings may have been diverted to the building up of the business.

To view the matter in another aspect, take the case of a public service corporation with a plant constructed just ready to serve the public. It is going to take time and cost money to develop the highest efficiency of the plant and to establish the business. Three courses seem to be open with respect to rate making, viz.: (1) To charge rates from the start sufficient to make a fair return to the investor, and to pay the development expenses from earnings,—a course likely to result in prohibitive rates, except under rare and favorable circumstances; (2) to treat the development expenses as a loss to be recouped out of earnings, but to be spread over a number of years, in other words, as a debt to be amortized,—that involves complications, but would seem to be fairer to the public, and certainly more practical than the first; (3) to treat the development expenses, whether paid from earnings or not, as a part of the capital account, for the purpose of fixing the charge to the public. The last course would seem to be fairest to both the public and the company, as well as the most practical.

It may be, as is urged, that a well-conducted enterprise will charge the cost of developing the business to operating expenses, and that it would open the door to an overissue of securities to permit the capitalization of early losses. In answer, it is sufficient to say that we are dealing, not with proper methods of bookkeeping, not with the proper capitalization upon which to issue securities, but solely with the fair return which the company is entitled to receive from the public. Treating a reasonably necessary and proper outlay in building up a business as an investment, for the purpose of determining the fair rate of return to be charged, is far from holding that it should be treated as capital against which securities might be issued.

We do not say, as matter of law, that the third course above outlined should be adopted as an original proposition. That may present a question of economics, depending on the particular conditions involved. The commission in this case had to determine the rate to be charged, not by a new company with no business, but by an old company with an established business. The first question, therefore, to determine on this branch of the case, was whether the company had already received a fair return on its investment. If it had received such return from the start, or if in later years it had received more than a fair return, the public would already have borne the expense of establishing the business, in whole or in part, and to that extent the question of going value for the purpose of fixing a present rate would be eliminated; for it must constantly be kept in mind in dealing with this problem that the company is entitled to a fair return and no more. If it has already had it, that is the end of the matter. If it did not receive a fair return in the early years, owing to the establishment of the business, a subsequent rate must allow for that loss, or it will be confiscatory. Now, no dividends appear to have been paid by the original company, or by the relator, prior to 1907. Assuming a reasonable need of the service from the start, and that the failure to pay dividends was not due to bad management, an accumulation of a surplus, or undivided profits, the investment of earnings in permanent additions or betterments allowed for in the structural valuation, or to other causes besides those under consideration, none of which is asserted, it would seem plain that going value was an element in this case which the commission was required to determine in making an appraisal on which to compute the fair return to which the company is entitled.

It is urged that an unprofitable business will thus have a greater value for rate-making purposes than one profitable from the start. That again overlooks the fundamental consideration that a public service corporation is entitled to a fair rate of return from the beginning of its investment and no more. If the shareholders have been deprived of a fair return on their investment because of the time and expense reasonably and properly required to build up the business, they have, to the extent of that deprivation, added to their original investment, and are entitled to a return upon it. If, however, a fair return in addition to the expense of building up the business has been earned from the start, the public, not the shareholders, have paid the development expenses. We are dealing, not with exchange values, but with the value upon which the company is entitled to earn a return. In this connection it is to be observed that the statements in the opinions of the courts, in reference to computing the fair rate of return on present values, have for the most part been made in cases in which the precise question under consideration was not directly involved, and in which no attempt was made to limit the elements composing the problem. Manifestly a rate computed on the cost to-day of reproducing the bare plant would not be fair. Experience is proverbially expensive. With the advantage of that experience the same or an equally efficient plant could be constructed to-day at a cost much below the actual and necessary investment of the company in both plant and experience. Indeed, wholly apart from the intangible thing called the going business, the reproductive value to-day of the physical property would not necessarily include the actual and legitimate investment in tangible property which may have been entirely replaced, not because of depreciation, but to meet advances in mechanical science, new conditions, and increasing demands not reasonably to have been foreseen at the start. I am not now speaking of replacements made with fresh capital, about which there is no question in this case. The term "going value," though not exactly defined, has been used quite generally to comprise the elements not included in the structural value of the property in its present condition. The term is not important. The point is that in some manner and under some appropriate heading a due allowance must be made for the investment in those elements. No inflexible rule will in the long run be just both to the public and the corporation. The right to limit the corporation to a fair return fixed by public authority necessarily involves the correlative right in the corporation to be assured of that fair return during all the time that its capital is employed in the public service. The statute governing this case (public service commissions law [Consol. Laws, chap. 48] § 72) provides: "In determining the price to be charged for gas . . . the commission may consider all facts which in its judgment have any bearing upon a proper determination of the question, although not set forth in the complaint, and not within the allegations contained therein, with due regard, among other things, to a reasonable average return upon capital actually expended, and to the necessity of making reservations out of income for surplus and contingencies."

Of course, a reasonable need for the service from the start and reasonably good management are assumed. While, within reasonable limits, service may be provided for anticipated needs, a company should not construct a plant in a wilderness and, after a city has been built around it, expect to recoup its losses while waiting; nor should it expect to recoup losses from bad management. I do not include in the latter mere mistakes or errors in judgment which are almost inevitable in the early stages of any business. The fair return is to be computed on the actual investment, not on an over-issue of securities; and the failure to pay dividends to the investors must be due to the causes under consideration, not to an accumulation of a surplus or to expenditures for permanent additions or betterments which are included in the appraisal of the physical property; in other words, the actual net earnings are to be taken. Making proper allowance for the matters just considered, and perhaps for others which do not now occur to me, I define "going value" for rate purposes as involved in this case, to be the amount equal to the deficiency of net earnings below a fair return on the actual investment, due solely to the time and expenditures reasonably necessary and proper to the development of the business and property to its present stage, and not comprised in the valuation of the physical property.

It may be conceded that going value has no existence apart from tangible property, and that commercially there is but one value, that of the property as a whole, but as the rate cannot be made to depend upon the exchange value, which would in turn depend upon the rate, it would seem to be necessary to appraise the physical property and the going value separately, and of course that is the case if the cost of reproduction rule be adopted.

It remains to consider how going value is to be appraised. That presents a question of fact, the determination of which is primarily within the province of the rate-making body. It is proper for this court, however, to indicate a permissible method or methods, as in People ex rel. Jamaica Water Supply Co. v. State Tax Comrs. 196 N. Y. 39, 89 N. E. 581, it indicated a rule for valuing a special franchise for taxing purposes, which has generally been followed.

Obviously, the most satisfactory method is to show the actual experience of the company, the original investment, its earnings from the start, the time actually required and expenses incurred in building up the business, all expenditures not reflected by the present condition of the physical property, the extent to which bad management or other causes prevented or depleted earnings, and any other facts bearing on the question, keeping in mind that the ultimate fact to be determined is not the amount of the expenditures, but the deficiency in the fair return to the investors due to the causes under consideration. The business 51 L.R.A. (N.S.) in this case was twenty years old, the books of the old company were not available, and it is of course problematical whether, if produced, they would have shown the necessary facts. The question, therefore, had to be determined, as all questions of fact have to be, by the best evidence available. Here, I may repeat that mere difficulty in the proof would not justify a confiscatory rate. The value of the physical property was shown by opinion evidence as to the cost of reproduction. The same kind of evidence was given by two witnesses for the relator as to the cost of building up the business to its present state. In the appellants' brief it is said that they were men "of mature age and much experience." One witness said that $30 a meter was an arbitrary sum usually adopted by engineers as the cost of building up such a business, and he put the cost in this case at $600,000. Another witness estimated the going value to be $781,916. He explained at length how he arrived at that figure. He assumed the existence of two plants, situated exactly alike in the same community and with the same physical property: (1) The actual plant with its established business; (2) a suppositional plant with no business. He then estimated the length of time and expense required by the second plant to develop its business to the stage and revenue of the actual plant. There would appear to be as good ground for admitting the opinion of a qualified expert on such a subject as on the cost to reproduce the physical property. Of course, the commission was not bound by that evidence. It had in addition the experience of the relator and its predecessor as to payment of dividends, the amount of capitalization of both, and the value of the physical property in its present condition determined as above stated. With nothing opposed to those facts and the opinion evidence, it was not justified in ignoring the evidence of going value, or of merely attaching some inappreciable importance to it. See Bonbright v. Geary (D. C.) 210 Fed. 44, 54, 56. The first question certified must be answered in the affirmative.

Upon the next two questions we disagree with the learned appellate division.

In determining the cost of reproduction, the commission allowed $12,717 as the cost of restoring the pavement as it existed when the mains and service pipes were laid in the streets. The relator claimed an allowance of at least $200,000 for the cost of restoring pavements subsequently laid, on the theory that that cost would have to be incurred if the mains were to be laid to-day. But the new pavements in fact added nothing to the property of the relator. Its mains were as serviceable and intrinsically as valuable before as after the new pavements were laid. The controlling considerations under the preceding point also determine this. The rights of the public are not to be ignored. The question has a double aspect. What will be fair to the public as well as to the relator? Smyth v. Ames, 169 U. S. 466, 42 L. ed. 819, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 418. Should the public pay more for gas simply because improved pavements have been laid at public expense? It is no answer to say that the new expensive pavements suggest improved conditions, which, though adding to the value of the plant, will not, by reason of the greater consumption, add to the expense per thousand feet of the gas consumed. The public are entitled to the benefit of the improved conditions, if thereby the relator is enabled to supply gas at a less rate. The relator is entitled to a fair return on its investment, not on improvements made at public expense. It is said that the mains will have to be relaid. So will the new pavements, and much oftener. Both might possibly be relaid at the same time. The case is not at all parallel to the so-called unearned increment of land. That the company owns. It does not own the pavements, and the laying of them does not add to its investment or increase the cost to it of producing gas. The cost of reproduction, less accrued depreciation, rule seems to be the one generally employed in rate cases. But it is merely a rule of convenience, and must be applied with reason. On the one hand, it should not be so applied as to deprive the corporation of a fair return at all times on the reasonable, proper, and necessary investment made by it to serve the public, and on the other hand it should not be so applied as to give the corporation a return on improvements made at public expense which in no way increase the cost to it of performing that service.

The appellate division felt bound by the decision of the United States circuit court in the Consolidated Gas Case, 157 Fed. 849, and it is true that such an allowance was made in that case. But the United States Supreme Court held in that case (212 U. S. 19, 53 L. ed. 382, 48 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1134, 29 Sup. Ct. Rep. 192, 15 Ann. Cas. 1034) that the rate established was not confiscatory, and did not pass on the propriety of that allowance. What was said in the opinion on the subject of present value was merely a general statement having no necessary relation to the question now under consideration.

We agree with the appellate division that annual increase in the value of land is not income. Of course, under the rule of the Ames Case, supra, land might become so valuable as to require its use for other purposes, and as to make a rate based on it unfair to the public. The present is not such a case.

The first question should be answered in the affirmative, the second, third, and fourth in the negative, and the order of the Appellate Division, in so far as it remits the proceedings to the public service commission, should be affirmed, without costs.

I. Pavement over mains.

a. Introduction.

When an appraisal is to be made of the property of a public utility company for 51 L.R.A.(N.S.)

condemnation or rate-making purposes, it may be found that a considerable portion of it is under paved streets. Some of these underground lines may have been put in before the pavements were laid and some afterward. In the latter case an additional expense is imposed upon the company because of the fact that the pavement must be taken up and replaced. One of the interesting questions which has arisen with reference to public utility property valuation is how this item shall be treated. This matter has not received any extended consideration by the courts, but is being constantly presented to commissions. The right of the companies to have the actual expense entailed by taking up and putting back pavements, in process of laying their mains and conduits, recognized as a capital expenditure, has never been denied. The controversy has been over the propriety of permitting the companies, on the cost to reproduce theory, to add to their capital account the cost of pavements paid for by taxpayers where the mains were laid before the pavements were spread. The commissions are unanimous in refusing to allow the companies anything for paving under such circumstances. The decision in PEOPLE EX REL. KINGS COUNTY LIGHTING CO. v. WILLCOX accords with the views of public service commissioners on this subject.¹

It is obvious that the correct rule as to paving in rate cases will depend in the first instance upon the theory of valuation adopted; that is to say, whether the company is held entitled to earn a return upon the original cost or investment theory, upon the value theory, or upon the cost of reproduction theory. If the investment theory is to control and the return based on the amount of the company's sacrifice, manifestly no allowance can be made for that which cost the company nothing. On the other hand, if the cost of reproduction theory is to be applied, the question of who paid for the pavement is immaterial. Assuming, however, that the company's property is to be inventoried at its present value, the question of what shall be done with pavements becomes a trifle more difficult, and yet the principles applicable to this aspect of the problem seem reasonably clear. The various theories of valuation as applied to paving will now be discussed.

b. Original cost or investment theory.

If it is to be held that the company shall be allowed to earn a return only on the basis of its sacrifice, that is to say, on the amount of its actual investment, it is apparent, as stated, that nothing can be allowed for paving not laid at the cost of the company. The books of the corporation would show no expenditure for this item. On the other hand, if the mains were put down after the pavements were laid, the additional expense necessitated thereby would appear as part of the construction account, and would have to be recognized. As already pointed out, the commissions have always been ready to give the company credit for these expenditures, no matter what theory of valuation they may be proceeding on.²

¹ In the lower court, Clarke, J., gave the following reasons for an allowance for paving over mains: "The fact that these streets have been paved and the region generally improved has caused sales of land, the building of houses, and the increase in population, which has enabled the company within the last few years to make profits and declare dividends, which for many years it was unable to do. The argument that streets paved or unpaved make no difference in the earning power of a gas company is unsound. The earning power of a gas plant depends upon its constituency. If it has nobody to sell gas to, it can make no profits; and if there are no decent streets, there will be few people. The value of a plant of any kind is certainly affected by its location and the demand for its products. If a new company undertook to install a duplicate plant, the cost of repaving the present streets would properly be allowed for. Hence it is a necessary element of reproduction value. It is a valuable advantage which the present owner has which a prospective buyer would have to pay for. Like increased land values, a school of thought might condemn it as 'unearned increment', but the law does not yet refuse to include it in its definition of property capable of ownership and entitled to protection."

Nothing should be allowed for paving, in the value of a telephone company's property for rate-making purposes, where no 61 L.R.A.(N.S.)

pavements were in existence at the time conduits were put down. San José v. Pacific Tel. & Teleph. Co. Cal. R. C. R. Dec. 1008 (1913).

Paving is not a proper element of value where the pavement was not paid for by the utility, nor any expense in connection with it directly incurred, in determining a value which shall serve as the basis for an adjustment in rates. Ripon v. Ripon Light & Water Co. 5 Wis. R. C. R. 1 (1910).

For the purpose of determining the value of a public utility taken over by a municipality, the cost of paving which was not paid for by the utility will not be included. Re Fond du Lac Water Co. 5 Wis. R. C. R. 482 (1910).

No allowance will be made for paving which the company was not compelled to remove when laying its mains and services. Re Manitowoc Waterworks Co. 7 Wis. R. C. R. 71 (1911).

In Baltz v. Brooklyn Borough Gas Co. 2 P. S. C. R. (1st D. N. Y.) 620 (1911), it is said: "We shall assume that the company is not entitled to collect from gas consumers a rate which will yield a fair return upon paving which the city has placed over its mains, and for which the company has not expended or paid directly or indirectly a single dollar."

A public service corporation may not present, as a basis for capitalization, the cost of street paving which the city has laid. Re Metropolitan Street R. Co. 3 P. S. C. R. (1st D. N. Y.) 113 (1912).

The cost of paving not laid by the utility company will not be included in the inventory of its property for rate-making purposes. Milwaukee v. Milwaukee Electric R. & Light Co. 10 Wis. R. C. R. 1 (1912).

c. Value theory.

It would probably be conceded that in a sale or condemnation case, the amount the company would be entitled to receive for its property would be measured by its present value. In considering the proper treatment for paving in a rate case, it will be here assumed that the Federal and state Constitutions require the returns to be based upon the value of the company's property used and useful in the public service, rather than upon its original cost. This supposition, if applied to land, would mean that appreciated values would have to be recognized. The question then is: If appreciation in land values would be allowed under such circumstances, is it necessary to include in the inventory of the company's property pavements laid at the expense of the taxpayers of the city, on the theory that the cost of reproduction represents their present enhanced value? In other words, is the situation here analogous to that of donations of land? It has been very strongly urged on behalf of the companies that the cost of such pavements does represent an appreciation which must be recognized, on the theory that the company is entitled to earn a return on the value of its property. Is there any difference in principle between the appreciation of land by reason of the fact that a pavement is laid in the street in front of it, and the appreciation of the value of pipes due to new paving? It has been held that such an analogy does not exist.³ In a case before the New York Public Service Commission, First District, it is admitted that there is some similarity between the two situations, but it is pointed out that land is owned or leased or paid for by the company and selected by it, while this is not true of pavements.⁴

This, however, does not seem to be a fair answer to the contention, because the increment of value is supposed to be added to the mains or conduits, which are a part of the property of the company, as much as its land. Assume that two lots, A and B, on adjoining streets, each have, in 1900, a value of $1,000 and that such value remains unchanged for ten years. In 1910 a pavement costing $200 is laid in front of lot A. If lots A and B were now to be sold, undoubtedly the former would be more valuable and would probably sell for $1,200, whereas lot B would retain its original value of $1,000. In this case, however, the cost of the pavement would have been borne by the owner of lot A, and the reason the buyer would give more for it afterward would be that he would be relieved of the cost of the laying of the pavement. If, how-

A gas company is not entitled to earn a return on the cost of paving which the city has put down over its mains. In Re Rates for Gas, 31st Ward, 4 P. S. C. R. (1st D. N. Y.) 328 (1913), Maltbie, Commissioner, said: "The cost of such paving has been paid once by taxpayers or property owners, and it is not to be presumed that the gas consumers are to pay the company a return upon what the company does not own, what it has never paid for, and what has been paid for by other persons."

³The cost of more expensive improvements than the company paid for when it laid its conduits, where old pavements have since been replaced by more expensive ones, cannot be allowed in the valuation of a telephone plant, on the theory that it is analogous to the appreciated value of land. Gately v. Delaware & A. Teleg. & Teleph. Co. 1 N. J. P. U. C. R. 519 (1913).

⁴In Mayhew v. Kings County Lighting Co. 2 P. S. C. R. (1st D. N. Y.) 659 (1911), it was urged that if land should be taken at its present value, mains and services should likewise be appraised at the cost to reproduce; that the increase in the value of the land is a social increment; that improvement in paving is also a social increment; and that if one is to be recognized as belonging to the company, the other should be. To this the commission replied: "Doubtless there is some similarity, and so far as there is, there is equal injustice in allowing the company to make a profit upon 51 L.R.A. (N.S.)

that increase. Indeed, it is not yet clearly settled by the courts that in all cases land shall be taken at appreciated value and the company allowed to increase its rates because of such growth. But pavement that is not owned nor laid nor paid for by the company is very unlike land. In the first place, land is owned or leased by the company; the pavement in question is neither owned nor leased. The company may sell the land it has and buy other land; the company has no such right over pavement, and if it removes its pipes, the pavement remains. Secondly, the company pays for land; it does not, for new pavement. Land is a necessary factor in gas production and distribution; pavement is not. It matters not whether the streets are paved with the most expensive material, or allowed to remain in their natural state. Repairs may cost more in the former case, but such expenses are paid for out of income, and not from capital. Thirdly, the precise land used is selected by the company; the nature of the pavement is fixed by the public authorities. If the company finds its land not well adapted to its needs or too valuable for gas purposes, it may sell and purchase locations elsewhere. Thus, a company may secure the increase in value for itself. But there is no known way whereby a company may sell a pavement over its mains and substitute another kind. Pavement is wholly beyond the control of the company."

ever, it be assumed that for some reason the city, in that particular instance, laid the pavement at its own cost, it would not affect the value of the lot, for it would be worth just as much to the buyer. If it now appeared that a gas company had laid its mains in the same street before it was paved, would it also be said that the mains had appreciated in value the same as the lot? This question goes to the heart of the matter, and to assume that a perfect analogy exists between the enhancement in the value of an isolated lot of land in such a case, and the mains of a public service corporation, illustrates the great confusion of thought which exists as to values as applied to such properties.

It is always possible to place a value on a lot or parcel of land, because of the fact that similar parcels are sold from time to time. It is also an easy matter to determine the price or value of the pipe laid under a pavement, and to estimate the cost of setting it in place. Once the pipe is laid, however, it becomes a part of the entire system, and the value of the plant as a unit is measured by its earning capacity, present or prospective. The value of mains and conduits in streets, therefore, increases only when the earning power of the company increases, and is in nowise affected by the cost of paving or the expense of putting the structures in position.

Land may be enhanced in value by the laying of paving in streets, or by the growth of the community. Mains and conduits can never be enhanced in value by the mere laying of a pavement. They depreciate rather than appreciate by the reason of this fact, because it would cost more to put them on the market. It would be like buying a piece of land encumbered with old buildings which would have to be removed before the land could be used. It should be remembered that the point here under discussion is not whether there should be an allowance for paving not paid for by the company, but merely whether there should be an allowance on the theory that the paving has appreciated the value of the mains lying beneath it, and on the further assumption that the Constitutions require all values to be recognized.

The confusion of thought which exists with reference to cost and value is adverted to in a late decision by the California Commission.⁵ And the Wisconsin Commission has said that the benefit resulting to a utility company by the laying of pavement over its mains does not constitute an element of value.⁶ The New York Commissions have refused to apply this theory to paving,⁷

ing rates of a public utility, because the ordinary conception of value is that for which anything will sell, which, of course, is largely determined by the earning power of the agency in question. . . . Cost of reproduction of a property is to be considered merely because it serves as an indication of what has been invested in the property, and not what the property is worth, as worth is generally understood."

⁷ The fact that if a new and competing company were to enter the field, it would be obliged to pay for the existing pavement over its mains and services, does not justify the allowance of this item in the valuation of the property of the existing company. The commission said: "Even the maximum to be fixed by law would not of necessity be based upon the cost of the most expensive service. However, this argument is irrelevant, because it is the policy of this state that public regulation of rate shall take the place of competition, and that unnecessary duplication of plant shall be and the Wisconsin Commission, while recognizing it as a proper item to be included in an inventory of the cost to reproduce a public service property, does not allow it as a basis for rate making. The commission, of course, holds that, in so far as any expense for this item has actually been incurred by this company, and not previously charged to other accounts, it may be included in the inventory.⁸

d. Cost of reproduction theory.

Some confusion with reference to the question of the proper treatment of pavement may have arisen through a misconception of the purpose of an appraisal. When an engineer is directed to find the cost of reproducing the plant of a public utility company new, he must necessarily estimate the present cost of laying the mains; and the fact that they were laid before existing pavements were spread is immaterial. It is for the commissions to make such use of the fact reported by the engineers as they deem advisable.⁹ The cost of reproduction measures neither the actual cost nor the actual value. The protecting arm of the Constitution does not extend beyond actual avoided. The state is to protect the consumer against unreasonable rates. But if the state must fix rates upon the basis of competitive supply, it is evident that the consumer has lost the advantages of competition, and not gained those of monopoly." Mayhew v. Kings County Lighting Co. 2 P. S. C. R. (1st D. N. Y.) 650 (1911).

In Buffalo Gas Co. v. Buffalo, 3 P. S. C. R. (2d D. N. Y.) 553 (1913), in considering the question whether the company should be allowed for the cost of paving over streets where it had actually incurred no expense for that purpose, it is said: "It should be stated at the outset that this item of repaving to the amount named would be a fair and legitimate item in reproducing the plant as it now exists at the present time. If reproduction cost, with or without depreciation, is the sole test of the present value of the property, then the item must be allowed. If it is not the sole test, then we are at liberty to consider whether or not this repaving affords a just and fair basis in adding to what would otherwise be the price of gas the sum of 11 cents per thousand cubic feet." The commission disallows the claim, saying that the clear weight of reason and equity was against it.

⁸In Ashland v. Ashland Water Co. 4 Wis. R. C. R. 273 (1909), it was held that no allowance should be made for the item of paving, which may be properly a part of the cost of reproduction new, but which is not a part of the company's property devoted to the public use, for the reason that the company did not actually cut through this paving in constructing its system. In so far as paving has actually been cut through in making repairs, extensions, or renewals, and the expense of this cutting has not been previously charged to other accounts, it may properly be included in a valuation of the property.

amount upon which investors are entitled to reasonable returns, but it does not furnish the only evidence of this amount, even in so far as the physical parts alone of the plants are concerned. To include something in the valuation of the physical property for the cost of paving is undoubtedly fair and just when such costs have actually been incurred. But when they have not been incurred, it is very difficult to find any just and reasonable ground upon which they can fairly be made a permanent charge against the consumers."

The commission, with reference to the allowance that should be made for paving in Re Appl. La Crosses Gas & E. Co. 8 Wis. R. C. R. 138 (1911), said: "Such items as these are, without question, costs to be considered in determining the reproduction costs, and should properly be included in a valuation representing the cost of reproducing the plants to-day. That such sums should be retained in determining the physical value upon which returns should be allowed is not so clear; this is a matter which is governed largely by conditions that have been met in constructing the plants. If sums which have been arrived at as expenditures that would be necessary in order to cut through and replace pavement over the underground systems have actually been disbursed for these purposes by the company or the former owners, it is difficult to consider such expenditures in any other light than construction costs; for the additional expense due to paving, when actually met, constitutes necessary investments that the company must make in order to place its services at the disposal of the public, regardless of whether the usefulness of the various mains and conduits so laid beneath pavement does or does not exceed the usefulness of other similarly located, but in streets that are not paved. When, however, such sums as are said to represent the cost of paving have not actually been paid out by the utility for this purpose, but have been borne only by the community itself, to consider such values as investments upon which consumers must return to the company interest charges appears unreasonable, as such procedure, under these conditions, places a penalty upon civic improvements due to economic and social conditions."

value, and the commissions are therefore free to adopt the cost to reproduce theory, or to reject it, as the equities of the particular case may dictate. Courts and commissions have refused to apply this theory to paving.¹⁰

e. Conclusion.

It would seem that the rule adopted by the commissions that the cost of paving not paid for by the company should be disregarded in appraisal of utility property is sound; that an allowance therefor should be rejected in a sale or a condemnation case, because it is not an element of value; that it should not be allowed in a rate case on the theory that it measures an appreciated value; that it should not be recognized in any case on the cost to reproduce new theory, since this would require the public to pay for the most expensive service, and permit the capitalization of monopoly privilege. In short, there appear to be no grounds, legal or equitable, for the inclusion of paving paid for by a municipality and owned by it, in the inventory of the property of a public service corporation. It is often fair and just to allow the companies for certain expenditures incurred, irrespective of the question of whether any actual value is created thereby, on the grounds that such expenditures were a necessary sacrifice in the interest of the public service, but no reason can be perceived for swelling the company's capitalization for

In Des Moines Gas Co. v. Des Moines, 199 Fed. 204, McPherson, J., said: "The theory at first thought in all cases is plausible and attractive, but in the end oftentimes utterly illogical and unreliable, originally adopted as a mere timesaver by mere theorists, and sought to be enforced as against substantial and unbending facts. If the plant is to be reproduced, when is it to be done? If, when reproduced, will the streets then be paved, and, if paved, paved with what? Must it all be reproduced at once, or the same covered by a number of years? If but gradually reproduced, why should not such cost go into either the operating or maintenance accounts? No one can state when it must be reproduced, and a material question arises: What, then, as compared with the present, will be the price of labor, material, and freight? But finally, and to my mind the conclusive reason against the soundness of the reproduction under paved streets is that to allow that theory to prevail, and to increase the capitalization now to the extent of $140,000, is to allow such gas rates as will pay a dividend on such sum from and after this date. But the sum of $140,000 is not put in the capital or value account until the plant is reproduced. As, of course, streets paved or unpaved make no difference in the earning power of the gas plant, and but little, if anything, goes more directly and accurately to the question of value of any structure or plant than its rental, earnings, or as a dividend producer."

The company cannot be allowed to earn a dividend on the cost of paving which it was not allowed to construct. Mayhew v. Kings County Lighting Co. 2 P. S. C. R. (1st D. N. Y.) 659 (1911). In commenting on the theory that the company should be allowed a return on the cost of such paving, the commission said: "The practical effects of such a theory are interesting and important. Suppose a locality at the time a gas company was started and its pipes laid were content to have unpaved, or cheaply paved, streets,—cobblestone, macadam, or gravel being used. Suppose the people come to demand better paving, being dissatisfied with earlier conditions, and that asphalt, brick, or granite block with a concrete base is laid throughout the area. Naturally, the people appreciate that you must pay the cost of the repaving; but according to the theory of counsel for the company, the gas consumer must also pay more for gas. In other words, every time the streets are im-something which adds no measurable value to its property, and which cost it nothing. Justice would appear to be fully satisfied when the company is allowed to capitalize any actual expense necessitated by the laying of the pavement, and this, as stated, is everywhere conceded to be a legitimate charge.

II. Adaptation and solidification.

a. Introduction.

When the builders turn a railroad over to the owners for operation, everything except the land is new and green. From the moment operation begins, the buildings, the rails, the ties, the switches, the rolling stock, in short, all parts of the physical plant except the roadbed, begin their march to the junk heap, as Mr. Hatfield, in his work on Modern Accounting, very picturesquely puts it. Depreciation sets in instantly. The repairs are comparatively few in the early stages of operation, but grow rapidly as the property ages, until the time arrives when patching will no longer answer, and the old parts must be replaced. With the roadbed, the physical law is different. Expenses connected with the maintenance of this part of the property are high in the initial stage of operation, but grow less and less as the bed settles and reaches its normal state. Adaptation has been defined by Mr. Dwight B. Morgan, an engineer connected with the Minnesota railroad appraisal, as the adjustment of the physical line to its environment and purposes; and solidification is defined by him as the settlement of the roadbed to a stable condition. The same conditions exist in respect to the earthworks of canal and irrigation companies.

b. Conflicting views as to treatment of.

Opinions of appraisers and others engaged in the valuation of railroad properties are not in harmony in respect to the treatment this item should receive. Conflict, however, does not take on so wide a range as it does with reference to some other question connected with appraisals of public service company properties. It is conceded by everyone that the cost of bringing these earthworks up to their highest normal operating condition should be allowed. The difference in view is merely whether the expense belongs in the capital account or is an operating charge. Sometimes a specific allowance under this head is rejected, because of the fact that it has been taken care of elsewhere, as, for example, under the head of contingencies. Where this is the ground of its disallowance, it does not mean that it is not considered a proper capital expenditure. It has also been suggested that this expense should be charged to operation, and that the roadbed should not be depreciated, but always be appraised at 100 per cent of its cost new. Again, while it has been recognized that the change in the physical condition of the roadbed appreciates its value, a claim for allowance has been rejected on the ground of lack of evidence by which such value could be measured.¹¹ proved, not only do taxes or assessments go up, but higher gas rates are justified, notwithstanding the fact that the company may not have paid $1 in connection therewith. If this theory is correct, citizens must consider, in connection with every civic improvement, its effect upon rates for gas, electricity, telephone service, water transportation, and every other service which involves the use of the subsurface of the streets. If such improvement increases the cost of reproducing the undertaking supplying such service, higher rates will thereby be justified than would be reasonable before such improvement is made.

"Michigan makes no specific allowance, although Prof. [Mortimer E.] Cooley says it has value, but is usually allowed for in operating expenses. Mr. [Henry E.] Riggs states that this item was partly allowed for in the 10 per cent item for contingencies. (Proceedings American Society of Civil Engineers, November, 1910.) He also says: "There can be no reasonable objection to adding to the contract prices for grading, ballasting, etc., a reasonable amount to cover not so much the seasoning and settling of the new roadbed as the actual money disbursed in work on this new roadbed during the first three or four years of operation in order to bring it up to the proper operating condition. A very considerable part of the money spent on "maintenance of track" for the first few years after a new line is built is in reality deferred construction cost. (The Valuation of Public-Service Property, p. 147.)"

"Minnesota, through her engineer, Mr. [Dwight C.] Morgan, made a total allowance for this sum amounting to $11,743,000, or over 3 per cent on the total 'present value' of the properties, which is about 20 per cent of the cost of grading. However, the commission refused to approve the item in its findings. Mr. [D. F.] Jurgenson says this item was computed as follows: 'Main line, one man, at $1.40, 313 days for 4 years, $1,752.80 per mile. Branch line, one-half man, at $1.40, 313 days, for 4 years. $876.40 per mile.'

"Nebraska allows for adaptation and so-the last preceding note, that California makes no allowance for adaptation and solidification of roadbed in its estimate of reproduction value, but does recognize it in its estimate of present value. In other words, the commission endeavors to ascertain the cost of reproducing the property new at the date of the appraisal. In ascertaining the present value of other physical property, accrued depreciation is subtracted from the cost to reproduce new. It would therefore seem to be an entirely consistent policy to add to the cost new, the amount of appreciation due to the settlement and seasoning lidification of roadbed. Mr. [E. C.] Hurd gives his reasons (which are stated in the report).

"South Dakota makes no allowance for this item, stating it is properly chargeable to maintenance, just as worn-out ties are cared for; suggesting that roadbed might be allowed for at 100 per cent.

"Washington allows for adaptation and solidification at 10 per cent of the cost of reproducing the grade."

"In California no allowance will be made for this item in the estimates of reproduction value. However, in the estimates of present value, this factor will appear as a percentage of reproduction value, or as an arbitrary allowance made to cover maintenance of roadbed for a short period. . . .

"Massachusetts, in the New York, New Haven, & Hartford Railroad appraisal, allowed $500 per mile, being about 2.6 per cent on the cost of grading and about .4 of 1 per cent on the total cost of road and structures.

"The New York Public Service Commission for the first district has allowed this item with others in certain rate cases. . . .

"In New Jersey Mr. Hansel clearly recognized the item 'solidification and adaptation of roadbed,' as an element of cost, and that it must be provided for. He says, however: 'The railroad company is entitled to claim this cost as a part of their investment. We have no means of determining the amount of solidification or settlement, even approximately, and have not therefore attempted to fix any definite unit of values for same.

"No allowance is made for the cost of solidification and adaptation of roadbed, as such has been allowed by the Wisconsin Commission." Report of Committee on Railroad Taxes & Plans for Ascertaining Fair Valuation of Railroad Property, at the 24th Annual Convention of the National Association of Railway Commissioners, 1 Public Service Regulation, 757.

of the roadbed. At the time the report of the committee on railroad taxes and plans for estimating the fair value of railroad property was submitted to the National Association of Railway Commissioners, the percentage of allowance had not been determined. Since that time, however, the question has arisen in actual cases before the commission.¹² In the Minnesota Rate Case, the lower court recognized the item of adaptation and solidification of roadbed as a proper capital charge. This point was not directly passed upon in the supreme court decision.¹³ Other courts and commissions have upheld the propriety of the was for the solidification and adaptation of roadbed. The commission said: "With reference to solid rock, an appreciation of 10 per cent has been allowed, although the commission is making further investigations in appreciation of solid rock, and may not hereafter allow more than 5 per cent."

In Re Tonopah & Tidewater R. Co. Cal. Dec. 836, July 29th, 1913, an allowance of 8 per cent was made on the item of grading for appreciation.

¹³ In Shepard v. Northern P. R. Co. 184 Fed. 765, it is said: "There are exceptions because the master allowed to the Northern Pacific Company $1,613,612.76, to the Great Northern Company $3,219,642, and to the Minneapolis & St. Louis Railroad Company $608,896.43, for the solidification and adaptation of their respective railroads, and deducted nothing from the cost of reproduction for depreciation. But these amounts are those allowed by the defendants' engineer and witness Morgan in his original estimates of the cost of reproduction which he reported to the commission, and there is much other evidence in the record to sustain them. It is clear that a new railroad may appreciate or depreciate as it grows older. It may be renewed, repaired, and improved day by day and year by year as it is operated, until its embankments become more solid, its culverts and bridges firmer and more reliable, its ties and rails more steadfast and secure, and its rolling stock more seasoned and better adapted to its service and to the railroad it traverses, and until the whole property becomes more valuable than it was when it was first constructed. On the other hand, its embankments and its roadbed may be neglected and permitted to deteriorate by the action of rain, snow, and frost, its ties may be allowed to become partially decayed, its bolts and rails loose, and its rolling stock worn, without adequate repairs, until the entire property suffers great depreciation. Whether, at a given time, a railroad property is more or less valuable than it would be if it had just been constructed, is a question of fact that, in a suit of this nature, must be answered by the evidence. That evidence in this case is that the railroads, rolling stock, and appurtenances which constitute the great transportation machines charge for adaptation or solidification.¹⁴ Upon the question of adaptation of a railroad to its environment and purposes, it has been said: "An established railroad system may be worth more than its original cost and more than the mere cost of its physical reproduction. . . . The inevitable errors in its building which finite minds and hands cannot avoid have been measurably corrected; time and effort have produced a commercial adjustment between it and the country it was intended to serve; relations have been established with patrons, and sources of traffic have been opened up and made tributary. In other words, the railroad, unlike one newly constructed, is fully equipped and is doing business as a going concern."¹⁵ But the New York of these companies in Minnesota, are in better condition for use, more efficient, more steadfast, better adapted to each other, than if their construction was just completed; that all depreciation had been offset by appreciation, and that values to the amounts here allowed by the master have been added to the values of these properties new, by their age, their repairs, their renewals, their adaptation, and the assured efficiency that comes from constant careful maintenance and operation. There was no error in these allowances."

¹⁴ In Mercantile Trust Co. v. Texas & P. R. Co. 51 Fed. 529, McCormick, J., points out that seasoning is a proper cost of a railroad plant. He says: "In the race to occupy territory, or to avail of the state's donations of land, or to get a basis for the issuance and placing of their bonds, or to meet the crying want of communities along their projected lines, or for one or more or all of these considerations, the defendant railways hurried the construction of their lines, and opened them for business in a green and unfinished condition, with unseasoned roadbeds, ties, rails, culverts, and bridges, and rolling stock, not adequate to move or bear the weight of their present traffic, and with very little terminal and way station equipment. That in large sections of the state through which these railways pass, the most fertile, fully occupied and developed, and furnishing the bulk of their domestic freight and passenger traffic, the character of the soil is such as renders it extremely difficult and expensive to construct and to maintain a sound roadbed, and to keep the ties on top of it; time and use and constant large additions to the dump being required, and these not always efficient. That the cost of construction and equipment up to the time when these roads were respectively opened for business was far short of the proper cost of their plant as it exists to-day. That this proper cost of their plant as it exists to-day exceeds, in the case of each of these railways, the amount of its bonded indebtedness. That these roads could be duplicated only by going through a similar process of seasoning, and that even with the present reduced market value of much of the construction and equipment material, and the advantages of transportation of the same to interior points, which existing roads would furnish, such duplicates, with equal right of way, roadbed, track, rolling stock, terminal and way station facilities, could not be acquired and constructed now for less money than these roads have cost."

In Metropolitan Trust Co. v. Houston & T. C. R. Co. 90 Fed. 683, McCormick, J., says that, in estimating the value of railroad property, an allowance should be made for the increase due to the settling, seasoning, and permanent establishment of the railways.

In Re Report of the Physical Valuation of Nebraska Railways, 4 Neb. S. R. C. R. 447 (1911), with reference to "Adaptation and Solidification of Roadway," this item was included as reasonable in representing the cost or value of labor and material over and above the normal maintenance cost of an established roadway. A period of three years was determined as proper in order to thoroughly adapt and solidify a newly constructed property, involving therein labor in the maintenance of the track structure and material providing against subsidence in the earthwork.

In the Holyoke Water Power Co.'s Valuation, the commission, in considering the market value of the property, said: "In this connection, as bearing upon the market value of the property, we have also taken into account, among other things introduced in evidence, the fitness, suitability, and adaptability of the plants for the service required; their ability to supply present needs, and to what extent they can be depended upon to produce gas or electricity for the future; how efficiently and economically they can be carried on; their location with reference to facility for producing supplies and to dispose of their product; and whether or not there are any faults or defects inherent in the plants, independent of the diminution factors contained in third clause, such as any faulty arrangement of the works or any part thereof, inadequate facilities for their extension or for any necessary changes, any lack of capacity to supply the output for present or for future requirements, any undue expense necessary for repairs and replacements, or other excessive cost of operation, or any other fault inherent in the systems not included in clause third, which increases the trouble and expense of making and distributing gas and electricity, and thereby affects the market value of the plants." Holyoke Water Power Co. 18 Mass. G. & E. L. C. R. 77 (1903). (Property taken over by municipality.)

¹⁵ Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. Love, 177 Fed. 493.

Hon. C. A. Prouty, of the Interstate Commerce Commission, has made the following striking presentation of this problem: "The first railroad which the commission is pro-

Commission, First Department, has refused to apply this principle to adaptation of a street railway to its purpose, holding that interest and operating expenses for several months after operation actually begins cannot be capitalized on the theory that operation up to that time is experimental.¹⁶

In the valuation of a water company's plant, a claim for a large sum was made for the appreciation of the earthworks of the company's canal due to the packing of the banks and silting. The claim was rejected, but on the ground that the evidence was insufficient for a basis of calculation.¹⁷

c. Treatment as capital or operating expenses.

The fundamental reasons for treating appreciation due to the adaptation or solidification of roadbeds and earthworks as a capital charge or an operating expense have not been very satisfactorily explained. What should be the rule? Let it be assumed, for the purpose of illustration, that ordinary natural laws are reversed, and that physical property, instead of depreciating in spite of repairs, actually appreciates until it attains the point of its highest efficiency, from which time it neither appreciates nor depreciates. Assume that a new steam engine may be bought by the expenditure of $1,000; that, by the further expenditure of $100 a year for ten years, it will be brought to its highest standard of efficiency, and will so remain forever. At the end of ten years the engine has cost $2,000. This cost will probably measure its value at the time. In other words, if the owner had bought a similar engine ten years old, it would have probably cost $2,000. Instead, however, of buying it in that condition, a new engine is purchased, so that the yearly expenditure is necessary to bring it up to its greatest efficiency. Is the sum of $1,000 spent for this purpose a capital charge or an operating expense? It is obviously a capital charge, and for precisely the same reason the original expenditure of $1,000 for the engine should be deemed a capital charge, rather than an operating expense.

One reason for putting certain expenditures into the capital account is to disceeding to survey in what is known as the Pacific District is the San Pedro, Los Angeles, & Salt Lake, extending from San Pedro, California, to Salt Lake City, Utah, some 800 miles. Most of this road has been built in comparatively recent times, and the circumstances and cost of construction are fairly well known. The course of the road is for the most part through an arid desert. A certain section of it, when built, was located where no man thought it could ever be disturbed by floods, yet shortly after it was opened for operation, the floods came and carried out this portion. It was at once reconstructed upon a new location supposed to be beyond all possible danger from a recurrence of the previous disaster, nevertheless the waters again came and washed away this same section; whereupon it was rebuilt upon a third location, beyond all possible reach of future trouble from this source. Considering the nature of the road and the people who were interested in its construction, it seems probable that due caution was exercised in the original location; that is, that a reasonably prudent man building this railroad, as those men did, to be operated by them as a railroad, would have located it as it was located. It is undoubtedly true that the second location was made with great care, and was believed to be beyond possible danger. It has cost a large sum more to rebuild this road than it would have originally cost to construct it where it is to-day. Now, in determining the value of this property, what, if any, allowance is to be made for this experimental outlay? If the government itself had constructed this railroad, it probably would have had the same experience and would have expended the same amount 51 L.R.A.(N.S.)

of money which the owners actually did. This illustration puts the question in a very striking form, but the same idea enters more or less into the valuation of most of the railroads of this country. There has of necessity been a certain amount of experiment before hitting on the right and proper thing. Does this development expense constitute an element of value which may be recognized to-day, or must the owners of these public utilities stand the loss of their mistakes in the same way that the owner of a private enterprise would? Vast sums of money are involved in the answer to that very simple question." Address before the Second Annual Meeting of the Chamber of Commerce of the United States of America, in Washington, February 11, 1914, 3 Public Service Regulation, 61.

tribute the burden of the service equitably among the consumers who are benefited by it. If the yearly expenditures of $100, made to bring the engine up to the highest state of efficiency, were charged to the operating account, the result would be that the consumers of the first ten years would bear one half of the whole expense of the engine, which, in justice, ought to be distributed over the entire period of its usefulness.

If it is assumed that a new public service company is organized, and is to be allowed to earn a return on the cost of its property new, including this engine, it would be of some advantage to the company to have the annual expenditure of $100 charged to operating expenses. If so charged, the company would, of course, not be allowed to earn a return upon it, but neither would the stockholders have to advance this money out of their own pockets, and, having title to the engine, they would, if called upon to sell it, profit by its appreciated value.

If one railroad company desired to purchase the property of another, it would undoubtedly pay more for a seasoned than it would for a green roadbed. The value of such a roadbed has undoubtedly appreciated. If that part of the appreciation which is due to expenditures has been paid for by the patrons of the road, as would be the case if such outlays were charged to operating expenses, the company would profit by the process, upon the sale or condemnation of its property. For rate-making purposes, it would make little difference to the company which method was adopted.

It would be unjust, of course, to allow the company to include such charges in its operating expenses and then permit it to earn a return upon them as part of its investment, if this matter were wholly within the discretion of the courts. The great practical difficulty in applying the principle to the adaptation and solidification of roadbed is to determine what part of the early expenditures really belong to maintenance, and what part goes to make up the appreciated value. If all expenses after operation begins are charged to operation, it is a serious question, even in a rate case, whether the appreciated value of the roadbed would not have to be recognized as part of the property of the company upon which it is entitled to earn a return. Reverting to the steam engine illustration again, let it be supposed that the valuation is made in the eleventh year. It is found from an examination of the books of the company that the yearly expenditures of $100 for the improvement of the engine have not been made out of the pockets of the stockholders, but from the earnings of the company. The mere fact the consumers have paid for half of the present cost or value of engine does not change its nature as capital. The increment of value has been added to it, and the title is in the company. The problem of the treatment it shall receive is therefore the same as that in respect to the treatment of all appreciated values. If the rule is adopted that donations of land are to be recognized as part of the property of a public service corporation upon which it is entitled to earn a return,—and this appears to be the sound rule,—consistency would require the adoption of the same rule here. If the Constitutions require that the value basis shall be adopted in measuring the amount the company is to receive for its property, or the amount upon which it is entitled to earn a return, it would seem to follow that the company would here be entitled to have the engine valued at $2,000 rather than at $1,000. If the engine at the time of the valuation would actually sell for $2,000, how would it be possible to allow the property to earn a return only on $1,000, on the theory that the additional value had been contributed by consumers, without being guilty of taking the company's property without compensation?

The problem of the treatment of the item of adaptation and solidification of earthworks is no different from that of the treatment of the steam engine operating under the conditions named. It would appear, therefore, that the expenditures necessary to bring a roadbed up to its highest state of efficiency were theoretically a capital charge, rather than an operating expense. Treating such expenditures as operating costs is unjust to the patrons of the road, since it practically requires them to donate the appreciated value to the company.

2. The proprietor of a restaurant who is not a student in a college, and has no children as such students, has no right of action against the college for forbidding pupils to patronize his restaurant.

APPPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Madison County in defendants' favor in a suit to enjoin them from boycotting plaintiff's business, and for damages occasioned by said boycott. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. J. A. Sullivan and S. Mayner Wallace, for appellant:

Berea College had no authority, under its charter, to make or to enforce the by-law, and therefore the same is void.

The by-law is void because in derogation of the students' civil rights, in violation of or purpose to injure any particular person, appears to be Jones v. Cody, 132 Mich. 13, 62 L.R.A. 160, 92 N. W. 495, holding that a tradesman has no right of action against the principal of a public school for enforcing a lawful order of the board of education requiring pupils to go directly home when dismissed from school, although the effect of such enforcement is to injure his trade with the pupils. The court stated that "no trader or merchant has the constitutional right to have children remain in his place of business in order that they may spend money there while they are on their way to and from school. The liberty of neither the child nor parent nor trader is at all unlawfully restrained by this rule and its reasonable enforcement. The rule does not interfere with the right of the parent to send his child upon an errand to a store or other reputable place, or to the home of a relative or friend to visit. Neither does it restrict the authority of parents over their children."

In People ex rel. Pratt v. Wheaton College, 40 Ill. 186, discussed in the opinion in GORT v. BEREA COLLEGE, the complaint of the rule in question was not made by the society affected thereby, but by the father of a student who had been suspended because of his violation of the rule; the father having applied for mandamus to compel the reinstatement of the son.

See Payne v. Western & A. R. Co. 13 Lea, 507, 49 Am. Rep. 666, holding that a trader had no cause of action against an employer for maliciously posting a notice forbidding his employees to trade with him; and Heywood v. Tillson, 75 Me. 225, 46 Am. Rep. 373, holding that the owner of a house has no cause of action against an employer who maliciously refuses to employ anyone who may lease such house. 51 L.R.A.(N.S.)

So, in Guethler v. Altman, 26 Ind. App. 587, 84 Am. St. Rep. 313, 60 N. E. 355, an action by a dealer in confectionery and school supplies against the school board, wherein it was alleged that the teacher of the high school for several months made continual and increasing efforts, by means of persuasion and threats and intimidation, to prevent the pupils of the high school over whom he had particular charge and control from visiting and patronizing his place of business; that he talked to the pupils, advising them to stay away from the plaintiff's place of business and to purchase their school supplies elsewhere, and that in doing these things he was following instructions given him by the school board and superintendent, and all that was done was with the full knowledge of the board and superintendent. The court, in holding no cause of action existed, said that it was proper for the school authorities to make such reasonable rules and regulations as were necessary for the discipline, government, and management of the school, that it was not an unlawful act for the teacher to advise or persuade the pupils not to visit such store, and the fact that he acted maliciously did not change the rule. That an act which is lawful in itself and which violates no right cannot be made actionable because of the motive which induced it. (See, in this connection, note in 62 L.R.A. 674, on the general subject of the effect of bad motive to make actionable what would otherwise not be.)

Mr. John Noland also for appellant.

Messrs. Burnam & Burnam for appellees.

Nunn, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellant, J. S. Gott, about the 1st of September, 1911, purchased and was conducting a restaurant in Berea, Kentucky, across the street from the premises of Berea College. A restaurant had been conducted in this same place for quite a long while by the party from whom Gott purchased. For many years it has been the practice of the governing authorities of Berea College to distribute among the students at the beginning of each scholastic year a pamphlet entitled "Students' Manual," containing the rules and regulations of the college for the government of the student body. Subsection 3 of this manual, under the heading "Forbidden Places," enjoined the students from entering any "place of ill repute, liquor saloons, gambling houses," etc. During the 1911 summer vacation, the faculty, pursuant to their usual practice of revising the rules, added another clause to this rule as to forbidden places, and the rule was announced to the student body at chapel exercise on the first day of the fall term, which began September 11th. The new rule is as follows: "(b) Eating houses and places of amusement in Berea, not controlled by the college, must not be entered by students on pain of immediate dismissal. The institution provides for the recreation of its students, and ample accommodation for meals and refreshment, and cannot permit outside parties to solicit student patronage for gain."

Appellant's restaurant was located and conducted mainly for the profits arising from student patronage. During the first few days after the publication of this rule, two or three students were expelled for its violation, so that the making of the rule and its enforcement had the effect of very materially injuring, if not absolutely ruining, appellant's business because the students were afraid to further patronize it.

On the 20th day of September appellant instituted this action in equity and procured a temporary restraining order and injunction against the enforcement of the rule above quoted, and charging that the college and its officers unlawfully and maliciously conspired to injure his business by adopting a rule forbidding students entering eating houses. For this he claimed damages in the sum of $500. By amended petitions he alleged that, in pursuance of such conspiracy, the college officers had uttered slanderous remarks concerning him and his business, and increased his prayer for damages to $2,000. The slanderous remarks were alleged to have been spoken at chapel and other public exercises to the student body as a reason for the rule, and were to the effect that appellant was a bootlegger, and upon more than one occasion had been charged and convicted of illegally selling whisky. Berea College answered and denied that any slanderous remarks had been made as to appellant, or that they had conspired maliciously or otherwise, or that the rule adopted was either unlawful or unreasonable. In the second paragraph the college affirmatively set forth that it is a private (incorporated) institution of learning, supported wholly by private donations and its endowment and such fees as it collects from students or parents of students who desire to become affiliated with said institution and abide by and conform to the rules and regulations provided by the governing authorities of the college for the conduct of the students; that every student upon entering said institution agrees, upon pain of dismissal, to conform to such rules and regulations as may be from time to time promulgated; that the institution aims to furnish an education to inexperienced country, mountain boys and girls of very little means at the lowest possible cost; that practically all of the students are from rural districts and unused to the ways of even a village the size of Berea; and that they are of very limited means.

It is further alleged that they have been compelled from time to time to pass rules tending to prevent students from wasting their time and money and to keep them wholly occupied in study; that some of the rules prohibit the doing of things not in themselves wrong or unlawful, but which the governing authorities have found and believe detrimental to the best interest of the college and the student body. For these reasons the rule in question was adopted; but they say at the time that they had no knowledge that the plaintiff owned or was about to acquire a restaurant, and that the rule was in no way directed at the plaintiff. Upon motion the restraining order was dissolved, but, on account of allegations charging slanderous remarks, the lower court overruled demurrer to the petition. After filing of the answer, proof was heard, the case submitted and tried by the court, with the result that the petition was dismissed, and Gott appeals to this court.

Passing the question as to whether an ordinary action can be joined with an equitable action for restraining order, there being no objection to it in the lower court, it is sufficient to say that, on the question of uttering the slanderous words, issue was joined, and the case submitted to the court without the intervention of a jury, and we are disposed to accept its finding against Gott since it is supported by sufficient evidence. The larger question, and the one we are called here to pass upon, is whether the rule forbidding students entering eating houses was a reasonable one and within the power of the college authorities to enact, and the further question whether, in that event, appellant Gott will be heard to complain. That the enforcement of the rule worked a great injury to Gott's restaurant business cannot well be denied; but, unless he can show that the college authorities have been guilty of a breach of some legal duty which they owe to him, he has no cause of action against them for the injury.

One has no right of action against a merchant for refusal to sell goods, nor will an action lie, unless such means are used as of themselves constitute a breach of legal duty, for inducing or causing persons not to trade, deal, or contract with another; and it is a well-established practice that, when a lawful act is performed in the proper manner, the party performing it is not liable for mere incidental consequences injuriously resulting from it to another. 38 Cyc. 418-423.

College authorities stand in loco parentis concerning the physical and moral welfare and mental training of the pupils, and we are unable to see why, to that end, they may not make any rule or regulation for the government or betterment of their pupils that a parent could for the same purpose. Whether the rules or regulations are wise or their aims worthy is a matter left solely to the discretion of the authorities or parents, as the case may be, and, in the exercise of that discretion, the courts are not disposed to interfere, unless the rules and aims are unlawful or against public policy. Section 881 of the Kentucky Statutes, applicable to corporations of this character, provides that they may "adopt such rules for their government and operation, not inconsistent with law, as the directors, trustees, or managers may deem proper." The corporate charter of Berea College empowers the board of trustees to "make such by-laws as it may deem necessary to promote the interest of the institution, not in violation of any laws of the state or the United States." This reference to the college powers shows that its authorities have a large discretion, and they are similar to the charter and corporate rights under which colleges and such institutions are generally conducted.

Having in mind such powers, the courts have without exception held to the rule which is well settled in 7 Cyc. 288: "A college or university may prescribe requirements for admission and rules for the conduct of its students, and one who enters as a student impliedly agrees to conform to such rules of government." The only limit upon this rule is as to institutions supported in whole or in part by appropriations from the public treasury. In such cases their rules are viewed somewhat more critically; but, since this is a private institution, it is unnecessary to notice further the distinction.

A further consideration of the power of school boards is found in Mechem on Public Officers, § 730, from which we quote: There is no question that the power of school authorities over pupils is not confined to schoolroom or grounds, but to extend to all acts of pupils which are detrimental to the good order and best interest of the school, whether committed in school hours, or while the pupil is on his way to or from school, or after he has returned home. Of course, this rule is not intended to, nor will it be permitted to, interfere with parental control of children in the home, unless the acts forbidden materially affect the conduct and discipline of the school.

There is nothing in the case to show that the college had any contract, business, or other direct relations with the appellant. They owed him no special duty; and, while he may have suffered an injury, yet he does not show that the college is a wrongdoer in a legal or any sense. Nor does he show that, in enacting the rule, they did it unlawfully, or that they exceeded their power, or that there was any conspiracy to do anything unlawful. Their right to enact the rule comes within their charter provision, and that it was a reasonable rule cannot be very well disputed. Assuming that there were no other outside eating houses in Berea, and that there never had been a disorderly one, or one in which intoxicating liquors had been sold, still it would not be an unreasonable rule forbidding students entering or patronizing appellant's establishment. In the first place, the college offers an education to the poorest, and undertakes to offer them the means of a livelihood within the institution while they are pursuing their studies, and at the same time provides board and lodging for a nominal charge. Whatever profit was derived served to still further reduce expenses charged against the pupil. It stands to reason that when the plans of the institution are so prepared, and the support and maintenance of the students are so ordered, there must be the fullest co-operation on the part of all the students, otherwise there will be disappointment, if not failure, in the project. It is also a matter of common knowledge that one of the chief dreads of college authorities is the outbreak of an epidemic, and against which they should take the utmost precaution. These precautions, however, may wholly fail if students carelessly or indiscriminately visit or patronize public or unsanitary eating houses. Too often those operating such places are ignorant of, or indifferent to, even the simplest sanitary requirements. As a safeguard against disease infection from this source, there is sufficient reason for the promulgation of the rule complained of.

But, even if it might be conceded that the rule was an unreasonable one, still appellant Gott is in no position to complain. He was not a student, nor is it shown that he had any children as students in the college. The rule was directed to and intended to control only the student body. For the purposes of this case the school, its officers and students, are a legal entity,—as much so as any family, and, like a father may direct his children, those in charge of boarding schools are well within their rights and powers when they direct their students what to eat and where they may get it, where they may go, and what forms of amusement are forbidden. A case very similar and often quoted is that of People ex rel. Pratt v. Wheaton College, 40 Ill. 186. It illustrates the principles here announced so well that we quote with approval the following from it: "Wheaton College is an incorporated institution, resting upon private endowments, and deriving no aid whatever from the state or from taxation. Its charter gives to the trustees and faculty the power 'to adopt and enforce such rules as may be deemed expedient for the government of the institution,'—a power which they would have possessed without such express grant, because incident to the very object of their incorporation, and indispensable to the successful management of the college. Among the rules they have deemed it expedient to adopt is one forbidding students to become members of secret societies. We perceive nothing unreasonable in the rule itself, since all persons familiar with college life know that the tendency of secret societies is to withdraw students from the control of the faculty and impair to some extent the discipline of the institution. Such may not always be their effect, but such is their general tendency. But, whether the rule be judicious or not, it violates neither good morals nor the law of the land, and is therefore clearly within the power of the college authorities to make and enforce. A discretionary power has been given them to regulate the discipline of their college in such manner as they deem proper; and, so long as their rules violate neither divine nor human law, we have no more authority to interfere than we have to control the domestic discipline of a father in his family. It is urged that the Good Templars are a society established for the promotion of temperance, and incorporated by the legislature, and that any citizen has a right to join it. We do not doubt the beneficent objects of the society, and we admit that any citizen has the right to join it if the society consents. But this right is not of so high and solemn a character that it cannot be surrendered, and the son of the relator did voluntarily surrender it when he became a student of Wheaton College, for he knew, or must be taken to have known, that by the rules of the institution which he was voluntarily entering he would be precluded from joining any secret society. When it is said that a person has a legal right to do certain things, all that the phrase means is that the law does not forbid these things to be done. It does not mean that the law guarantees the right to do them at all possible times and under all possible circumstances. A person in his capacity as a citizen may have the right to do many things which a student of Wheaton College cannot do without incurring the penalty of college laws. A person as a citizen has a legal right to marry, or to walk the streets at midnight, or to board at a public hotel, and yet it would be absurd to say that a college cannot forbid its students to do any of these things. So a citizen, as such, can attend church on Sunday or not, as he may think proper, but it could hardly be contended that a college would not have the right to make attendance upon religious services a condition of remaining within its walls. The son of the relator has an undoubted legal right to join either Wheaton College or the Good Templars, and they have both an undoubted right to expel him if he refuses to abide by such regulations as they establish, not inconsistent with law or good morals."

There is no similarity between this and the case of Standard Oil Co. v. Doyle, 118 Ky. 662, 111 Am. St. Rep. 331, 82 S. W. 271, and many others of like import relied upon by appellant. These all relate to unlawful combinations and conspiracies between trading corporations or between individuals in trade, together with the use of unlawful and fraudulent measures in restraint of trade and to throttle competition. Of course, trading corporations have no such wide latitude or discretion in the scope and character of rules and by-laws they may adopt or enforce in conducting their business. They are limited and controlled both by statute and common law. But the mere fact that one's trade has been restrained, as Gott's admittedly has, gives him no ground to invoke the law, unless the means used to restrain it have been malicious and wrongful. And, as above indicated, the proof shows neither malice nor wrong on the part of appellee.

Considering the whole case, the judgment of the lower court is affirmed.

MICHIGAN SUPREME COURT.

MASSACHUSETTS MUTUAL LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY et al.

v.

BOARD OF TRUSTEES OF THE MICHIGAN ASYLUM FOR THE INSANE.

(— Mich. —, 144 N. W. 538.)

Evidence — records of public insane asylum — privilege.

The records of a public insane asylum containing information concerning the Note. — Privilege of records of insane asylum.

As to whether hospital records are within the privilege extended to communications between physician and patient, see note to Smart v. Kansas City, 14 L.R.A.(N.S.) 565.

Concerning privilege as to information acquired by autopsy, see note to Thomas v. Byron Twp. 38 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1186.

The question whether the records of an insane hospital constitute privileged commental and physical condition of a patient, which has been obtained by physicians in their professional character for the purpose of determining the proper treatment, are privileged, and are not open to inspection as public records.

PETITION for a writ of mandamus to compel respondents to permit relators to inspect the records of the Michigan Asylum for the Insane for the purpose of determining the mental and physical condition of Vernon J. Willey, whose administratrix and next of kin intervene in opposition to the granting of the writ. Denied.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. H. E. Spalding, for relators:

The records of the state asylum at Kalamazoo are made and kept by officers and employees of the state in the discharge of official duties. As public records they are open to the inspection of the public under the terms of act No. 76 of 1903.

Aside from the statute, the relators, as parties to the suit in the Wayne circuit court, have the right at common law to inspect the records for the purpose of obtaining information to enable them properly to prepare for the trial of such suit.

communications between physician and patient appears to be one upon which there is little authority.

In a comparatively recent case, Liske v. Liske, 135 N. Y. Supp. 176, however, a view not altogether in accord with the result reached in MASSACHUSETTS MUT. L. INS. CO. v. MICHIGAN ASYLUM, was taken. The records of the asylum were not open to inspection as public records.

Mr. Edwin H. Lyon, with Mr. Charles H. Chase, for interveners:

Plaintiff is not entitled to inspect and examine the records, because the resolution of the board shows "that the information contained in such records was obtained by physicians in their professional character, and was necessary to enable them to prescribe for said Vernon J. Willey.

Moore, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a petition for a writ of mandamus to compel the board of trustees of the Michigan Asylum for the Insane, at Kalamazoo, to permit the relators to inspect the records of the asylum containing information concerning the mental and physical condition of one Vernon J. Willey, who was a patient in the asylum from July, 1910, until his death in December, 1912.

On August 6, 1910, relators began a suit in the circuit court for the county of Wayne, in chancery, against Vernon J. Willey and others, for the cancelation of certain policies of life insurance which had been issued by the insurance company, one of the relators, to Willey in April, 1910, and in which the other defendants and Willey's estate were named as beneficiaries. After the commencement of the suit, Willey died, and the suit is now pending against his administratrix and the other defendants.

It is the claim of the complainants in said suit that the issuance of the policies was induced by certain false and fraudulent representations by Willey in his application for insurance that he was in good physical condition, when he was in fact suffering from general paresis. In July, 1910, a few months after the issuance of the policies, Willey was admitted to the Michigan Asylum for the Insane, at Kalamazoo, and remained there until his death in December, 1912.

It is claimed that the information sought condition of patients, and made it incumbent upon those in charge of asylums to "make or cause to be made entries from time to time of the mental state, bodily condition, and medical treatment of such patient during the time such patient remains under his care;" it also provided that on the hearing of writs of habeas corpus brought by insane persons, the medical history of the patient as it appeared in the case book should be given in evidence, and the superintendent or medical officer in charge of the institution should be sworn touching the patient's mental condition. It was held that the relation of physician and patient, as contemplated by § 834 of the Code, did not exist between an inmate of an insane asylum and the hospital physicians, and that the latter's testimony was admissible in an action to annul the inmate's marriage on the ground of insanity. The court said: "The public policy of the state demands the maintenance of such institutions and the care and treatment of the inmates, which necessarily involve their medical examination. I do not think that the relation arising by operation of law between a patient committed by legal process to a state institution for the insane and the official physicians in charge thereof is within the professional relation contemplated by § 834 of the Code of Civil Procedure, or that such section was designed to exclude the testimony of such official physicians, whose duty it is, under the police power of the state, to make physical examinations of irresponsible patients. The purpose of the protection being here absent, the legislative enactments as to the duties of medical officers in the state institutions for the insane, and as to the making of public records relative to their condition, indicate that the testimony objected to was properly admitted."

In the return of the respondents is the following:

"Respondent admits that relators made application to the board of trustees on the 18th day of July, 1913, for permission to inspect the records of said asylum showing the condition of said Vernon J. Willey for the purposes set forth, and admit that on the 5th day of August, 1913, the respondent board denied such request; that the following is the action taken by said respondent: 'The communication of Messrs. Walker and Spaulding, of Detroit, under date of August 18, 1913, asking that they be permitted to inspect the records of this institution in order that they, as attorneys for the Massachusetts Mutual Life Insurance Company, may secure information to be used in a suit now pending against the heirs of Vernon J. Willey to set aside certain life insurance contracts, and the board being advised that the information contained in such records was obtained by physicians in their professional character, and was necessary to enable them to prescribe for said Vernon J. Willey, and that said physicians have once declined to permit an examination of such records or disclose any information so obtained. Resolved, that we hereby approve of the action of the medical staff in refusing an inspection of such records, and declining to disclose any information secured in the manner aforesaid, and the aforesaid request is therefore declined, and the secretary instructed to forward a copy of this resolution to the attorneys for said insurance company.'

"VI. Answering paragraph 6, respondent states and shows unto the court that the said records contain information essential and necessary for the proper care and treatment of the insane patients confined in said asylum, and such records are for the purpose of determining the proper treatment to be given such patients as are inmates of said asylum, and that the records of said asylum with reference to the said Vernon J. Willey were made for the purposes herein enumerated. Said board respectfully denies that such records are public documents, and denies that the relators are entitled to inspect them, and respectfully submit that it is not the duty of the respondent to permit relators to inspect said records for the purposes set forth in said petition, or for any other purpose."

Counsel for relators contend for two propositions: (1) The records of the asylum are open to the inspection of the relators under the terms of act No. 76 of 1903. (2) The relators, as parties to the suit pending in the Wayne circuit court, have the right 51 L.R.A. (N.S.) at common law to inspect the records of the asylum for the purpose of obtaining information necessary to enable them to prepare for the trial of such suit.

We quote from the brief of counsel:

"The records of the state asylum at Kalamazoo are made and kept by officers and employees of the state in the discharge of official duties. As public records they are open to the inspection of the public under the terms of act No. 76 of 1903."

Act No. 76 provides as follows: "The officers having the custody of any county, city, township, town, village, school district, or other public records in this state, shall furnish proper and reasonable facilities for the inspection and examination of the records and files in their respective offices, and for making memoranda or transcripts therefrom, during the usual business hours, to all persons having occasion to make examination of them for any lawful purpose: Provided, that the custodian of said records and files may make such reasonable rules and regulations with reference to the inspection and examination of them as shall be necessary for the protection of said records and files, and to prevent the interference with the regular discharge of the duties of such officer; and provided further, that such officer shall prohibit the use of pen and ink in making copies or notes of records and files."

"Under this act, it was held, in Kalamazoo Gazette Co. v. Kalamazoo County Clerk, 148 Mich. 460, 111 N. W. 1070, that records of marriage licenses and returns showing marriages in the office of the county clerk are public records, and open to the inspection of those who have occasion to inspect them. A writ of mandamus was therefore held properly granted by the circuit court, requiring the respondent to permit relator's reporters to examine such records."

Many other cases are cited to this proposition.

The attorney general calls attention to the title of act 76, and suggests that the words "or other public records in the state" must be limited to the public records of those municipalities mentioned in the title, and that the statute does not apply to the records mentioned in relator's petition. The title of the act, so far as it is important, is as follows: "An Act to Facilitate the Inspection of the Records and Files in the Offices of the County, City, Township, Town, Village, and School Districts in This State, Amending § 1 of an Act to Facilitate the Inspection of the Records and Files in the Offices of County, City, and Township Officers in This State."

In reply to this contention, counsel for relators say (we again quote from the brief): "In the view I take of the case it is unnecessary to consider the objection raised with reference to the title of the statute. The reply to the second and important proposition is this: The general and well-settled rule is that all public records are open to the inspection of all persons who show an interest therein, and irrespective of whether the records are such as could be introduced in evidence, and also of whether the matter recorded concerns a single person, a number, or the public at large."

This proposition is urged with much earnestness, and many authorities are cited in favor of it. Some of them are cases directly within the terms of the statute in relation to inspection. Others relate to the common-law right of inspection of public records. None of them are directly in point, though, if no question of privilege was involved in the case, it might be said they were persuasive.

Of the cases cited but three of them relate to the use of records for the purpose of showing physical or mental condition.

In the case of Hempton v. State, 111 Wis. 127, 86 N. W. 596, 12 Am. Crim. Rep. 657, Mr. Hempton was on trial for murder. His defense was that he was insane. He sought to have the records of the Insane Hospital introduced to establish that fact. He was not asserting a privilege; on the contrary, he was waiving it. Clearly not the instant case.

Another case cited is Townsend v. Pepprell, 99 Mass. 40. The patient was not a party to the litigation. It was a contest between the two towns as to where the woman patient was settled while she was insane. No question of privilege was presented.

The third case, and one upon which much stress is laid, is Krapp v. Metropolitan L. Ins. Co. 143 Mich. 369, 114 Am. St. Rep. 651, 106 N. W. 1107. In that case the proofs of death were permitted in evidence because there was a provision in the policy as follows: "The proofs of death shall be evidence of the facts therein stated in behalf of, but not against, the company." The certificate of death was allowed in evidence because it was made under a general law of the state, which in express terms provided: "All certificates of death, local registers, or county records authorized under this act, or certified copies thereof, shall be prima facie evidence in all courts, and for all purposes, of the facts recorded therein." See § 4617, Comp. Laws. Clearly that is not the instant case. We shall refer to this case later.

1909), so far as its provisions are material here, reads: "No person duly authorized to practise physic or surgery shall be allowed to disclose any information which he may have acquired in attending any patient, in his professional character, and which information was necessary to enable him to prescribe for such patient as a physician, or to do any act for him as a surgeon."

This language has frequently been construed by this court. Many of the cases may be found in the note to the compiler's section. The construction has been invariably to preserve the privilege granted by the language of the statute. Similar statutes have also been before this court. See Shinglemeyer v. Wright, 124 Mich. 230, 50 L.R.A. 129, 82 N. W. 887; People v. Pratt, 133 Mich. 125, 67 L.R.A. 923, 94 N. W. 752; Dick v. Supreme Body, I. C. 138 Mich. 372, 101 N. W. 564.

In Thomas v. Byron Twp. 168 Mich. 593, 38 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1186, 134 N. W. 1021, Ann. Cas. 1913C, 686, a physician was allowed to testify to the conditions he found as the result of an autopsy. In the opinion Justice McAlvay, speaking for the court, said: "In a case where a physician has been allowed to testify as to the communications privileged by the statute, Mr. Justice Cooley, speaking for the court, said: 'This evidence ought not to be passed over without remark. It is surprising evidence for many reasons. One of these is that the physician had no business to give it. (The statute is cited and quoted.) Every reputable physician must know of the existence of this statute, and he must know from its very terms, as well as from the obvious reasons underlying it, that it is not at his option to disclose professional secrets. A rule is prescribed which he is not to be "allowed" to violate; a privilege is guarded which does not belong to him, but to his patient, and which continues indefinitely, and can be waived by no one but the patient himself.' Storrs v. Scougale, 48 Mich. 387, 12 N. W. 502, and cases cited. . . . From the examination of this witness we conclude, by the questions asked, the answers to which were excluded as privileged, that he had, during the lifetime of the patient, made such an examination of her person, and received such information, as was necessary to diagnose her case and prescribe for her, and also that he had disclosed to defendant's attorney such facts. We must conclude from the record that, on account of this relation which existed between the witness and deceased, it was possible for him to proceed within a few hours after her death to hold an autopsy."

It will be noticed that the statute goes farther than to forbid giving testimony.

Its language is: "No person duly authorized to practise physic or surgery shall be allowed to disclose any information," etc.

In Davis v. Supreme Lodge, K. H. 165 N. Y. 159, 58 N. E. 891, in discussing the question of privilege, it was said: "The defendants's counsel then produced the records of the board of health of Brooklyn, which were identified by the clerk of the department, and offered to prove by the original certificate filed therein by the attending physician the cause of death of the deceased member's two aunts above referred to by the certificate of the respective attending physicians on the occasion of their last illness. The court inquired if the evidence was offered to prove the cause of death, and the defendant's counsel replied that it was. The court thereupon excluded the record, and the defendant's counsel excepted. Thus it will be seen that the question involved in this exception was the right of the defendant's counsel to prove by the certificate of the physician in attendance during the last illness of the deceased's aunts the cause of death or the particular disease from which they died. It was admitted that the physician had no knowledge on that subject except such as he acquired in his professional capacity and when the relation of physician and patient existed. That testimony of this character is expressly prohibited by § 834 of the Code cannot be denied. That the proof offered and excluded was inadmissible, I may assume to be a proposition too clear for argument, unless the prohibition contained in the section of the Code referred to has been repealed. This court has held that the statements of the attending physician, for the purpose of establishing the cause of death either of the insured himself or of his ancestors or their descendants, although not parties to nor beneficiaries under the contract, were not admissible. They are excluded, not only for the purpose of protecting parties from the disclosure of information imparted in the confidence that must necessarily exist between physician and patient, but on grounds of public policy as well. The disclosure by a physician, whether voluntary or involuntary, of the secrets acquired by him while attending upon a patient in his professional capacity, naturally shocks our sense of decency and propriety, and this is one reason why the law forbids it. The form in which the statements are sought to be introduced is of no consequence, whether as a witness on the stand or through the medium of an affidavit or certificate. All are equally under the ban of the statute. Grattan v. Metropolitan L. Ins. Co. 80 N. Y. 281, 36 Am. Rep. 617; Renihan v. Dennin, 103

N. Y. 573, 57 Am. Rep. 770, 9 N. E. 320; Redmond v. Industrial Ben. Asso. 150 N. Y. 167-172, 44 N. E. 769; Westover v. Ætna L. Ins. Co. 99 N. Y. 56, 52 Am. Rep. 1, 1 N. E. 104; Nelson v. Oneida, 156 N. Y. 219, 66 Am. St. Rep. 556, 50 N. E. 802; Buffalo Loan, Trust & S. D. Co. v. Knights Templar & M. Mut. Aid Asso. 12 N. Y. 450, 22 Am. St. Rep. 839, 27 N. E. 942. . . . But the contention of the learned counsel for the defendant is, as of course it must be, that the prohibition contained in § 834 of the Code, as construed by these adjudications, has been repealed, not by any amendment to the Code, or by any general law, but by an obscure provision of the charter of the city of New York. . . . It is by the use of this latter vague expression, found among numerous provisions in a local and special law enacted solely for the government of a city, that a general rule of evidence, which is part of the Code of Civil Procedure, and which has been in force in some form for more than half a century, has been repealed, if at all. This is really what the contention of the learned counsel for the defendant amounts to, and, unless it can be successfully maintained, it is clear that the evidence offered was properly excluded. It should be noted, also, that it was not offered to prove the fact of death, since there was no issue on that question, but solely to prove the cause of death, and that, too, not in any local matter over which the health department had jurisdiction, but in a controversy concerning the enforcement of a contract obligation between private parties in a court of general jurisdiction. This local statute, when reasonably and properly construed and understood, and limited to the purpose for which it was enacted, does not, in my opinion, abolish any part of the Code, or affect any general rule of evidence applicable throughout the state at the time of its enactment."

Counsel for relator says that in the Krapp Case, 143 Mich. 369, 114 Am. St. Rep. 651, 106 N. W. 1107, this court considered the above case, and expressly declined to follow it. If reference is made to the opinion in the Krapp Case, it will appear that the Davis Case was distinguished from the one then under consideration, for the reason that the record offered in evidence was not made under a general law of the state, but under the provisions of a city charter. It could well be said that it was not in point in the Krapp Case, for the reasons stated in the opinion; while it is quite as certain that it is in point in the case we are now considering, for the reason that the records which it is sought to reach here are not kept under any general law of the state, nor does any statute make them "prima facie evidence in all courts, and for all purposes of the facts recorded 'herein.'

In Sovereign Camp, W. W. v. Grandon, 64 Neb. 39, 89 N. W. 448, where it was sought to use a record made under the provisions of an ordinance, the court said: "There is another reason which, in our opinion, makes it incompetent. If signed by a physician, it contains matter relating to his patient which the physician is not allowed to disclose as a witness upon the trial against the objection of his patient or those representing him. That a record of this character, reciting privileged communications, may be used in evidence against a party where the testimony of the physician making it could not be received is a proposition so inconsistent with reason and natural rules of justice that we cannot give our consent thereto. The court properly refused to allow the certificate in evidence." See also Buffalo Loan, Trust & S. D. Co. v. Knights Templar & M. Mut. Aid Asso. 126 N. Y. 450, 458, 22 Am. St. Rep. 839, 27 N. E. 942.

In this connection the language used in Smart v. Kansas City, 208 Mo. 162, 14 L.R.A.(N.S.) 565, 123 Am. St. Rep. 415, 105 S. W. 709, 13 Ann. Cas. 932, is germane. The records of a city hospital kept in accordance with the ordinances of the city were sought to be introduced in evidence in the trial court, upon the ground that they were public records, but were excluded. In affirming the case, the court said: "The defendant's next contention is that the court erred in excluding the evidence of Dr. Frederick. He was one of the attending physicians at the City Hospital, and was the keeper of and had charge of the records of the institution, which were required to be kept by the ordinances of the city. The defendant offered to prove by him the diagnosis of plaintiff's case, as shown by said official record, when she was in the hospital in the years 1895, 1896, and 1898,—the latter when her leg was amputated. The plaintiff objected to the evidence offered, because the entries made were privileged communications, first made to the attending physicians in order that they might correctly diagnose her case and properly treat her. The diagnosis of the case was made by an examination of the patient and by interrogating her regarding the complaint. This is necessary to be known by the physician in order that he may prescribe the proper treatment, and when he once acquires that information the law declares it to be confidential communications, and disqualifies the physician from divulging the same upon the witness stand. . . . This is undoubtedly the rule as announced by all the authorities; and, that being so, 51 L.R.A.(N.S.) it seems that it must follow as a natural sequence that, when the physician subsequently copies that privileged communication upon the record of the hospital, it still remains privileged. If that is not true, then the law which prevents the hospital physician from testifying to such matters could be violated both in letter and spirit, and the statute nullified, by the physician copying into the record all the information acquired by him from his patient, and then offer or permit the record to be offered in evidence containing the diagnosis, and thereby accomplish, by indirection, that which is expressly prohibited in a direct manner."

In Price v. Standard Life & Acci. Ins. Co. 90 Minn. 264, 95 N. W. 118, it was said: "At the trial an objection was made and overruled to the introduction in evidence by the defendant of the register of patients kept at the Northwestern Hospital, with the entries therein relating to the insured. These entries were made by the superintendent in charge, who was a female physician, in the usual course of business at the hospital, and showed when the patient entered, when he departed therefrom, and the nature of the disease from which he was said to be suffering. This superintendent produced the register, and testified that the entries concerning the insured were made after Dr. Kimball, the physician in charge, had observed the case long enough and knew sufficiently about the patient to state the kind of disease, and were based wholly upon information received by her from the doctor. The witness had no personal knowledge of the patient, and had no recollection of the case, apart from the record. Therefore the entries amounted to nothing more or less than what the superintendent wrote in the register what the attending physician told or reported to her concerning Price's illness. To permit these entries to be introduced in evidence was to disregard in a very noticeable manner the rule forbidding the introduction of hearsay testimony, as well as the spirit of the statute which prohibits the examination of a physician as to certain matters without the consent of his patient (Gen. Stat. 1894, § 5662), although this last objection does not appear to have been made at the trial. The information communicated by Dr. Kimball to the superintendent of the hospital was acquired by the former while attending the patient, and was necessary to enable him to prescribe or act for him. Dr. Kimball would not have been allowed to make any such disclosure, and the statutory restriction upon him could not be evaded by introducing in evidence testimony of a third party as to what the doctor said about the case. But the entries did not even rise to the dignity of a repetition of what the doctor said to a third party, for the superintendent remembered nothing, except that she made the entries. This testimony should have been excluded."

We are constrained to hold the action of the trustees is justified.

The writ is denied, but without costs.

MICHIGAN SUPREME COURT.

AMEL STOLL, by Next Friend,

v.

ARLAND HAWKS, Plff. in Err.

(— Mich. —, 146 N. W. 229.)

Infant — time for rescinding contract for fraud.

An infant need not wait until arriving at majority before rescinding a purchase of personal property for fraud of the seller.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for St. Joseph County to review a judgment in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover the purchase price of a horse sold by defendant to plaintiff. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Alfred S. Frost and E. Frost, for plaintiff in error:

An infant has no authority under the law of Michigan to affirm or rescind a voidable contract while the infancy continues.

Armitage v. Wideo, 36 Mich. 124; Dunton v. Brown, 31 Mich. 182; Lansing v. Michigan C. R. Co. 126 Mich. 666, 86 Am. St. Rep. 567, 86 N. W. 147; Minock v. Shortridge, 21 Mich. 304.

Herman Stoll could not act as agent for his son, for he was an infant, and could not

Note. — Right of infant to disaffirm contract or conveyance before majority.

I. Introduction, 28.

II. Contracts relating to person or personal property of infant, 28.

III. Contracts relating to real property of infant.

a. Executory contracts, 31.

b. Executed contracts.

1. Deeds, 31.

2. Leases, 32.

3. Mortgages, 32.

I. Introduction.

As to the right of an infant to rescind sale of corporate stock, generally, see note to Wuller v. Chuse Grocery Co. 28 L.R.A. (N.S.) 128.

"The deed, mortgage, etc., of an infant being voidable only, and not void, holds good until some act has been done by the infant to avoid it." 22 Cyc. 554. The question under annotation is whether the contract or conveyance can be avoided during infancy.

This note, being limited to a discussion of the time of disaffirmance, is not concerned with the general question as to what contracts may be disaffirmed. Therefore, general statements concerning the right of disaffirmance at a particular time are intended to be construed merely as rules relating to the time of disaffirmance of such contracts as may be disaffirmed.

Cases recognizing the right of disaffirmance during minority, but not raising that point specifically, are not included in this note.

It is reasonable that the lack of discretion which renders most of an infant's contracts voidable will also prevent the disaffirmance of such contracts before the discretion of majority is attained. This gen- 51 L.R.A. (N.S.)

eral rule has, of course, always been subject to the exception that an infant must be permitted to disaffirm his contracts before majority where the postponement of disaffirmance might result in irreparable loss to him. And, as an infant is always liable to sustain such loss where he has parted, or is about to part, with anything except real property, the rule has come to be stated that contracts relating to personalty may be disaffirmed during minority, but that contracts relating to realty may not be disaffirmed until majority.

This statement of the rule, however, is somewhat inexact and indefinite. The reason for permission to disaffirm at all during infancy being, as stated above, the prevention of loss to the infant, the law is always concerned with the consideration moving from him, and not that moving from the other party. Hence, it should not be said that contracts relating to personalty may be disaffirmed, and that contracts relating to real property may not be disaffirmed, during minority, but rather that contracts relating to the personalty of the infant may be disaffirmed, and that contracts relating to the realty of the infant may not be disaffirmed. But even such statement is open to the objection of not making a possible distinction between executory and executed conveyances of land.

II. Contracts relating to person or personal property of infant.

Many cases recognize the principle that an infant may repudiate a contract relating to his personalty during minority. Shipman v. Horton, 17 Conn. 481 (sale of goods); Carpenter v. Carpenter, 45 Ind. 142 (exchange of gelding for stallion); Indianapolis Chair Mfg. Co. v. Wilcox, 59 Ind. 429 (purchase of shares of stock); Rice v. Boyer, 108 Ind. 472, 58 Am. Rep.

legally appoint an agent or attorney to act for him.

Armitage v. Widoe, 36 Mich. 124; Mechem, Agencies, § 51; Whitney v. Dutch, 14 Mass. 457, 7 Am. Dec. 229; Lawrence v. McArter, 10 Ohio, 37; Trueblood v. Trueblood, 8 Ind. 195, 65 Am. Dec. 756; Cole v. Pennoyer, 14 Ill. 158; Fonda v. Van Horn, 15 Wend. 631, 30 Am. Dec. 77.

Where there is no responsible principal to whom resort may be had, the law presumes that the person contracting does so upon his own personal responsibility, and intends to bind himself; for in no other way could the contract have any validity.

1 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. 1122.

Messrs. D. L. Akey, B. E. Andrews, and E. H. Andrews, for defendant in error:

An infant stands on the same footing as an adult in respect to his rights to reclaim money on failure of consideration, or because obtained by fraud, or to rescind contracts for good reasons.

1 Parsons, Contr. 5th ed. pp. 294, 322; Stafford v. Roof, 9 Cow. 626; Bool v. Mix, 17 Wend. 120, 31 Am. Dec. 285; Matthewson v. Johnson, Hoffm. Ch. 560; Shipman v. Horton, 17 Conn. 481; Cummings v. Powell, 8 Tex. 80.

Where personal property or executory contracts are involved the infant may avoid at any time. This is to enable him to recover personal property before it is lost, or to avoid immediate consequences of his contracts, while land may be recovered at any time.

16 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. 298,

Moore, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff is an infant. It is his claim that he purchased of defendant, for $180, a horse, which was warranted to be sound and all right, when, in fact, it was

Mon. 113 (sale of land warrant); Adams v. Beall, 67 Md. 53, 1 Am. St. Rep. 379, 8 Atl. 664 (contract of partnership); Cogley v. Cushman, 16 Minn. 397, Gil. 354 (purchase-money mortgage on horses); Betts v. Carroll, 6 Mo. App. 518 (purchase-money mortgage on interest in printing office); Star v. Watkins, 78 Neb. 610, 111 N. W. 363 (note given as purchase price of horse); Heath v. West, 26 N. H. 191 (purchase of horse, and mortgage for purchase price); Chapin v. Shafer, 49 N. Y. 407 (mortgage of horse); Stern v. Meikleham, 56 Hun. 475, 10 N. Y. Supp. 216 (purchase of headgear); Petrie v. Williams, 68 Hun. 589, 23 N. Y. Supp. 237 (contract for services of attorney); Pippen v. Mutual Ben. L. Ins. Co. 130 N. C. 23, 57 L.R.A. 505, 40 S. E. 822 (policy of life insurance); Mathereson v. Davis, 2 Coldw. 443 (dictum); Scott v. Buchanan, 11 Humph. 468 (dictum); Gage v. Menczer, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 144 S. W. 717 (purchase of shares of stock); Price v. Furman, 27 Vt. 268, 65 Am. Dec. 194 (exchange of harness and $5 for mare); Covault v. Nevitt, — Wis. —, 146 N. W. 1115 (employment of janitor); Re Huntenberg, 153 Fed. 768 (exchange of claims for wages and money loaned for grocery store); Newry & E. R. Co. v. Combe, 3 Exch. 565, 5 Eng. Ry. & C. Cas. 633, 18 L. J. Exch. N. S. 325 (purchase of shares of stock).

And, without specifying the limitation of the rule to personal property, the syllabus in Bell v. Swainsboro Fertilizer Co. 12 Ga. App. 81, 76 S. E. 756, says that a contract made by an infant may be disaffirmed during minority.

The infant payee of a note may disaffirm his contract of assignment before attaining majority. Briggs v. McCabe, 27 Ind. 327, 39 Am. Dec. 503.

And an infant who sells a judgment to his attorney may disaffirm his contract during infancy, and recover the amount collected by the attorney on the judgment. Vance v. Calhoun, 77 Ark. 35, 113 Am. St. Rep. 111, 90 S. W. 619.

Under a statute empowering a minor to disaffirm certain contracts "either before his majority or within a reasonable time afterwards," a disaffirmance of a contract for legal services may be made during minority. Spencer v. Collins, 156 Cal. 298, 104 Pac. 320, 20 Ann. Cas. 49.

In Farr v. Sumner, 12 Vt. 28, 36 Am. Dec. 327, it is said, obiter, concerning a minor that "in general, he cannot while an infant, unless in case of evident necessity, disaffirm a contract made by him; as the same want of discretion which prevents him from making a binding contract would prevent him from avoiding one which might be beneficial to him."

This dictum is, however, designated as unsound in Hoyt v. Wilkinson, 57 Vt. 404, where it is held that a note given in purchase of a horse by an infant may be avoided during minority.

In Murphy v. Johnson, 45 Iowa, 57, where an infant was seeking to disaffirm a contract of employment, it is held that neither a statute holding a minor bound by his contracts "unless he disaffirms them within a reasonable time after he attains his majority" nor the common law is authority for the proposition that a minor can disaffirm his contracts during infancy.

This case, however, is overruled on this point by Childs v. Dobbins, 55 Iowa, 205, 7 N. W. 496, in which an infant is permitted to take advantage of his disaffirmance during infancy of a purchase of shrubbery, the language of the court being that "contracts which relate only to the person or blind. After he found out the situation, an effort to compromise having failed, he returned the horse to the defendant, and demanded a return of his money. The defendant claims he never represented the horse to be sound, and that he did not sell to the plaintiff, but to his father.

The testimony was in sharp conflict. Nearly all the questions involved are questions of fact, which were properly submitted to a jury, which found against the contention of defendant.

There is a question of law involved. It is stated by counsel as follows: "If this contract had been made by the infant with the defendant, as the infant claims in his testimony, it would be a voidable contract only, and could be rescinded by the infant after he arrived at the age of twenty-one years, and not before; for an infant has no authority under the law of Michigan to affirm or rescind a voidable contract while the infancy continues. Armitage v. Widoe, 36 Mich. 124, 129; Dunton v. Brown, 31 Mich. 182; Lansing v. Michigan C. R. Co. 126 Mich. 666, 86 Am. St. Rep. 567, 86 N. W. 147; Minock v. Shortridge, 21 Mich. 304."

We think the principle of law that is attempted to be here stated is not applicable to the instant case. The plaintiff is seeking to rescind, not because he is an infant, but because a fraud has been perpetrated upon him.

1 Parsons, Contracts, 9th ed. 368, states the rule to be: "An infant stands on the same footing as an adult in respect to his rights to reclaim money on a failure of consideration, or because obtained by fraud, or to rescind contracts for good cause."

16 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. 298, reads: "But in other transactions, especially where personal property or executory contracts are involved, the infant may avoid at any time. This distinction is for the infant's benefit to enable him to recover personal property before it is lost, or to avoid immediate consequences of his contracts, while land may be recovered at any time."

If the rule was otherwise, it would be pretty safe to perpetrate fraud upon infants in relation to personal property; for, before there could be a disaffirmance after the infant had reached his majority, the fruits of the fraud would be beyond his reach.

Judgment is affirmed.

to personal property may be avoided at any time."

Certain dictum in Boody v. McKenney, 23 Me. 517, is to the effect that a sale of personal property by a minor cannot be disaffirmed during minority.

The court, in Towle v. Dresser, 73 Me. 252, in holding to the contrary, says: "The learned judge who uttered the dictum in Boody v. McKenney, 23 Me. 525, would never have recognized it as an authority or decision of the point. It was purely a dictum, put forth, apparently, on the strength of the case in 7 Cow. 179 [Roof v. Stafford] in a discussion of the decided cases for the purpose of seeing how far the remarks in them were capable of being harmonized."

An infant may disaffirm during minority an agreement to refrain from criminal prosecution. Tucker v. Eastridge, 51 Ind. App. 632, 100 N. E. 113.

An infant's contract for services may be avoided before majority. Aborn v. Janis, 62 Misc. 95, 113 N. Y. Supp. 309; Whitmarsh v. Hall, 3 Denio, 376.

Thus, where an infant who has shipped as mariner in a whale ship abandons the ship before the completion of the voyage, he thus legally disaffirms his contract during his minority, and may maintain an action of quantum meruit for his services. Vent v. Osgood, 19 Pick. 572.

And in Dallas v. Hollingsworth, 3 Ind. 537, an action by an infant for the value of services performed, it is held that he might avoid at any time the contract under which the work was performed and recover 51 L.R.A. (N.S.)

the value of his services, although the payment of wages was conditioned on his remaining in the service a specified time.

And an infant may disaffirm a contract of apprenticeship during his minority. Harney v. Owen, 4 Blackf. 337, 30 Am. Dec. 662.

In a number of cases where infants have been permitted to disaffirm their contracts for services, the specific point under discussion was not raised. Such cases are therefore not within the scope of this note.

In Baker v. Kennett, 54 Mo. 82, it is said: "In cases of sales of land the general doctrine seems now to be that the infant cannot conclusively avoid the conveyance until he arrives at age." Then, without observing the distinction between the sale or conveyance and the purchase of land by an infant, the court proceeds on the theory that the infant purchaser of land cannot disaffirm his contract before majority. While this case is not expressly opposed to the rule permitting a disaffirmance of contracts relating to the personality of the infant, it has that effect. In such a case the infant has parted with personality which he may not be able to recover if he has to wait until majority before he can disaffirm. Where, however, the infant has parted with land, as in case of a sale or conveyance by him, he is in no danger of losing his property by his inability to disaffirm before attaining majority.

On the other hand, in Ex parte McFerren. — Ala. —, 47 L.R.A. (N.S.) 543, 63 So. 159, holding that an infant lessee may disaffirm his lease, the language of the court is so indefinite as to establish a doubt whether the case is put upon the ground of the personal consideration moving from the infant, or upon the ground that all contracts, regardless of the nature of the consideration, may be disaffirmed during minority.

And, in the case of contracts involving the personal property of an infant, there is no distinction between executory and executed contracts, as far as the right of disaffirmance during minority is concerned. Riley v. Mallory, 33 Conn. 201 (purchase of gun); Gonackey v. General Acci. F. & Life Assur. Corp. 6 Ga. App. 381, 65 S. E. 53 (settlement of rights under insurance policy); Wuller v. Chuse Grocery Co. 241 Ill. 398, 28 L.R.A.(N.S.) 128, 132 Am. St. Rep. 216, 89 N. E. 796, 16 Ann. Cas. 522, affirming 147 Ill. App. 224 (purchase of shares of stock); Falconer v. May, S. & Co. 165 Ill. App. 598 (purchase of household furniture); Bailey v. Barnberger, 11 B. Mon. 113 (sale of land warrant).

And it is said, obiter, in McCarthy v. Nicosi, 72 Ala. 332, 47 Am. Rep. 418, that any voidable executed contract relating to personalty may be disaffirmed by an infant during minority.

And dictum in Bool v. Mix, 17 Wend. 120, 31 Am. Dec. 285, is to the effect that "it seems that a sale and manual delivery of chattels by an infant may be avoided while under age."

The reason for the rule is given in Carr v. Clough, 26 N. H. 280, 59 Am. Dec. 345, where it is said: "If the subject of the sale be personal property, and a delivery to, and possession by, the vendee, follows, and there are no legal means to regain the property till the minor arrives at full age, so as to decide whether he will ratify the contract or not, the property may all be wasted and gone beyond recovery, and, in many cases, for a very inadequate consideration. In such cases the principle of protection would be of little use, could it not be exercised before maturity. We lay down the rule, then, that a sale and delivery of personal property by a minor, for a good consideration, but made without fraud by him, may be rescinded by the minor before arriving at full age."

In the celebrated case of Stafford v. Roof, 9 Cow. 626, reversing 7 Cow. 179, in distinguishing between the rule in respect to contracts relating to personalty and those relating to realty, the court says: "The true rule, then, appears to me to be this: that where the infant can enter, and hold the subject of the sale till his legal age, he shall be incapable of avoiding till that time; but where the possession is changed, and there is no legal means to regain and hold it in the meantime, the infant, or his guardian for him, has the right to exercise the power of rescission immediately. Now the common law gives no action or other means by which the mere possession of personal property can be reclaimed and held subject to the right of avoidance."

the general rule permitting contracts relating to the person or personalty of infants to be disaffirmed during minority. However, as all the cases which have yet arisen in that jurisdiction have involved executed contracts, it is not improbable that the general rule will be applied to executory contracts.

In Dunton v. Brown, 31 Mich. 182, it is held that an executed contract of partnership is unavoidable by a minor during infancy.

So, a settlement of a claim for damages for personal injuries to an infant cannot be repudiated during minority. Lansing v. Michigan C. R. Co. 126 Mich. 663, 86 Am. St. Rep. 567, 86 N. W. 147.

And in Armitage v. Widoe, 36 Mich. 124, an action by an infant for the recovery of money paid on a contract of purchase of lands, it is held that an infant cannot disaffirm such a contract before coming of age.

III. Contracts relating to real property of infant.

a. Executory contracts.

While no cases have been discovered involving executory contracts relating to the real property of an infant, it is not improbable that there may be grounds for a distinction between them and executed contracts. A realization of this will, at least, result in a more careful and less general statement of the rule concerning the power of disaffirming contracts relating to real property.

b. Executed contracts.

1. Deeds.

As stated above, this note is concerned only with the nature of the property parted with by the infant. Cases of purchases of real property by an infant, where the consideration parted with by him is personalty, are therefore considered supra, II.

The deed of an infant may not be disaffirmed during his minority. Chapman v. Chapman, 13 Ind. 396; Welch v. Bunce, 83 Ind. 382; Shroyer v. Pittenger, 31 Ind. App. 158, 67 N. E. 475 (dictum); Irvine v. Irvine, 5 Minn. 61, Gil. 44; Shipley v. Bunn, 125 Mo. 445, 28 S. W. 754; Bool v. Mix, 17 Wend. 120, 31 Am. Dec. 285; Matthewson v. Johnson, Hoffm. Ch. 560; Wetmore v. Kissam, 3 Bosw. 321 (dictum); McCormic v. Leggett, 53 N. C. (8 Jones, L.) 425; Scott v. Buchanan, 11 Humph. 468 (dictum); Matherson v. Davis, 2 Coldw. 443 (dictum); Cummings v. Powell, 8 Tex. 80; Sims v. Everhardt, 102 U. S. 300, 26 L. ed. 87 (dictum).

It is not improbable, however, that the infant may enter and take the profits during minority.

In Bool v. Mix, 17 Wend. 120, 31 Am. Dec. 285, it is said, obiter: "The deed of an infant cannot be avoided until he becomes of age, although he may enter and take the profits in the meantime. . . . Some of the old books say that an infant may avoid his deed by entry before he comes of age; but that is not the doctrine of the present day. He may enter while within age and take the profits until the time arrives when he has a legal capacity to affirm or disaffirm the deed; but the deed is not rendered utterly void by the entry; it may still be confirmed after he arrives at full age."

Zouch ex dem. Abbott v. Parsons, 3 Burr. 1794, is to the same effect. It is said: "In the case of feoffments by an infant, he might enter during his minority, to revest his possessory right, for the sake of the profits; but still the feoffment was voidable only, and he might elect to confirm it when he attained his full age."

However, it is said in Harrod v. Myers, 21 Ark. 592, 76 Am. Dec. 409, that the conveyance of an infant "can be revoked by entering upon the land and taking the profits while an infant." The court held that although disaffirmance by subsequent deed would have to be done after majority, equity would aid an infant in canceling her deed during minority.

Without deciding whether or not the deed of an infant can be disaffirmed during minority, it is held, in Philips v. Green, 3 A. K. Marsh, 7, 13 Am. Dec. 124, that no act of disaffirmance during minority is necessary to effect an avoidance of such deed.

Dictum in Lancaster v. Lancaster, 13 Lea, 126, suggests an opinion at variance with the established rule.

And, while it does not appear from the facts in the case that the infant attempted to avoid his deed during minority, it is said, in Doe ex dem. Jackson v. Woodruffe, 7 U. C. Q. B. 332, that a deed of bargain and sale is voidable either before or after the grantor comes of age.

2. Leases.

"The principle upon which it is held that an infant should not be absolutely bound by such a lease, executed during his infancy, but that it is voidable, against him, would also establish that he should not be bound by any act done by him during minority, either in confirmation or avoidance of that lease; but that the power of making his election when he attains full age, and of then avoiding or confirming the lease, as he may think fit, should be preserved to him during the entire of his minority, and that he should not be deprived of such power by an act done by him during that period." (O'Brien, J., in Slator v. Trimble, 14 Ir. C. L. Rep. 342.)

An infant who leases his property cannot avoid his act during minority. Hartshorn v. Earley, 19 U. C. C. P. 139; Lipsett v. Perdue, 18 Ont. Rep. 575.

fee during his minority. Emmons v. Murray, 16 N. H. 385.

But, under a statute providing that "the contract of a minor, if made while he is under the age of eighteen, may be disaffirmed by the minor himself, either before his majority or within one year's time afterwards," a minor may disaffirm before majority both a lease and conveyance of his lands. Ryan v. Morrison, — Okla. —, 135 Pac. 1049.

3. Mortgages.

In Singer Mfg. Co. v. Lamb, 81 Mo. 221, it was held that the mortgage of a minor cannot be disaffirmed by the execution of a deed conveying the same property during minority. In this case the infant, after attaining his majority, executed a quitclaim deed to one holding under a subsequent deed from the grantee in the warranty deed, but subsequently executed a deed to the mortgagee, affirming the mortgage. It was held in effect that the latter deed operated as an affirmation of the mortgage, the quitclaim not having the effect to prevent such affirmation.

Neither can the conveyance of an infant's land by her guardian during her minority amount to a disaffirmance of a prior mortgage executed by the infant. Shreeves v. Caldwell, 135 Mich. 323, 106 Am. St. Rep. 396, 97 N. W. 764, 3 Ann. Cas. 592.

The disaffirmance of a mortgage given by a minor cannot be made by him during infancy. Watson v. Ruderman, 79 Conn. 687, 66 Atl. 515. But the court held that such mortgage may not be made the subject of foreclosure until and unless its status shall have been first established as that of a conveyance not subject to avoidance at the will of the mortgagor. In denying the right of a court of equity to compel the present exercise by or for the infant defendant of his right of affirmation or disaffirmance, the court said: "It follows that, in the absence of other facts than that of an infant's participation in a contract or conveyance, there cannot exist a situation in which, through the operation of an estoppel, validity will be given to it, or through equitable intervention it will be set aside, and thus, by one means or the other, an effect be given to the transaction different from that which the general policy of the law has seen fit to attach to it. In other words, a court, whether of equity or of law, will not hold itself justified in depriving an infant, who was of the age of presumed natural capacity at the time of his participation in a property transaction, of the right of privilege which is deemed essential to his proper protection of affirming or disaffirming it upon his arrival at the age of legal capacity, unless there appears in the situation presented some fact in addition to such participation,—some fact which is recognized as furnishing the basis for equitable interposition generally, or as laying the foundation for an estoppel. The active fraud or false representation as to age by the infant has been recognized as furnishing such a fact."

In Gilchrist v. Ramsey, 27 U. C. Q. B. 500, an action against an infant on a mortgage, it is said: "We cannot see on what principle an infant defendant may not defend an action for the purpose of raising the question of infancy, and thereby avoiding his deed. If, as Lord Mansfield says, the infant could enter during minority to revest his possessory right, for the sake of the profits, after having conveyed away his estate, and let the grantee into possession, we are unable to understand why the infant may not also defend his possession for the sake of the profits, never having given it up. This leaves it apparently, still in his power, on coming of age, to affirm his deed."

In holding that a minor might plead her infancy in defense to an action of foreclosure, the court, in Schneider v. Staihr, 20 Mo. 269, said: "The weight of authority seems to be that, in cases of sales of land, infants cannot conclusively avoid the conveyance until they are of age. . . . As in this instance, the effect of the omission of the wife to plead her infancy would be to subject her estate to be sold under execution, by which an innocent purchaser might be injured, and as this proceeding is in the nature of an action to subject her estate to the payment of a debt, from analogy to the course in a suit on a contract by which an infant is jointly bound with others, we see no impropriety in permitting her to set up her infancy, though under age, in avoidance of this claim against her."

OKLAHOMA SUPREME COURT.

J. W. RIPPY & SON, Plff. in Err.,
v.
ART WALL PAPER MILLS.

Monopoly — purchase from single dealer.

1. An agreement of a retailer to buy a particular line of goods exclusively from a certain manufacturer thereof, for a limited period of time, and confined to a particular locality, in consideration of other covenants therein of mutual advantage to the parties, and when otherwise unobjectionable under the law, is not invalid because in restraint of trade.

Same — theoretical restraint of trade.

2. A contract between individuals, the main purpose and effect of which are to promote, advance, and increase the business of those making it, will not be held to be in restraint of trade and commerce merely because its operation might possibly, in some slight or theoretical way, incidentally and indirectly restrict such trade and commerce.

Evidence — burden of proof — fraud.

3. In a suit for a balance due for goods under the terms of a written contract, where the answer admits the execution of the contract and the receipt of the goods at the price claimed, and defends on the grounds that the contract is illegal and unenforceable, and was procured through fraud, the burden of proof is on the defendant.

Contract — written — negotiations.

4. All prior and contemporaneous oral negotiations are merged into a written contract finally entered into, and which fully covers the subject-matter of such negotiations.

ERROR to the District Court for Oklahoma County to review a judgment in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover the purchase price of certain goods sold and delivered under the terms of a written contract executed by the parties. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the Commissioner's opinion.

Mr. M. Fulton for plaintiff in error.

Mr. E. G. McAdams, for defendant in error:

The contract in question is not in restraint of trade, or in violation of public policy, for the reason that the life of the contract is reasonable, and it nowhere attempts to regulate or fix the price of the goods wherein the public is interested.

Brewer, C., filed the following opinion:

The Art Wall Paper Mills, a corporation of Dallas, Texas, brought this suit in the district court against J. W. Ripy & Son, a copartnership, to recover the purchase price of certain goods, wares, and merchandise sold and delivered in pursuance to a certain written contract executed by the parties. We will hereafter refer to the parties as they were called in the trial court. The case was tried to a jury, and a verdict returned in favor of the plaintiffs. The defendants, plaintiffs in error here, bring up the case on case made, and in their brief seem to rely upon the following alleged errors: First, Overruling defendant's demurrer to the petition. Second, Placing the burden of proof upon the defendant. Third. The exclusion of evidence offered by defendant.

1. The defendants claim that plaintiff's petition is demurrable for the reason that the suit is based upon a certain written contract of trade agreement attached to and made a part of the petition, and which it is alleged shows upon its face that it is an agreement in restraint of trade and commerce, and is therefore void; and that, being void, the plaintiff cannot recover for the goods sold and delivered in pursuance of its terms. The portion of the agreement which it is claimed has the above effect is a provision inserted in it requiring the defendants to handle only the wall papers manufactured and kept for sale by plaintiff during the life of the contract, which was from April 5th to January 5th following. In other words, that the defendants agreed that for the limited period of time named in the contract they would buy all their wall papers from the plaintiff. We do not believe that this agreement has the effect contended for. It is not pointed out, and from a reading of the contract we do not believe it can be pointed out, wherein this contract has the effect of restraining trade, or competition in trade, so as to bring it within the denunciation of the law. The plaintiffs are wholesale dealers in wall paper, and had traveling salesmen in Oklahoma and Indian territory at the time this contract was made, in 1904. The defendants are retail dealers in Oklahoma City. In return for defendant's agreement that for a certain period of time they would buy their wall paper exclusively from plaintiff, and would keep in stock a complete line of the same, the reciprocal agreement was made by plaintiff that its traveling salesmen, in the two territories named, would send their "stock fill in orders" to be filled from defendant's stock, and for which sales they received the profits. If plaintiff was going to give defendants the benefit of certain sales made by its traveling salesmen from samples of its line of papers in stock, it certainly was not unreasonable to require defendants to carry, for the time being, only its line of papers. It seems to us that the effect of this agreement, when all of its terms are considered, is to promote and foster the trade of both parties, rather than otherwise. The contract does not undertake to fix the price at which defendants might sell the goods. It does not restrict the plaintiff from selling its goods to others, nor does it restrict either party from selling goods to any other person or class of persons. The parties themselves are not competitors, nor does the contract affect the competitors of defendants, nor can we see wherein it could injuriously affect the public. We think these views find ample support in the authorities.

An agreement of a retailer to buy a particular line of goods exclusively from a certain manufacturer thereof, for a limited period of time, and confined to a particular locality, in consideration of other covenants therein of mutual advantage to the parties, and when otherwise unobjectionable under the law, is not invalid because in restraint of trade. Threlkeld v. Steward, 24 Okla. 403, 138 Am. St. Rep. 888, 103 Pac. 630; Trentman v. Wahrenburg, 30 Ind. App. 304, 65 N. E. 1057; Brown v. Rounsavell, 78 Ill. 589; Live Stock Asso. v. Levy, 22 Jones & S. 32; Diamond Match Co. v. Roeber, 106 N. Y. 473, 60 Am. Rep. 464, 13 N. E. 419; Olmstead v. Distilling & Cattle-Feeding Co. (C. C.) 77 Fed. 265; Arnold Bros. v. Kreutzer, 67 Iowa, 214, 25 N. W. 138; Kron-schnabel-Smith Co. v. Kronschnabel, 87 Minn. 230, 91 N. W. 892.

A contract between individuals, the main purpose and effect of which are to promote, advance, and increase the business of those making it, will not be held to be in restraint of trade and commerce merely because its operations might possibly, in some slight or theoretical way, incidentally and indirectly restrict such trade and commerce. This view is fully sustained by the Supreme Court of the United States in various decisions. In Anderson v. United States, 171 U. S. 604, 43 L. ed. 300, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 50, it is said: "Where the subject-matter of the agreement does not directly relate to and act upon and embrace interstate commerce, and where the undisputed facts clearly show that the purpose of the agreement was not to regulate, obstruct, or restrain that commerce, but that it was entered into with the object of properly and fairly regulating the transaction of the business in which the parties to the agreement were engaged such agreement will be upheld as not within the statute, where it can be seen that the character and terms of the agreement are well calculated to attain the purpose for which it was formed, and where the effect of its formation and enforcement upon interstate trade or commerce is in any event but indirect and incidental, and not its purpose or object. As is said in Smith v. Alabama, 124 U. S. 465, 473, 31 L. ed. 508, 510, 1 Inters. Com. Rep. 804, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 564: 'There are many cases, however, where the acknowledged powers of a state may be exerted and applied in such a manner as to affect foreign or interstate commerce without being intended to operate as commercial regulations.' The same is true as to certain kinds of agreements entered into between persons engaged in the same business for the direct and bona fide purpose of property and reasonably regulating the conduct of their business among themselves and with the public. If an agreement of that nature, while apt and proper for the purpose thus intended, should possibly, though only indirectly and unintentionally, affect interstate trade or commerce, in that event we think the agreement would be good. Otherwise there is scarcely any agreement among men which has interstate or foreign commerce for its subject that may not remotely be said to, in some obscure way, affect that commerce, and to be therefor void."

In Whitwell v. Continental Tobacco Co. 64 L.R.A. 689, 60 C. C. A. 290, 125 Fed. 454, Judge Sanborn, after discussing contracts and agreements which would constitute a combination or conspiracy in restraint of trade, adds: "If, on the other hand, it promotes, or but incidentally or indirectly restricts, competition, while its main purpose and chief effect are to foster the trade and to increase the business of those who make and operate it, then it is not a contract, combination, or conspiracy in restraint of trade, within the true interpretation of this act, and it is not subject to its denunciation." And cites to support the statement the following authorities: Hopkins v. United States, 171 U. S. 578, 592, 43 L. ed. 290, 296, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 40; Anderson v. United States, 171 U. 2. The court correctly placed the burden of proof upon the defendants. The plaintiff sued for a balance due for goods sold under a contract, setting out the contract and a complete verified statement of account showing debits and credits and balance due. The defendant admitted the execution of the contract, the receipt of the goods, and also referred in the answer to the contract and invoices, but claimed an additional credit of a few dollars. The answer then averred matter tending to avoid liability for payment for the goods received, because of the alleged illegality of the contract and fraud in procuring the same. The plaintiff then in open court conceded the additional credits claimed, and remitted the same. This left the attack upon the validity of an admitted contract as the only issue. The defendants had the burden of proof upon them to sustain the issues thus tendered.

3. The evidence which it is contended the court erred in refusing to admit was intended to cover several different contentions. It is only referred to in the brief by general statements of counsel in the main, and is not brought into the brief. We have gone into the record, however, and made some search, and find that the real complaint is in the rejection of oral evidence clearly intended to either vary, modify, contradict, enlarge or destroy the plain and unambiguous meaning of the written contract. For instance, evidence was offered and refused that during the prior and contemporaneous negotiations terminating in the written contract, it was agreed that plaintiff would not sell its goods to any other dealer in Oklahoma and Indian territory; there was no hint of such an agreement in the writing which the parties formally executed, and it very fully defined the rights and duties of both parties. The expressed purpose of the evidence was to so ingraft by oral evidence onto a written contract, legal and valid and in no sense immoral or against public policy, a new and 51 L.R.A. (N.S.)

foreign meaning, so as to render the contract when so enlarged invalid as against public policy, to the end that the law would then strike down the contract when so enlarged, affording defendants a means of escape from liability. This evidence was properly rejected, and the same may be said of the rulings on the other rejected evidence.

The jury passed on the evidence, and its verdict was approved by the trial court. To our minds the verdict was right.

The cause should be affirmed.

ELMER PERRY ADAMS, Appt.,
v.

F. C. BROSIUS, Respt.

(— Or. —, 139 Pac. 729.)

Damages — mental suffering — physician's breach of contract.

Mental suffering by a man because a physician whom he has employed to attend his sick wife delays upon the way, and thereby fails to minister to her suffering, is not an element of damages to be recovered for breach of the contract.

A PPEAL by plaintiff from an order of the Circuit Court for Hood River County sustaining a demurrer to the complaint in an action brought to recover damages for mental anguish claimed to have been suffered by plaintiff because of an alleged breach of contract for professional services to his wife. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. John F. Logan, Isham N. Smith, and John H. Stevenson, for appellant:

A party whose contracted right has been invaded has a right to the recovery of damages for mental suffering caused by the breach of contract and wilful tort.

Note. — Mental suffering as element of damages in action against physician or surgeon.

In Smith v. Overby, 30 Ga. 241, the court recognizes that mental suffering of the mother is a proper element of compensatory damages for malpractice resulting in the death of a child at birth.

In Lathrope v. Flood, 6 Cal. Unrep. 637, 63 Pac. 1007, an action for abandonment of a patient during childbirth, the jury was allowed to consider mental suffering and humiliation in connection with the physical injury and suffering occasioned by such abandonment. The case was, however, reversed on rehearing because the instructions permitted the jury to consider the death of the child in assessing the damages, for which there was no warrant in the pleadings or evidence. 135 Cal. 458, 57 L.R.A. 215, 67 Pac. 683.

In Manser v. Collins, 69 Kan. 290, 76 Pac. 851, mental suffering is recognized as an element of damages only when it is connected with physical pain, the court saying: "Where mental suffering is an element of physical pain, or a consequence of it, damages for it may be recovered. Mental suffering, however, resulting from the injury, which arises in the mind, but is not a part of the pain naturally attendant upon, and connected with, the injury, cannot be regarded as an element of damage."

In Dorris v. Warford, 124 Ky. 768, 9 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1090, 100 S. W. 312, 14 Ann. Cas. 602, the proper rule for determining the amount of recovery by a young woman for negligence in treating her broken arm, whereby it became crooked, is stated to be reasonable compensation for the bodily pain and mental suffering endured by her and the permanent impairment of her ability to earn money, due to defendant's negligence. The opinion does not make it clear whether mental suffering resulting from the fact that the arm was deformed could be considered, but apparently the court did not intend to include such mental suffering.

In Coombs v. King, 107 Me. 376, 78 Atl. 468, Ann. Cas. 1912C, 1121, 3 N. C. C. A. 167, plaintiff was permitted to recover for "mental chagrin, mortification, and discomfort at her disfigurement," resulting from a burn received while under X-ray treatment.

In Hyatt v. Adams, 16 Mich. 180, it is held that the right of action for mental suffering is restricted to the person who receives the injury, and a husband is not entitled to recover for his own mental suffering resulting from the suffering of his wife before her death, due to defendant's malpractice, nor for his mental suffering resulting from her death, which was due to such malpractice. McNary, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action to recover from defendant a judgment of $50,000, for mental anguish claimed to have been suffered by plaintiff on account of an alleged breach of contract for professional services affecting the wife of plaintiff. As this appeal is from an order sustaining a demurrer to the complaint for insufficiency, we deem it politic to set out the complaint in hæc verba.

"At and during all the periods of time named herein, the defendant, F. C. Brosius, was then and now is a physician and surgeon authorized and licensed to practise his profession within the state of Oregon, and was and is now engaged in the practice of his profession, and held himself out to be competent and faithful in his treatment of physical and bodily ailments, and skilful in the administration of his profession and in waiting upon his patients. During all the times herein named and up to the death of Alida Lucinda

Adams, the said Alida Lucinda Adams was the wife of this plaintiff, Elmer Perry Adams, and that the plaintiff and his wife resided at Parkdale, Oregon. That the defendant was engaged in the practice of his profession at Hood River, Oregon, and in and throughout the adjacent vicinity and adjoining country, and that Parkdale, Oregon, was embraced within the territory in and through which the said defendant practised his profession, and the said Parkdale, Oregon, is distant from Hood River, Oregon, approximately 22 miles. About March 5, 1912, the above-named Alida Lucinda Adams met with a mishap or accident, in and by which a miscarriage was produced, and that at said time the said Alida Lucinda Adams was pregnant. Thereafter and on March 6, 1912, this plaintiff employed the defendant, F. C. Brosius, in his capacity as physician, to wait upon, attend, and care for his said wife, and on said day at about the hour of 4 o'clock P. M. the said defendant entered into and accepted the employment as physician aforesaid.

"By virtue of his employment it was necessary for said defendant to travel from Hood River, Oregon, to Parkdale, Oregon, and the said defendant entered upon the journey, traveled 16 miles by 8 o'clock P. M. of March 6, 1912, and thereupon failed, neglected, and refused further to pursue his journey on said day. At said time the said defendant was made acquainted with the condition of the said Alida Lucinda Adams, and of the necessity for prompt and immediate medical attention to be administered to her, and with such knowledge wilfully, negligently, and recklessly, in disregard of his duty as physician, failed, neglected, and refused further to pursue his journey on said night. That at the times the said defendant so failed, neglected, and refused to continue his journey to the home of this plaintiff, the said defendant was within one to two hours' travel thereof. That such failure, refusal, and neglect of the said defendant to so pursue his journey and discharge the contract with this plaintiff was without cause, reason, or provocation. After the defendant entered in the employ of the plaintiff, the plaintiff, relying thereon, failed to employ any other or further medical attendant, or provide any other or different medical assistance than that upon which this plaintiff relied should be furnished by the defendant, F. C. Brosius, until the period of time, hereafter stated, when the plaintiff was informed that the defendant refused further to pursue his journey and discharge his duty as physician. About 9 o'clock P. M. of March 6, 1912, this plaintiff was informed that the said defendant, F. C. Brosius, had discontinued his journey, and had refused further to pursue his journey that night, and thereupon this plaintiff endeavored to procure the attendance of another physician to wait upon his wife, and that, by reason of the lateness of the hour and the remoteness of the residence of this plaintiff, and the difficulty of telephonic or other communication at such late hour of night, that this plaintiff was unable to procure any other physician or any additional or other medical help or attendance until about the hour of 2 o'clock A. M. of March 7, 1912, at which time the plaintiff succeeded in procuring another and different medical attendant and physician, to wit, Dr. Kana-ga, of Hood River, Oregon, who thereupon started from Hood River to Parkdale and arrived there at 6 o'clock A. M. of March 7, 1912. At the time of so procuring such other physician, the above-named Alida Lucinda Adams was then in a sinking condition, and, by reason of the extremely dangerous character of her affliction, medical attendance was then ineffectual, and the said Alida Lucinda Adams gradually sank to her death. In and by reason of the negligence, carelessness, and recklessness of the above-named defendant, F. C. Brosius, as above set forth, plaintiff has been caused to suffer, now suffers, and will hereafter suffer, grievous mental, physical, and nervous pain and anguish. The matters and things herein complained of were not occasioned through any fault or neglect on the part of this plaintiff, but have been caused solely through the recklessness, negligence, and carelessness of the said defendant. In and by the matters and things herein alleged and set forth, this plaintiff has been injured to his damage in the sum of $50,000."

It is noticeable that the complaint is not based upon the claim that defendant's breach of contract was responsible for, or in any wise contributed to, the physical injury of plaintiff's wife; nor that the observance of the contract of employment on the part of defendant would have ameliorated the sufferings of the wife; nor have prolonged her life. Likewise, there is no charge made that defendant's presence at the bedside of plaintiff's wife would have prevented or even delayed her death.

The pleading proceeds upon the theory that defendant's nonobservance of the contract caused plaintiff to suffer grievous mental and physical pain and anguish.

The doctrine that mental suffering accompanying personal injury or physical pain is always the subject of compensation is so firmly implanted in the jurisprudence of the several states of the Union as to become a legal maxim. In most cases, however, the mental anguish should be connected with the bodily injury, and be fairly and reasonably the natural consequence that flows from it, and damages for prospective mental anguish are not recoverable, as being too speculative. 13 Cyc. 41; Maynard v. Oregon R. & Nav. Co. 46 Or. 15, 68 L.R.A. 477, 78 Pac. 983.

With much conviction, counsel for plaintiff press upon our consideration the case of Larson v. Chase, 47 Minn. 310, 14 L.R.A. 85, 28 Am. St. Rep. 370, 50 N. W. 239, wherein that distinguished jurist Mr. Justice Mitchell said: "It is also elementary that, while the law as a general rule only gives compensation for actual injury, yet, whenever the breach of a contract or the invasion of a legal right is established, the law infers some damage, and, if no evidence is given of any particular amount of loss, it declares the right by awarding nominal damages. . . . Where the wrongful act constitutes an infringement on a legal right, mental suffering may be recovered for, if it is the direct, proximate, and natural result of the wrongful act."

Giving way to the correctness of the doctrine, the naked fact remains that plaintiff's declaration does not contain matters coming within the sweep of this principle, for plaintiff's mental suffering was not the direct, proximate, and natural result of defendant's nonobservance of the contract. On the contrary, it was but a sympathetic reflection of his wife's anguish and distress, superinduced by his natural devotion and sympathy for her. The direct and proximate result of the breach of the contract was the suffering and mental anguish of the wife, and the physical injury which she may have sustained by reason of the omission of the contractual duties upon the part of defendant.

Distressing as the situation must have been to plaintiff, it is impossible to see upon what rule of law he can claim damages for injury to his feelings. His mental anguish could only be from alarm and sympathy for his wife's sufferings; she was the direct sufferer, which caused him anxiety and concern. We think the sympathetic mental sufferings of plaintiff on account of the suffering and pain of the wife, caused by defendant's failure to observe his professional contract, are too remote and consequential to be actionable. Indeed, it is the person who suffers the injuries proximately resulting from the wrong done, and such person alone, who is entitled to compensation, except in cases where death results and the cause of action is made to survive to relatives or personal representatives by virtue of the statute. Had death not claimed her for its victim, plaintiff's wife possibly could have maintained 51 L.R.A.(N.S.) an action against defendant for the mental anguish and physical pain, if any, which she sustained as a result of the broken contract, but for plaintiff no action is maintainable for purely mental distress. Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Stratemeier, 6 Ind. App. 125, 32 N. E. 871; Long v. Morrison, 14 Ind. 595, 596, 77 Am. Dec. 72; Black v. Carrollton, 10 La. Ann. 33, 63 Am. Dec. 586; Wyman v. Leavitt, 71 Me. 227, 36 Am. Rep. 303; Whitney v. Hitchcock, 4 Denio, 461, 463; Cowden v. Wright, 24 Wend. 429, 430, 35 Am. Dec. 633; Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Kelly, 31 Pa. 372, 379; *Oakland R. MINNESOTA SUPREME COURT.

VILLAGE OF MINNEOTA, Respt.,

v.

JACK MARTIN, Appt.

Indictment — pleading village ordinance.

1. In a criminal prosecution for violation of a village ordinance, the complaint is sufficient if it refers to the ordinance by number, chapter, or section, and it is not necessary to introduce the ordinance in evidence.

License — auctioneer — excess of fee.

2. It is not made to appear that a $25 per day license fee for auctioneers, which villages are authorized to impose by chapter 138, Laws of 1905 (Gen. Stat. 1913, § 1269), is so large as to be beyond the scope of legislative discretion.

so high as to be prohibitory in effect, see note to People use of State Bd. of Health v. Wilson, 35 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1074.

"It is well settled that the amount of an occupation tax imposed in the exercise of the police power may include not only the cost of issuing a license, but also a reasonable compensation for the expense of supervision over the licensed occupation. But whenever it is manifest that the amount of such tax imposed in the exercise of the police power is substantially in excess of the reasonable expense of issuing a license and of regulating the occupation to which it pertains, or is virtually prohibitory, the act or ordinance imposing the tax is invalid." 25 Cyc. 611.

"The fact, however, that the city derives a revenue incidentally from the reasonable exercise of the police power in regulating and controlling the business [of auctioneers], is no serious objection to such an ordinance." And "what is a reasonable license fee must depend largely upon the sound discretion of the city council, having reference to all the circumstances and necessities of the case. The general rule is that a reasonable license fee should be intended to cover the expense of issuing it, the services of officers, and other expenses directly or indirectly imposed. . . . But the business of an auctioneer is a lawful and useful one, and there would seem to be no reasonable warrant, from its nature or the expenses that might be directly or indirectly incurred in regulating it, for exacting so large a sum as a license fee, the result of which, it appears, is not to regulate, but to suppress, such business." Mankato v. Fowler, 32 Minn. 364, 20 N. W. 361.

And accordingly, in this case, an ordinance exacting a license fee of $300 as a condition of the issuance of the required license to an auctioneer was held void on the ground that the amount exacted was unauthorized as a tax, and was so unreasonable as a license fee as to render the ordinance invalid as a police regulation. Ibid.

As said in Margolies v. Atlantic City, 67 N. J. L. 82, 50 Atl. 367, "the power to license is a police power, and must be exercised by the imposition of a reasonable fee." And in this case it was held that a license fee of $2,500 for stores selling goods at auction "is so large, and so out of proportion to any lawful purpose to which it could be applied in the use of the police power, that it must unhesitatingly be declared to be unreasonable and illegal;" and that a city ordinance, so far as it exacts such a fee, is illegal and void.

So, in Sipe v. Murphy, 49 Ohio St. 536, 17 L.R.A. 184, 31 N. E. 884, a city ordinance exacting from any person desiring to sell at auction any goods which have been imported into the city for the purpose of being thus sold, a license fee of $25 for each day and part of day he desires so to sell such goods, was held to be unreasonable and invalid, for the reason (among others) that the effect thereof was largely to prohibit, under the name of a license, the sale at auction of goods brought into the city for that purpose, which enter into daily use and consumption, and which would not be excluded by any police regulation as being detrimental to public health, comfort, and convenience.

And a charge of $25 per day for a license for the selling of any stock of goods or merchandise or part thereof at auction has been held to be unreasonable and oppressive, and not authorized by a statutory provision giving power to license for the purpose of regulating business. Stull v. DeMattos, 23 Wash. 71, 51 L.R.A. 892, 62 Pac. 451. The court said: "It may be true, as the respondents argue, that, under an authority to license for the purpose of regulation, the amount proper to be charged as a license fee must be left largely to the discretion of the municipal authorities, and that the fee exacted need not be confined to the mere expense incident to the issuance of the license, but may be made sufficiently large to cover all costs that will be incurred in the oversight of the regulated business by the police officers, and create a fund sufficient to prosecute violators of the regulations imposed, even though incidentally the revenues of the municipality may be increased thereby; and also that it is only when the ordinance is plainly unreasonable and prohibitive in its character that the courts may interfere and pronounce it invalid. But, conceding this, as well as all else that can justly be claimed for the power to regulate the business of selling goods at auction, we think the present ordinance cannot be sustained as a legitimate exercise of that power."

And in Caldwell v. Lincoln, 19 Neb. 569, 27 N. W. 647, involving an ordinance exacting a license fee of $12 per day for not less than ten days, of any person desiring to conduct the business of selling at auction any bankrupt or other stock of goods, wares, or merchandise, the court said: "The business of an auctioneer is a lawful and useful one, and that of selling goods at auction is supposed to be; and an ordinance taxing the business must be so framed as to provide for all persons who desire to engage in the business, either from year to year or temporarily; but it must be in the nature of a tax, and not so oppressive as to prohibit, and must be reasonable, considering the nature of the business or occupation. The ordinance in this case is clearly in conflict with both of these principles, and is void."

But a license tax of $5 per day, required by an ordinance of a city containing not more than 2,000 inhabitants, to be paid for a license for any sale at public auction, has been held not to be so large as to be unreasonable and oppressive. Fretwell v. Troy, 18 Kan. 271.

In this case, the court further said that the mere amount of the license charge, regarded as a municipal tax, did not prove its invalidity. "For, while it may not be true that a city having authority to collect revenue by license may impose any sum, however large, as license, and thus in effect destroy certain kinds of business, yet before, in such a case, an ordinance imposing a license is declared void on account of the amount thereof, it should appear that the necessities of the city do not require so large a revenue, or that there has been an unjustifiable attempt to discriminate against certain kinds of business by casting the whole burden of taxation upon them." Ibid.

And under statutory authority given to a city to license all and every kind of business for purposes of revenue, an ordinance providing for licensing auctioneers, and ex 51 L.R.A. (N.S.)

acting a license charge or tax of $25 per day for selling any stock of goods or part thereof at auction, is a valid exercise of the taxing power, granted without limitation as to the amount of the tax to be imposed, and cannot be held invalid by reason merely of the excessive amount of the tax. Stull v. DeMattos, supra.

Here, again, the court said: "If, however, it be conceded that the courts have power to declare a municipal ordinance levying a license tax on business invalid on the ground that the tax imposed is so oppressive and unreasonable as to amount to confiscation, rather than taxation, they will not determine the question by a mere inspection of the amount of the tax imposed. All presumptions and intendments are in favor of the validity of the tax. It will be presumed, in the absence of a contrary showing, that the municipal authorities acted justly and honestly, and not in disregard of the rights of the citizens or property holders of the municipality; that a necessity for the revenue to be derived from the tax exists; that an equally high rate has been levied upon all business and on all property; and, however large the particular tax complained of may appear to be, it will be presumed to be in harmony with all other taxation, and not an unjust or unreasonable discrimination. In other words, the mere amount of the tax does not prove its invalidity. To determine the amount of revenue required by the needs of the municipality, when not limited by constitutional barriers, is within the sole discretion of the legislative authorities, and the courts have no warrant to interfere with that discretion."

In Decorah v. Dunstan Bros. 38 Iowa, 96, it was held that an ordinance passed under a general power to regulate and license the sale of property by auctioneers, which provided that the fee for a license for the sale of property by auctioneers "shall not exceed $20 for the first day of such license, and $20 per day for each subsequent day included in such license," was not invalid on the ground that it was not definite in the amount required to be paid for the license; nor was it otherwise objectionable, whether it was construed as fixing the fee at $20, or as leaving it for the mayor to determine and fix a less sum where the amount to be sold or other cause should justify it.

The village authority to license is superseded by that given county boards.

Messrs. Gislason & Gislason and James H. Hall, for respondent:

Whether the license fee is a reasonable one must depend largely upon the sound discretion of the governing body of the village, having reference to all the circumstances and necessities of the case.

O'Hara v. Collier, 173 Mich. 611, 139 N. W. 870; Grand Rapids v. Braudy, 105 Mich. 670, 32 L.R.A. 116, 55 Am. St. Rep. 472, 64 N. W. 29; Grand Rapids v. Norman, 110 Mich. 544, 68 N. W. 269; People v. Blom, 120 Mich. 45, 78 N. W. 1015.

The unreasonableness of the fee is not subject to review by the courts, nor is it important whether licenses of this nature produce a revenue to the village or not, and if such an ordinance, so passed, under delegation of power, be oppressive, the remedy lies with the legislature or common council, and not with the courts.

Holt, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The question presented on this appeal is the validity of an ordinance of the village of Minneota requiring an auctioneer to pay a license fee of $25 for each day that he pursued his calling as such within the village. Defendant was convicted of a violation of this ordinance, and appeals from the judgment.

There was no settled case, so that the only record before us is the complaint, finding ings, and judgment. The point is made that, the evidence not being here, the ordinance cannot be considered. This would be true if the law had remained the same as it was when the village was incorporated. But the general village law of 1875 was amended by chapter 145, Gen. Laws of 1885, bringing all villages under its operation, whether formed under general or special laws. The substance of the law, as subsequently amended by chapter 122, Gen. Laws 1889, and applicable here, is found in § 1265, Gen. Stat. 1913, and reads: "It shall be sufficient pleading of the by-laws, rules, or ordinances of a village to refer to the section and number or chapter thereof. They shall have the effect of general laws within the village and need not be given in evidence upon the trial of civil or criminal actions." In other words, the court takes judicial notice of the provisions of the ordinance in this action, and must consider its validity.

The ordinance in question was passed in 1901. The law then conferred precisely the same power upon the village council (§ 1224, Gen. Stat. 1894, being chapter 122, Gen. Laws of 1889) given by chapter 138, Laws of 1905 (Gen. Stat. 1913, § 1269), in respect to restraining or licensing auctioneers, hawkers, and peddlers. The fact that chapter 122, Laws of 1889, was repealed in terms by Rev. Laws, of 1905, does not change the situation, because chapter 138, Laws of 1905, went into effect prior to such repeal. There is no escape from the conclusion that the legislature has authorized a village to impose a license fee of $25 per day on an auctioneer. The law giving the authority, so far as material to the matter in hand, reads: "To restrain or license, regulate and tax auctioneers, hawkers and peddlers; and in all such cases they may fix the price of said license or tax, and prescribe the term of the continuance of such license, and may revoke such license when in the opinion of the village council the good order or public interests of the village require it: Provided, that the council may, in any case where in their opinion the public interests of the citizens of the village require it, refuse to grant any license for the above purposes; and provided, also, that twenty-five [$25] dollars a day shall be construed by the courts of said state as a reasonable price per day for an auctioneer's license issued under the above provision."

We agree with appellant that the court is not bound by the legislative construction of what is a reasonable license fee. If such construction contravenes constitutional guaranties, courts should not hesitate to hold it for naught. Meyer v. Berlandi, 39 Minn. 438, 1 L.R.A. 777, 12 Am. St. Rep. 663, 40 N. W. 513. But it is elementary that courts should not set aside a statute unless satisfied beyond a doubt of its infringement upon some right guaranteed by state or Federal Constitution. That it so does must be made to appear either from evidence or from matters of which courts have judicial notice or knowledge. In this case there is no evidence and no findings of fact which bear on the reasonableness of the fee. Littlefield v. State, 42 Neb. 223, 28 L.R.A. 588, 47 Am. St. Rep. 697, 60 N. W. 724. In State, Trenton Horse R. Co. Prosecutor, v. Trenton, 53 N. J. L. 132, 11 L.R.A. 410, 20 Atl. 1076, it is said: "The judicial power to declare it void can only be exerted when, from the inherent character of the ordinance or from evidence taken showing its operation, it is demonstrated to be unreasonable." An ordinance "will be presumed to be reasonable, unless the contrary appears from the law itself, or is established by proper evidence." Van Hook v. Selma, 70 Ala. 361, 45 Am. Rep. 85.

Although the statute authorizes villages to license and tax auctioneers, we think it plain that in this ordinance is found no attempt to tax, and the legality of the fee must rest on the reasonableness thereof within the scope of a proper exercise of the police power.

It is well settled that upon this last-mentioned basis a license fee may be of sufficient amount to include the expense of issuing the license and the cost of the necessary police surveillance connected with the business or calling licensed. And when the license relates to a vocation or business which the municipality has the power to regulate, the license fee may be sufficiently large to work a restraint. Duluth v. Krupp, 46 Minn. 435, 49 N. W. 235; State v. Jensen, 93 Minn. 88, 100 N. W. 644. While it is true that the legislature may, not under the pretense of regulating and licensing a lawful calling or business, prohibit, it is nevertheless true that frequently individuals must subordinate their rights to a certain extent to the demands of the public welfare. No authority can be found holding an auctioneer not subject to the police power of regulation. People ex rel. Schwab v. Grant, 126 N. Y. 473, 27 N. E. 964, states that "the right to regulate, control, and limit the number of persons employed in such business has been exercised by the legislature as one of its acknowledged police powers, from colonial times to the present, and, I believe has never been questioned." What a regulatory license fee shall be is largely within the legislative discretion. St. Paul v. Colter, 12 Minn. 41, Gil. 16, 90 Am. Dec. 278.

It is insisted that this case is ruled by Mankato v. Fowler, 32 Minn. 364, 20 N. 51 L.R.A. (N.S.)

W. 361, wherein the business of an auctioneer is designated as a lawful and useful one. And in Duluth v. Krupp, supra, the vocation of the auctioneer is conceded to be on a higher plane than that of peddling, which is apt to degenerate into a nuisance if not regulated and restrained. Each occupation is lawful, and may be useful, both to the individual who pursues it and to the community. But we believe both are equally liable to abuse. No doubt, the legislature was convinced thereof, or else such substantial license fee, indicating a purpose to restrain, would never have been authorized. State v. Finch, 78 Minn. 121, 46 L.R.A. 437, 80 N. W. 856. And we may observe that no one about the time of the enactment of this statute could have walked on the main streets of our large cities, especially near railroad depots, without being convinced that the business of auctioneers was fast degenerating into a nuisance, and had become a subject of restraint. In Decorah v. Dunstan Bros. 38 Iowa, 96, an auctioneer's license fee of $20 per day was upheld; but in Ottumwa v. Zekind, 95 Iowa, 622, 29 L.R.A. 734, 58 Am. St. Rep. 447, 64 N. W. 646, a license fee of $25 per day for a transient merchant was held prohibitive, Justice Deemer observing with reference to the first-mentioned case: "The fee charged an auctioneer may well be larger than that imposed upon a transient merchant, on account of the character of the business, and the greater necessity for supervision over the auctioneer. Again, there was no showing that the fee demanded of defendants in that case was an unreasonable one." We cannot say that the business of an auctioneer is not of the kind liable to become inimical to the welfare of the community unless restrained in villages and cities.

Because a yearly license of $300 was held prohibitive and invalid in Mankato v. Fowler, supra, it does not necessarily follow that a per diem license fee of $25 must fall. If an auctioneer could get but a single day's work under the Mankato ordinance, he was compelled to pay $300 to secure it. There it also appeared from the findings that the ordinance was prohibitive, for it was found that no auction had taken place in the year the ordinance was in operation, whereas previously such auctions were frequent. Nor may it be said that a per diem license fee may not properly be much larger than the proportion of a legitimate annual fee. In Re White, 43 Minn. 250, 45 N. W. 232, concerning the validity of a peddler's license of $3 per diem, the court states: "There is a clear distinction between the case of persons who are engaged the whole year in one place, in some permanent business, and that of hawkers and peddlers who are transient, and usually remain only a short time in one place. What might be an excessive fee, estimated by the day, as to the former, might not be so as to the latter. The cost of issuing the license would be the same for the short term as for the long one, and the expense of police supervision (which may undoubtedly be taken into account in fixing the amount of the license fee) may be relatively much greater in the case of a temporary and transient business."

As stated before, we are left in the dark in this case as to the extent to which auctions may be called for in villages like Minneota. It may be that during any one year the village will not afford legitimate opportunity for an auction except for a day or two. Usually the legislature leaves the reasonableness of the fee to the municipality, and when its proper lawmaking body has exercised its discretion as to the amount, courts reluctantly interfere, and only when it is clear that there has been an abuse of discretion. Here the legislature itself has exercised its judgment as to what is a reasonable license fee. We may well assume that the legislators informed themselves of the situation, and did not act merely on such knowledge as courts are charged with possessing. As this case is presented by the record, we are unable to say that it appears beyond reasonable doubt to our minds that this license fee is oppressive, prohibitive, or unreasonable.

We do not think any other question meriting discussion is raised by the appeal.

Judgment affirmed.

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the District Court for Hamilton County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages for injuries sustained through the bite of defendant's dog. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. John A. Whitmore and Hainer, Craft, & Aylsworth for appellant.

Messrs. J. H. Grosvenor and W. A. Prince, for appellee:

The owner or keeper of a dog is responsible for injuries resulting from vicious or mischievous acts of such dog, if it be first established by the evidence that, prior to the infliction of such injuries, such owner or keeper had a knowledge, either actual or constructive, of its mischievous propensities.

Where the plaintiff proves his case with-later cases points out that the natural presumption from the habits of dogs is that they are tame, docile, and harmless both as to persons and property, and that the owner of an animal is bound to take notice of the general propensities of the class to which he belongs, but that he is under no obligation to guard against injuries which he has no reason to expect, on account of some disposition of the individual animal different from the species generally, unless he has actual notice of such disposition. Domm v. Hollenbeck, 259 Ill. 382, 102 N. E. 782. From this the court concludes that the owner or keeper of a domestic animal of a species not inclined to do mischief, such as dogs, is not liable for any injury committed by it to the person of another, unless it be shown that the animal had a mischievous propensity to commit such an injury, and that the owner had notice of it, or that the injury was attributable to some other neglect on his part; but that if the owner of a vicious animal knows its character and disposition to commit injury to mankind, he is liable for all injuries it may inflict.

While it is necessary to prove owner's knowledge of its vicious propensities (Merkle v. Schaeffer, 80 N. J. L. 74, 76 Atl. 326), the proof may be made by evidence of facts and circumstances from which an inference of knowledge arises (Domm v. Hollenbeck, supra).

It has been held that something more must be shown than that he could have learned of the dog's vicious propensities by the exercise of reasonable care. Ibid.

On the other hand, it is held that proof that the dog was of a ferocious nature is sufficient to charge the owner with knowledge that, under some circumstances, the dog would attack persons; in other words, that proof of the savage and ferocious disposition is equivalent to express notice. Holt v. Myers, 47 Ind. App. 121, 93 N. E. 51 L.R.A.(N.S.)

Hamer, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff, Myrl A. Warrick, recovered a judgment against the defendant, William I. Farley, in the district court of Hamilton county, for damages by reason of an injury sustained through the bite of defendant's dog. The defendant appeals.

The defendant objects that the verdict is not sustained by sufficient evidence. This involves a consideration of the disposition of the dog, whether to bite mankind, and 1002, denying rehearing of 47 Ind. App. 118, 93 N. E. 31.

A complaint which alleges that the defendant kept dogs which he knew were accustomed to bite mankind, and that the plaintiff was bitten by one of them, a ferocious and vicious bulldog, is not objectionable because it does not allege that the particular dog was accustomed to bite mankind. Slater v. Sorge, 166 Mich. 173, 131 N. W. 565.

And the owner of a dog is sufficiently put on inquiry to render him chargeable with notice where he had been warned of the dog's vicious propensities, and had been told of its biting a child, even though he did not believe the statement to be true. Halm v. Madison, 65 Wash. 588, 118 Pac. 755.

It is not necessary that the dog's disposition or peculiarity be such as to render it liable and inclined to bite all with whom it comes in contact, it being sufficient if the dog has bitten one person prior to the injury sued for, and the owner has knowledge thereof. Ayers v. Macoughtry, 29 Okla. 399, 37 L.R.A.(N.S.) 865, 117 Pac. 1088.

The keeping of a dog, with knowledge on the part of the owner or his wife that the same had bitten or attempted to bite one or several persons prior to the time of the attack upon the plaintiff is evidence sufficient to support a verdict rendered on an instruction declaring defendant liable if he had notice, either actual or constructive, of the vicious and dangerous character of the dog. Ibid.

Indeed, it is not necessary in an action for personal injury to show that the dog previously had bitten someone to the owner's knowledge, and knowledge of the owner that the disposition of the animal is such that it is likely to commit a similar injury to that complained of is sufficient. Slater v. Sorge and Domm v. Hollenbeck, supra; Holt v. Myers, supra.

whether the defendant knew or had reason to believe that his dog had such a disposition. We have read the evidence. It appears that the defendant owned a bulldog. The plaintiff owned a coach dog. The plaintiff seems to have been standing on the sidewalk in front of a drug store in the city of Aurora and was talking with a gentleman named Elmore. He had with him his coach dog. The daughter of the defendant came along, and the defendant's bulldog was with her. The defendant's dog seems to have attacked the plaintiff's dog, and the plaintiff separated the dogs and put his dog in the drug store. Shortly afterwards the defendant's daughter returned, and she was accompanied by the defendant's dog. Immediately there was a resumption of hostilities between the two dogs. In trying to separate the dogs the plaintiff was severely bitten by the defendant's dog. The defendant set up the defense that his dog was gentle and that he himself had no knowledge of the fact that he was inclined to bite any person. He also claimed that the dog was accustomed to play with his own children and the children of the neighborhood; that he was of a gentle disposition; and there is much testimony tending to show that fact, although it is not claimed that he did not fight other dogs. He would perhaps have been an unnatural bulldog if he had not had some fights with other dogs. It is also claimed that the plaintiff was negligent in the manner in which he handled the dogs when he undertook to separate them, and that his injury occurred because of such negligence in handling and attempting to separate two infuriated fighting dogs then in a fight.

It is to be considered: (1) Whether the defendant's dog had a propensity to bite mankind; and (2) whether the defendant had notice of such propensity.

When a person keeps a dog for the purpose of guarding his property against trespassers or criminals, it is not unreasonable to infer knowledge on his part of the propensity of the dog to attack and bite mankind, and negligence in allowing him to be at large. Ibid.

Though WARRICK v. FARLEY uses the words "accustomed to bite persons," the case would not seem clearly to militate against the rule that knowledge of a custom to bite persons is not necessary, and that it is sufficient if the dog is of such a ferocious nature that it is likely to bite mankind. It will be observed that in the syllabus by the court the question of scienter is so intermingled with the question of contributory negligence that it is by no means clear that the court would have held that knowledge of a custom to bite mankind was essential to recovery if there had been no contributory negligence which was held sufficient to bar a recovery. Turning to the opinion, it is found that the court goes no further than to say that under the declaration alleging that defendant knew that the dog was accustomed to bite mankind, the plaintiff must prove that the dog was accustomed to bite mankind and that the plaintiff knew it. Of course it does not follow that the plaintiff would be required to make such proof where there was no such allegation.

Of course, in an action to recover for injuries sustained by being struck by a team frightened by a dog, in which the complaint alleges negligence upon the part of the owner of the dog in keeping it with knowledge of its vicious propensities, the plaintiff must prove that the defendant was the owner of the dog, with knowledge of its vicious propensities, or prove circumstances from which it must appear to all reasonable persons that he must have had such knowledge. Mabrey v. Haverstick, 175 Ill. App. 309.

Imputed knowledge.

And notice to one joint owner is notice to all the owners. Halm v. Madison, supra.

The owner of a dog may be charged with notice of its vicious propensities by reason of his wife's knowledge that it has bitten human beings. Ayers v. Macoughtry, supra.

Effect of statutes.

Proof of scienter is unnecessary in an action for the killing of a cat by a dog taken into the street without being muzzled and led, as required by ordinance, the dog having chased the cat upon the plaintiff's premises before killing it. Buchanan v. Stout, 139 App. Div. 204, 123 N. Y. Supp. 724.

And it is held in Legault v. Malacker, — Wis. —, 145 N. W. 1081, that the Wisconsin statute makes allegation and proof of scienter unnecessary as well in case of injuries to persons as in the case of injuries to cattle by dogs.

So it was held in Forsythe v. Kluckhohn, — Iowa, —, 142 N. W. 225, that whether the action was based upon the state statute or upon a municipal ordinance, proof of scienter was unnecessary.

And recognizing that proof of scienter was required at common law, it was held in Malafronte v. Miloni, — R. I. —, 86 Atl. 146, that the purpose of a statute unqualifiedly rendering the owner of a dog liable for injuries caused by it was to dispense with the necessity of proof of scienter. To the same effect is Kleybolte v. Buffon, — Ohio, —, 105 N. E. 192.

The case of Faulkner v. Hall, 150 Ky. 416, 150 S. W. 506, merely enforced the liability unconditionally imposed by statute upon every person owning or harboring a dog, for injuries inflicted by it.

John Powell, chief of police, knew the defendant's dog and had seen him on the streets with the Farley children, Alice and John. He gave his opinion that he did not think that the dog was a very bad dog. Robert Mitchel, the night watch, testified that he had not noticed anything wrong with the dog in its conduct towards persons. Mrs. Steenburg testified that she saw the dog every day; that the dog played with the Farley children, with Blanche McKey, Thomas Peterson, with the Williamson children, the Haughey girls, Arthur Ronin, and her own boys. She saw the boys pick the dog up by his feet and handle him in a very rough manner and he did not get angry at this. He seems to have been willing to endure almost any amount of rough treatment at the hands of these children. Mrs. Haughey, the wife of Dr. Haughey, testified that she knew the Farley dog; she saw him, and that her children played with the dog, especially the youngest girl, who was about twelve years old; she also saw the Williamson children, Thomas Peterson, and Dr. Steenburg's boys playing with the dog. They would run and hide and the dog would hunt them. Mrs. Williamson testified as to the gentleness of the dog and its daily companionship with the children. Her children were seven, nine, and eleven years old. She knew that the dog was always gentle with these children. Walter Boyd testified that the dog was with his brother-in-law's little boy, a little fellow three years of age, and that the dog and the child would play in the house. Mr. Ronin testified that the dog was the companion of his little grandson and other little neighborhood children. He had seen the dog on his porch and in his yard playing with his little grandson and other little children. The grandson was seven years old. George Verbeck testified that he had observed the Farley children and other children playing with this dog; that he had seen him a great many times with other children than the Farley children. The children and the dog would chase each other about the place. He never saw the dog show his teeth, growl, or show any tendency to bite anybody. He appears to have been the pet and companion of the children of the neighborhood.

The defendant's daughter testified that she had seen many children, ranging in age from four to twelve years, play with the dog; that they would tie a rope on his collar, and the dog would pull them on roller skates in front of the house; sometimes they would roll over him; at other times they would tie a handkerchief around his nose and watch him get it off with his paw. They also fed him candy. The defendant's wife testified to the same facts. The defendant's testimony is along the same line. He had seen the children tie his feet together with a handkerchief or a string. He had seen them tie a handkerchief about the dog's nose. Mr. Serf testified that he frequently saw the dog, and that when he went by the house the dog would come out in a friendly way. He frequently went by the Farley home and often in the nighttime. The dog was always friendly. He would come out and walk a little ways with the witness. Lewis G. Bald testified that the dog was unusually friendly. He testified to meeting the dog and petting him and that the dog went with him. He often saw the dog play with the children. R. Y. Barnes, who had formerly been the city marshal, testified that for two years he had passed the Farley residence as often as at least twice a day, and sometimes four times a day, and that he always found the dog playful and friendly. He described the dog as a very pretty dog, and clean and nice, and he would speak to him and pet him. He had never seen any tendency on the part of the dog to attack any person.

The evidence shows conclusively that the dog was generally of an amiable disposition and that he played with the children in the neighborhood. The evidence would seem to indicate that there was no reason to apprehend danger from this dog under ordinary circumstances. That he would fight dogs was, perhaps, natural for a bulldog—perhaps for most breeds of dogs.

W. J. Elmore, a witness for the plaintiff, testified that Mr. Warrick separated the dogs when the defendant's dog first came by, and put his coach dog in the drug store; that the defendant's dog went on down the street; that there was a little girl with the dog. Presently the little girl came back. By that time the coach dog was out of the drug store, and the bulldog came by.

Q. You say the bulldog rushed in and grabbed the coach dog. What, if anything, did Mr. Warrick do—describe what he did?

A. He grabbed these dogs and tried to part them, and he had them by the collar, and this dog reached around and grabbed him. . . .

Q. And as soon as they commenced to fight that time (the second time) Mr. Warrick grabbed both of them by the collar?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. And lifted them off their front feet?

A. Well, he lifted them off their front feet, but they was still on the back.

Q. And he was holding the dogs apart?

A. Yes.

Q. And they were both trying to get together?

A. Well, Mr. Warrick's dog didn't attempt to get to the other one; the bulldog was doing all the lunging.

Q. The other dog didn't try to fight at all?

A. He tried, but he wasn't vicious like the other dog.

Glenn Mason, witness on the part of the defendant, testified: "A. Well, I was in front of McKee & Hartquest's drug store and with a bunch of men there after we got back from a trip in the automobile, and I heard somebody say, 'Here he comes,' and about the same time they said that the two dogs were close together, and Mr. Warrick grabbed them by the collar and picked them up. . . . He lifted them clear up, and they were too heavy to hold that way, and they would strike the ground again, and then he would pull them back up; and it seemed he couldn't lift them the second time as high as he did the first time— (continuing) Well, they came back down to the ground and the dogs—I don't know whether it was the second or third time—one of the dogs, Mr. Farley's dog, got a hold of Mr. Warrick's dog on the side and just pulled the skin right out on the dog and let loose; he got loose from him again."

Luther French, a witness for the plaintiff, testified: "Mr. Warrick stepped out of the way, and Mr. Farley's dog had hold of Mr. Warrick's dog about the shoulders or neck; and Mr. Warrick grabbed his dog by the collar and also Mr. Farley's dog, and he was pulling on Mr. Warrick's dog to get him off I believe, and they were trying to get the dogs parted there anyway, and the first thing I knew the bulldog had bit Mr. Warrick."

It is, seemingly, the undisputed evidence that the plaintiff took each dog by the collar and lifted them both clear of the ground. Holding them in that manner, they would be sure to snap at each other. From the circumstances as detailed no one may be certain that the bite which the plaintiff received was not intended for the coach dog. We are of the opinion that the plaintiff was guilty of negligence, and that he, himself, by his negligence, made the injury possible. If he had taken either dog by the collar and attempted to drag him away from the other, he would, in all probability, not have been injured. We do not think that the evidence sustains the verdict.

It appears that the plaintiff was bitten because he caught these dogs by their respective collars and held them up so that they could snap at each other. As well expect two cats suspended together by their tails and facing each other not to fight, as to expect peace between these dogs when they were held up fronting each other and with their heads near enough together so that they could snap at and reach each other. Elmore testified that the dogs were about the same size. A coach dog will fight, probably not so well as a bulldog; but, if this coach dog understood that his master was helping him by holding the other dog, he would try to do his whole duty, from a dog's standpoint, because of the spirit of loyalty to his master. A bulldog held up that way would probably delight in the mad revelry of the battle; and, no doubt, almost any dog would fight under the same circumstances. Ordinary prudence demands more careful conduct of the plaintiff and greater regard for his own safety. The injury of the plaintiff was clearly due to his own neglect.

The owner of a dog is not liable for injury caused by it unless it is vicious and notice of the fact that it is vicious is brought home to him. Trumble v. Happy, 114 Iowa, 624, 87 N. W. 678.

The owner of ordinary domestic animals is not liable for injury which they do to another unless the animal was accustomed to injuring persons, or had an inclination to do so to the knowledge of the owner. Smith v. Causey, 22 Ala. 568; Le Forest v. Tolman, 117 Mass. 109, 19 Am. Rep. 400, 1 Am. Neg. Cas. 138.

Where, in an action to recover for personal injury caused by a domestic animal, it does not appear that the animal ever injured anyone before or since, or that anyone ever had any difficulty with it other than that on which plaintiff founds his suit, nonsuit should be granted, since there is no evidence that defendant had knowledge of the vicious character of the animal. 2 Cyc. 390.

Under a declaration that the defendant kept a dog that he knew was accustomed to bite mankind, it is not enough for the plaintiff to prove that the dog had a savage and ferocious disposition, and that defendant knew it; but he is bound to prove the allegation that the dog was accustomed to attack and bite mankind, and that defendant knew that.

There is no doubt that, in case of animals not inclined to do mischief, a previous mischievous propensity must be shown, and, the scienter clearly established, the gist of the action is not the keeping of the animal, but the keeping with knowledge of the mischievous propensity, whether proceeding from a savage disposition or not. Mann v. Weiland, 81* Pa. 243. In Beck v. Dyson, 4 Campb. 198, 16 Revised Rep. 774, Lord Ellenborough directed a nonsuit because the evidence was not sufficient to warrant the jury in inferring that the defendant knew that the dog was accustomed to bite. In a like case Lord Abinger non-sued because it did not appear that the owner had knowledge of the vicious propensity of his dog. Hogan v. Sharpe, 7 Car. & P. *755. In Martinez v. Bernhard, 106 La. 368, 55 L.R.A. 671, 87 Am. St. Rep. 306, 30 So. 901, it is said by the court: "The owner of a gentle animal, which has always been of a kind temper, and has never attempted to bite anyone, and has never given occasion to suspect that it would bite, is not liable in damages by the mere fact that the animal has bitten someone."

Where a dog has been around the premises for four years and had never shown symptoms of viciousness, and he bit the plaintiff, and it was shown that he had just been stepped on, and that boys had been throwing dirt at him, held, that the vicious character of the dog was not shown so as to warrant a verdict against the owner. Cuney v. Campbell, 76 Minn. 59, 78 N. W. 878, 6 Am. Neg. Rep. 97.

The plaintiff's contributory negligence in teasing defendant's dog, but for which the injury would not have occurred, is a defense to the action, it matters not when or where the injury was inflicted. Bush v. Wathen, 104 Ky. 548, 47 S. W. 599.

In Hathaway v. Tinkham, 148 Mass. 85, 19 N. E. 18, it was said by Mr. Justice Allen: "It is, however, essential to a plaintiff's right to recover that he should have been in the exercise of ordinary care himself." Where the plaintiff interferes with a dog and is bitten, due care should be shown. The same should be true where he interferes with two dogs that are fighting. Raymond v. Hodgson, 161 Mass. 184, 36 N. E. 791, 1 Am. Neg. Cas. 130. In the case cited, "the plaintiff testified that his dog was making great outcries; that he rushed up to the dogs, looked for a collar on the defendants' dog, and, seeing none, seized the defendants' dog by the tail, and pulled it away from his dog; and that, as the dogs became separated, the defendants' dog bit his hand, which had hold of the tail." The plaintiff requested the judge to rule that he was not obliged to satisfy the jury that he exercised due care, under the undisputed circumstances of the case. The judge refused so to rule. The jury returned a verdict for the defendants, "on the ground of want of due care on the part of the plaintiff; and the case comes before us on the plaintiff's exceptions to the refusal to rule as requested." The supreme court of Massachusetts, by Judge Lathrop, delivering its opinion, cited several Massachusetts cases, and then said, referring to these cases: "We have no doubt that where the plaintiff incites or interferes with a dog, and is bitten, his due care must be shown; and that the same is true where he interferes with two dogs that are fighting. . . In the case at bar the plaintiff voluntarily submitted himself to danger; and we have no doubt that the ruling of the court below was right."

The logic of the Massachusetts case seems to be conclusive. Applying that logic to the instant case, it is clear that the plaintiff voluntarily submitted himself to danger and did not exercise due care. He held these dogs, that were then engaged in fighting, up in front of him. They were standing on their hind legs and snapping at each other, and he was supporting them by holding them up. By his conduct he voluntarily incurred the danger. He failed to exercise reasonable discretion. He was guilty of contributory negligence. While the purpose of the plaintiff was a proper one,—he was trying to stop the fight,—he took no consideration of his own danger. He unnecessarily exposed himself.

The judgment of the District Court is reversed.

Rose and Sedgwick, JJ., not sitting.

Fawcett, J., concurring:

I concur in the judgment of reversal on the ground of the insufficiency of the evidence to show any previous disposition of defendant's dog to bite mankind, and on the further ground that plaintiff was guilty of negligence in voluntarily exposing himself to a danger that was clearly apparent.

Note. — Extent of recovery in ejectment by tenants in common against stranger.

This question was treated in the note to Williams v. Coal Creek Min. & Mfg. Co. 6 L.R.A.(N.S.) 710, and only the cases decided subsequently to the compilation of that note are included in the present annotation.

The authorities which have determined the extent of recovery in ejectment by a suit in ejectment to recover possession of lands, although they may do so if they so desire.

Ejectment — recovery by tenant in common.

2. A tenant in common may sue separately in ejectment, and, if the defendant shows no title, he is entitled to recover possession of the entire estate, in subordination, however, to the rights of his cotenants.

Deed — contract — form.

3. In the case at bar the paper relied on is not a deed, but is an executory contract for the giving of a deed to the Galisteo ranch, by Manuel A. Otero, to Jesus M.

Sena y Baca upon the approval of the Bartolome Baca grant.

Limitation of actions — executory contract — adverse possession.

4. The instrument in writing under which Jesus M. Sena y Baca took possession of the Galisteo ranch, being an executory contract, the statute of limitations, under which title by adverse possession might be gained, would not begin to run until Sena y Baca, or those claiming under him, distinctly and unequivocally repudiated the title of Manuel A. Otero to the Galisteo ranch.

tenant in common against a stranger are, as is stated in the earlier note, divided into two classes, namely, those in which the court, looking upon the right of possession as the gist of the tenant's claim, give him the whole of the common land, and those in which the court, regarding the title as the main thing to be considered, measure his recovery by the extent of his interest in the property. The rule based upon the right of possession has been adopted in recent cases of first impression in three jurisdictions (Alabama, Hawaii, and Michigan), and one jurisdiction (New Mexico) has renounced the rule limiting the recovery to the extent of the complaining cotenant's title, and adopted the rule that a tenant in common may sue separately, and as against a stranger recover the entire property, while one court (Oklahoma supreme court), considering the question for the first time, has adopted the rule that a cotenant's recovery must be limited to the extent of his title.

Because of the extensive treatment of the question in 6 L.R.A. (N.S.) 710, it has been deemed necessary to do little more than cite the later cases to the rules adopted therein.

Thus, it has been held that, as against a stranger to the title, one or more, less than all, tenants in common may sue for and recover the entire tract which is the subject of the tenancy in common, and that the recovery inures to the benefit of all. Lecroix v. Malone, 157 Ala. 434, 47 So. 725; Blakeley v. DuBose, 167 Ala. 627, 52 So. 746; Hooper v. Bankhead, 171 Ala. 626, 54 So. 549; McCormick v. Marcy, 165 Cal. 386, 132 Pac. 449; Godfrey v. Rowland, 17 Haw. 577, 7 Ann. Cas. 993 (court reviewed the authorities, and adopted the rule, basing its decision on the ground that ejectment is a possessory action and does not adjudicate title); Jett v. Hunter, 51 Tex. Civ. App. 92, 111 S. W. 176; Caruthers v. Hadley, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 115 S. W. 80; Kirby v. Blake, 53 Tex. Civ. App. 173, 115 S. W. 674; Wadsworth v. Vinyard, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 131 S. W. 1171; Hill v. Whitworth, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 162 S. W. 434; Craver v. Mossbach, 57 Wash. 662, 107 Pac. 1037, 109 Pac. 1016. And see DE BERGERE v. CHAVES, wherein the New Mexico supreme court renounces the rule limiting the recovery, and adopts the rule that a tenant in common may sue separately in ejectment, 51 L.R.A. (N.S.) and, as against a stranger to the title, recover possession of the entire estate, subject, however, to the rights of his cotenants.

And in Michigan it has been held that, by virtue of Public Acts 1903, No. 55, one claiming under a tenant in common may, as against one having no interest in the title, recover possession of the entire tract of land which was the subject of the tenancy in common. Lamb v. Lamb, 139 Mich. 166, 102 N. W. 645.

And in Kansas it was held in the recent case of Horner v. Ellis, 75 Kan. 675, 121 Am. St. Rep. 446, 90 Pac. 275, that one tenant in common may, in an action of ejectment, recover the entire premises from one who has no title, although the court said that "the question in ejectment is, Who has the superior title?" In connection with this case see King v. Hyatt, 51 Kan. 504, 37 Am. St. Rep. 304, 32 Pac. 1105, as set out in 6 L.R.A. (N.S.) 719.

But, as before indicated, the rule that a tenant in common bringing an action for the recovery of the subject of the tenancy can recover to the extent of his interest only was adopted in Moppin v. Norton, — Okla. —, 137 Pac. 1182.

In South Carolina, where the courts adhere to the general rule that a tenant in common may recover only to the extent of his interest (see 6 L.R.A. (N.S.) 722), it was held in Whitaker v. Manson, 84 S. C. 29, 137 Am. St. Rep. 835, 65 S. E. 953, that when cotenants are very numerous, and it is impracticable to bring them all before the court, one tenant in common may, by virtue of a statute providing that when the parties are very numerous and it may be impracticable to bring them all before the court, one or more may sue for the benefit of the whole, etc.,—maintain an action against a stranger to recover the common land for the benefit of all the cotenants.

But under the rule that recovery is limited to the title of the complaining cotenant, a title good by prescription against one of the cotenants defeats a joint action for the recovery of land brought by tenants in common. Williamson v. Youmans, 136 Ga. 222, 71 S. E. 138.

Upon the general question as to what title or interest will support an action of ejectment, see the note to Hancock v. McAvoy, 18 L.R.A. 781. G. J. C.

APPÉAL by defendants from a judgment of the District Court for Santa Fé County in plaintiffs' favor in an action brought to recover possession of certain land. Affirmed.

Statement by Mills, Ch. J.:

This is a suit in ejectment, brought by the plaintiffs, to recover the possession of a certain tract of land situated in Santa Fé county, New Mexico, and known as the "Galisteo ranch." A jury was waived and the evidence in the case was taken by the Hon. John R. McFie, judge of the first judicial district court of the territory of New Mexico, but on March 3, A. D. 1906, the said judge disqualified himself, and by consent of all the parties the cause was referred to the Hon. Edward A. Mann, associate justice of the supreme court of this territory, who heard the arguments and rendered a judgment in the case. It will be unnecessary to trace the title to the Galisteo ranch back of June 22, 1878, at which time the title to the ranch was in Manuel Antonio Otero, as all of the parties to this controversy trace their claims to him as the common source. On June 22, 1878, Manuel A. Otero and one Jesus M. Sena y Baca entered into a contract or agreement, written in Spanish, a translation of which reads as follows, to wit:

Know all men by these presents, that I, the undersigned, Manuel Antonio Otero, resident of the county of Valencia, in the territory of New Mexico, for consideration, have sold and transferred in favor of Jesus M. Sena y Baca and Agapita Ortiz, his wife, a ranch known as the ranch of Galisteo, which is situated in the county of Santa Fé and territory aforesaid, known as the ranch which was formerly of the deceased Don Miguel E. Pino, and that I will give and execute the documents of conveyance of the said ranch in favor of Jesus M. Sena y Baca and Agapita Ortiz, as soon as there shall be adjudicated and approved by the surveyor general the grant of Bartolome Baca of a tract which was ceded to him by the Governor Melgarez in the year 1819, and the which is situate in the county of Valencia in the territory of New Mexico, and, furthermore, they will take possession of the aforesaid ranch and will have and enjoy all the products of the same until the proper documents may be executed, and in conformity with the above stated; and the said Jesus M. Sena y Baca so agrees and has signed here jointly with me. In witness whereof, we sign the present in La Constancia, county of Valencia, this 22d day of June, A. D. 1878.

Manuel A. Otero.

Jesus M. Sena y Baca.

Under this contract or agreement Sena y Baca went into possession of the lands in controversy, and so remained until his death in the year 1885, when his rights descended to his widow, who continued in possession until July 10, 1888, when she quitclaimed her rights in it to one Jesse D. Rumberg, and at the same time delivered to him the original contract or agreement between her husband and Otero, both of which instruments Rumberg had placed of record. Rumberg continued in possession of the property until July 18, 1889, when he quitclaimed the same to Jose de la Cruz Chaves, and from Jose de la Cruz Chaves the property came into the possession of his heirs at law, the defendants herein. The contract or agreement between Sena y Baca and Otero, and which is set out above, was handed over to the several occupants of the property, and was introduced in evidence on the trial of this case. Indeed, the contract or agreement seems to have been executed in duplicate, as both the plaintiffs and defendants have one, which are identical, except that the one held by the defendants has certain interlineations in it setting out a consideration of $1,000 for the alleged sale. During all of the time that the property was in the possession of Sena y Baca and his privies their possession was continuous. They farmed the land, made certain improvements on it by building fences and acequias, have received rentals for parts of it which were farmed on shares, and have exercised all of the control over the property which its owner might do. The evidence discloses that Manuel Antonio Otero attempted to get the Bartolome Baca grant approved by the surveyor general of New Mexico, but that official made an unfavorable report on the validity of the grant, and recommended that it be rejected, but before Congress took any action on this report of the surveyor general the court of private land claims was created, and empowered to adjudicate and determine the validity of land grants made by the governments of Spain and Mexico in New Mexico and other territories. The Oteros prosecuted their claim for the confirmation of the Bartolome Baca grant before the court of private land claims, and secured a favorable decision from that court for a part of the grant, but on appeal the Supreme Court of the United States, in 1897, finally rejected the grant. After the creation of the court of private land claims the successors of Sena y Baca brought a proceeding in such court for the confirmation of the Galisteo grant, and succeeded in getting that part of it known as the "Galisteo ranch," the property in controversy, confirmed. On April 3, 1901, after the final rejection of the Bartolome Baca grant, the plaintiffs herein, as heirs of Manuel Antonio Otero, brought this suit to recover the possession of the Galisteo ranch. Judgment was finally entered by the learned judge below in favor of the plaintiffs, and, from such judgment, the defendants appealed to this court.

Mr. A. B. Renehan, for appellants:

When the statute of limitations has once begun to run, nothing will toll it, and one disability cannot be tacked to another.

Plaintiffs must recover, if at all, on the strength of their own title, and not on the weakness of that of the defendants.

King v. Mullins, 171 U. S. 404, 43 L. ed. 214, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 925; Smith v. McCann, 24 How. 403, 16 L. ed. 716.

Plaintiffs are estopped by laches to have or recover the said premises.

Dickerson v. Colgrove, 100 U. S. 578, 25 L. ed. 618; Kirk v. Hamilton, 102 U. S. 78, 26 L. ed. 82; Naddo v. Bardon, 2 C. C. A. 335, 4 U. S. App. 642, 51 Fed. 493.

In ejectment, the burden of proof is upon the plaintiffs to show their title to the identical land claimed by the defendants.

Maxwell Land Grant Co. v. Dawson, 151 U. S. 603, 38 L. ed. 285, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 458.

In an executory contract of purchase, the possession is originally rightful, and it may be that until the party in possession is called upon to restore it, he cannot be ejected without a demand or notice to quit.

If the title to the Galisteo ranch has not been shown to be in the plaintiffs' ancestor by derivation from the original allottees, then it outstands the said original allottees, their heirs or assigns, whoever they may be.

Mills, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

It is evident from an examination of the record that this case was ably contested by the attorneys for both the plaintiffs and the defendants, and that every effort was used to secure and present to the trial court all of the evidence which minds trained in the subtlety of legal procedure by many years of active practice before the courts believed would be useful to the respective sides which they represented in the controversy now before us.

The questions discussed by counsel in their briefs are numerous and involve complicated points of law, but in our opinion the real questions on which this case must finally be decided can be compressed into a small compass, by brushing to one side what, under our opinion of this case, are 51 L.R.A. (N.S.)

collateral and comparatively unimportant matters, many of which are elaborately argued in the briefs submitted to us by counsel. We will endeavor to dispose of this case along these lines.

1. We do not consider as well taken the contention of the appellants that the plaintiffs below could not maintain this suit without joining their tenants in common as parties. No provision of our laws, so far as we are aware, requires that all of the tenants in common should join in a suit to recover possession of real property. In fact, this court has held in Neher v. Armijo, 9 N. M. 325, 54 Pac. 236: "Defendant insists that these plaintiffs as tenants in common could not be joined as parties plaintiff, and their having so joined is fatal to their case. We do not interpret the law to be as defendant contends, but believe the better rule to be that tenants in common may join in ejectment and recover the whole property demanded so held by them in common, or they may sue separately and recover each one only his whole interest." The opinion in the Neher v. Armijo Case, that tenants in common may join in an ejectment case and "recover the whole property demanded so held by them in common, or they may sue separately and recover," is we think correct, but we think that that case is incorrect in limiting such recovery in case a suit is brought by one of several tenants in common to "each one only his whole interest," and to that extent the case of Neher v. Armijo is reversed. We think the true rule to be that a tenant in common may sue separately in ejectment, and that, if the defendant shows no title, he is entitled to recover possession of the entire estate, "in subordination, however, to the rights of his cotenants." As is well said in Hardy v. Johnson, 1 Wall. 371, 17 L. ed. 502: "The action of ejectment determines no rights but those of present possession; and that one tenant in common has such rights as against all parties but his cotenants, or persons holding under them, is not questioned." That a tenant in common may sue without joining the other tenants in common is also held as late as 1898, when the Supreme Court of the United States quotes approvingly from Davis v. Coblens, 12 App. D. C. 51, 61, as follows, to wit: "The original rule at common law was that tenants in common could only sue separately, because they were separately seised, and there was no privity of estate between them. Mobley v. Bruner, 59 Pa. 481, 98 Am. Dec. 360; Corbin v. Cannon, 31 Miss. 570, 572; May v. Slade, 24 Tex. 205, 207; 4 Kent, Com. 368. The practice soon became general, however, in the United States, to permit them to sue either jointly or severally as they might elect. 7

Enc. Pl. & Pr. 316, and cases cited. This seems to have been the practice in the District of Columbia, and, so far as we are advised, has never been questioned. Tenants in common may join in an action if they prefer to do so, but it is with the risk of the failure of all, if one of them fail to make out a title or right to possession." And the Supreme Court adds to this quotation the words: "These remarks express the rule correctly." Davis v. Coblens, 174 U. S. 719, 43 L. ed. 1147, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 832. The law is also laid down in 15 Cyc. 8, to be that it is not necessary that all the tenants in common shall unite in the action, although they may join in it for their common estate.

2. We will now consider the agreement in writing signed by Otero and Sena y Baca, on which this controversy is largely based, to determine whether it is a deed or an agreement to convey, for the decision of this point is of vital importance to the parties to this case. From the standpoint of performance, contracts have been divided into two classes,—executed and executory. "A contract is executed where everything that was to be done is done, and nothing remains to be done. A grant actually made is within this category. Such a contract requires no consideration to support it. A gift consummated is as valid in law as anything else. Dartmouth College v. Woodward, 4 Wheat. 518, 4 L. ed. 629. An executory contract is one where it is stipulated by the agreement of minds, upon a sufficient consideration, that something is to be done or not to be done by one or both of the parties. Only a slight consideration is necessary. Pillans v. Van Mierop, 3 Burr, 1663; Forth v. Stanton, 1 Wms' Saund. 210, note 2, and the cases there cited." Farrington v. Tennessee, 95 U. S. 679, 24 L. ed. 558. An examination of the contract or agreement entered into between Otero and Sena y Baca, and which is set out in full in the statement of facts preceding this opinion, convinces us that it was an executory contract (although it contains words of present purchase and sale) for the conveyance of the Galisteo ranch by Otero to Sena y Baca upon the happening of a certain contingency, viz., the adjudication and approval of the Bartolome Baca grant. The wording of the contract provided that Sena y Baca could take possession of the Galisteo ranch and enjoy the products of the same until the proper documents were executed to convey the title to him, which documents were to be executed on the favorable adjudication and approval (confirmation) of the Bartolome Baca grant. The wording of the agreement is unequivocal and plain that the deed of conveyance to the Galisteo ranch was to be made when the Bartolome Baca grant was favorably adjudicated and approved. Nor can it be contended that the contract of June 22, 1878, was a deed, for it is signed by both Otero and Sena y Baca, and not alone by Otero, the then owner of the Galisteo ranch. If the instrument in question had been signed by Otero alone, there would have been more force than now exists in the contention of the appellants that it was a deed transferring the title to real estate, rather than a mere agreement to execute deeds to convey on the happening of certain events. Another thing which leads us to conclude that the writing was an executory contract, and not a deed, is that it is not acknowledged before any officer having the power to take acknowledgments to deeds, nor before anyone, and as long ago as 1852 our legislature passed an act which was approved on January 12th of that year, which provided in § 5 that "every instrument in writing by which real estate is transferred or affected, in law or equity, shall be acknowledged and certified to in the manner hereinafter prescribed." Laws 1851-52, p. 374. Section 6 of the same act sets out the officers before whom such acknowledgments might be taken. This law was in force at the time of the signing of the agreement or contract on June 22, 1878, and must have been known to the parties who signed it, for the evidence discloses that one of them at least was a man of affairs, and one who was familiar with the working of the legislative bodies of the territory. In arriving at a conclusion as to whether or not the writing which is the basis of this controversy is a deed or contract, we must consider it as an entirety. We cannot pick out a few words or a line here and there, and determine from them what it is. As the Supreme Court of the United States says: "We agree generally that, although there are words of conveyance in presenti in a contract for the purchase and sale of lands, still, if, from the whole instrument, it is manifest that further conveyances were contemplated by the parties, it will be considered an agreement to convey, and not a conveyance. The whole question is one of intention, to be gathered from the instrument itself. Jackson ex dem. Shipley v. Moncrief, 5 Wend. 26; Ogden v. Brown, 33 Pa. 247; Phillips v. Swank, 120 Pa. 76, 6 Am. St. Rep. 691, 13 Atl. 712;" Williams v. Paine, 169 U. S. 55, 42 L. ed. 658, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 279. We have gone over the written instrument dated June 22, 1878, very carefully, and have come to the conclusion that it is not, and was not intended to be, a deed for the conveyance of the Galisteo ranch, but that it was an executory contract, by the terms of which a deed for its conveyance was to be delivered by Manuel Antonio Otero to Jesus Sena y Baca, on the favorable adjudication and confirmation of the Bartolome Baca grant. As the Bartolome Baca grant was finally rejected by the Supreme Court of the United States, no necessity arose for Otero or his heirs to give deeds of conveyance for the Galisteo ranch.

3. Holding that the instrument in writing under which Sena y Baca took possession of the Galisteo ranch and held the same was an executory contract, we must determine the nature of the possession of the said ranch by Sena y Baca and his successors in title, with the view of determining whether or not title has been acquired by adverse possession. The evidence in this case discloses that Sena y Baca, in obtaining the confirmation of the Galisteo grant, deraigned his title through Manuel Antonio Otero by virtue of the executory contract, and thus recognized the title of his vendor to the premises. No claim was made by the defendants that their title arose from any other source. Sena y Baca then entered into the possession of the lands in controversy by virtue of the contract, and with the permission of Manuel Antonio Otero, and it is generally held that a possession by permission or license from the owner is not adverse, and cannot ripen into title, no matter how long continued, or however exclusive it may be. 1 Cyc. 1030, and cases cited in note 66, from twenty-seven states, and from England, Canada, and the Supreme Court of the United States. The possession of the occupant under such circumstances is considered as the possession of him upon whose pleasure it continues. Pulaski County v. State, 42 Ark. 118. And again in 1 Cyc. 1044, the rule is stated to be, and many cases are cited in its support, that, "where one enters into and holds possession of lands under an executory contract of purchase or bond for title, the entry and possession are in subordination to the title of the vendor until payment or performance of all the conditions by the vendee, or until the vendee has distinctly and unequivocally repudiated the title of his vendor, which repudiation is brought expressly or by legal implication to the vendor's knowledge." The reason for this rule forbidding a person who has gone into possession under a contract to purchase, to repudiate his contract, is the injustice of allowing a person who has obtained possession by admitting title of another, to enjoy that title, and, in case of failure of proof of it, hold the premises himself. Howard v. McKenzie, 54 Tex. 171; Kirk v. Taylor, 8 B. Mon. 262; McKelvain v. Allen, 58 51 L.R.A.(N.S.)

Tex. 383; Clouse v. Elliott, 71 Ind. 302. The evidence in this case nowhere discloses that Sena y Baca, or his assigns, ever distinctly and unequivocally repudiated the title of Manuel Antonio Otero. When Sena y Baca disposed of whatever title he had in the Galisteo ranch to Rumberg, he did so by a quitclaim deed, and handed Rumberg the executory contract which he had in his possession, and this contract appears to have always been given to the occupants of the real estate in controversy down to the present day, for we find it in the possession of the defendants when this suit is brought, and it is introduced by them in evidence to support their claim that they own the property in fee.

We are aware that many points are raised in the briefs of both appellants and the appellees which we have not discussed; but, as before stated, under the view which we have taken of this case, we do not think that it is necessary for us to discuss or determine them, and we therefore refrain from so doing, although we have read and considered them with much care.

Finding no reversible error in the judgment of the court below, the same is therefore affirmed; and it is so ordered.

there stated, that the stockholder is liable to creditors for the full value of the stock even though he has received, for a sum less than its par value, stock purporting to be fully paid up, is adhered to in Utica Fire Alarm Teleg. Co. v. Waggoner Watchman Clock Co. 166 Mich. 618, 132 N. W. 502, and First Nat. Bank v. Northup, 82 Kan. 638, 136 Am. St. Rep. 119, 109 Pac. 672.

So, in Johns v. Clothier, — Wash. —, 139 Pac. 755, one who had subscribed for stock under an agreement that he was to pay only a certain per cent of the par value was held liable upon the suit of a receiver for the unpaid portion of his capital stock in favor of creditors who had no knowledge of such agreement.

And stockholders who had paid only a nominal consideration for their stock were held liable upon their unpaid stock subscriptions in German-American State Bank v. Soap Lake Salts Remedy Co. — Wash. —, 137 Pac. 461.

In Wait v. McKee, 95 Ark. 124, 128 S. W. 1028, stockholders who had executed notes for stock subscriptions, on which notes a credit of 50 per cent was indorsed, leaving only the remaining 50 per cent payable, were held liable for the full amount of their several stock subscriptions, notwithstanding the wrongful credits on the note.

And in Moore v. United States One Stave Barrel Co. 238 Ill. 544, 128 Am. St. Rep. 153, 87 N. E. 536, a creditor of a corporation who took stock of the corporation at a discount in payment of his debt was held liable for the unpaid portion of his stock subscription.

So, the purchasers of original stock from the corporation at less than par are liable to the par value of the stock to creditors who have acted upon the faith of the capital as represented by the stock. McAllister v. American Hospital Asso. 62 Or. 530, 125 Pac. 286.

The purchasers of preferred stock to whom were given a certain number of shares of the common stock as bonus were held liable in Gordon v. Cummings, — Wash. —, 139 Pac. 489, to an assessment upon the common stock at the suit of a receiver, although they believed at the time their subscription was made that the stock was non-assessable.

ing a call upon the stockholders of an insolvent corporation to meet a deficiency in its assets to cover its obligations is not conclusive in an action in the courts of the state of a stockholder's residence that he is bound, under his subscription contract, to pay more than he agreed to pay for the stock, although that was less than the par value.

Corporation — stock — trust fund — issuance at discount — liability.

4. A subscriber to stock of a corporation whose contract provides that, upon payment of a portion of the par value of the stock, it shall be issued as fully paid and non-assessable, cannot, under the trust fund theory, be compelled to pay in for the benefit scription was made that the stock was non-assessable.

It was further held in this case that although the common stock thus given out exceeded the authorized amount of such common stock, the holders thereof were liable to the creditors, since, as to creditors, there can be but one kind of stock, that is, the capital stock of the corporation, and within the limit of the authorized capital stock no person can hold a share, by whatever name it may be called, without meeting the responsibilities and the liabilities that the law attaches to such holding.

So, in Holcombe v. Trenton White City Co. 80 N. J. Eq. 122, 82 Atl. 618, preferred stockholders to whom common stock was issued as a bonus were held liable to an assessment for the unpaid portion of such common stock.

In Knight & W. Co. v. Tampa Sand Line Brick Co. 55 Fla. 728, 46 So. 285, stockholders to whom stock was gratuitously issued upon their purchase of the bonds of the company were held liable upon the corporation's insolvency, to the corporation creditors, for the full amount remaining unpaid upon the stock so issued to them. It is stated to be immaterial whether the stockholders formally subscribed for the stock or not; that their acceptance and holding thereof was equivalent to a formal contract of subscription importing a promise to pay.

So, subscribers to the bonds of a corporation in whose subscription contract it was provided that there should be delivered the bonds "and in addition thereto an amount of the capital stock of the" corporation equal, at its par value, to the par value of the bonds subscribed and fully paid for by such subscriber, were held liable to creditors of the corporation on the stock in Gillett v. Chicago Title & T. Co. 230 Ill. 373, 82 N. E. 891.

In French v. Busch, 189 Fed. 480, an action to recover an unpaid subscription on stock which had been issued as a bonus to bondholders in the company, the defense alleged was that by agreement among the bondholders no liability could be shown upon such stock; but it was held that as the stock assessed exceeded in amount the of creditors the difference between the contract price and the par value.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court, Fourth Department, affirming a judgment of a Trial Term for Oneida County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover an alleged unpaid balance upon two shares of stock. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Howard C. Wiggins, with Mr. A. D. Morgan, for appellant:

The complaint should have been dismissed for failure to allege compliance with § 15 of the general corporation law.

stock issued as bonus, it was no defense to an assessment on the stock under the statutory liability to show that, as to some of the stock, the bondholders might be estopped from demanding contributions from each other to the extent of the stock issued as a bonus to the bonds which others received.

In Merchants' Mut. Adjusting Agency v. Davidson, — Cal. App. —, 137 Pac. 1091, the doctrine that the creditor of an insolvent corporation cannot enforce payment of unpaid balances on stock sold by the corporation in good faith at less than par in order to procure necessary capital wherewith to conduct its business is disapproved, and the right of a creditor under such circumstances to enforce the unpaid stock subscription is affirmed.

It is stated in First Nat. Bank v. Northup, 82 Kan. 638, 136 Am. St. Rep. 119, 109 Pac. 672, that a creditor who becomes such with knowledge that stock purporting to be fully paid up and nonassessable was issued at a discount may not recover of the stockholders of the corporation the balance unpaid. Property was received in this case as payment for the corporate stock, but the value of the property was fixed at a certain amount, and it is stated by the court that the real transaction amounted to an agreement to issue stock at a discount.

Collin, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff, trustee of the bankrupt corporation, Remington Automobile & Motor Company, seeks to recover from the defendant a sum unpaid, as plaintiff alleges, upon a subscription by the defendant for two shares of the capital stock of the corporation.

The trial court found as facts: The bankrupt was organized in 1900 under the laws of New Jersey. Its authorized capital stock was $250,000, divided into 2,500 shares of the par value of $100 each. Soon after its incorporation, the board of directors adopted a resolution as follows: "Resolved, that for the purpose of securing a local interest in the Remington Automobile & Motor Company on the part of the citizens of Ilion (New York) that 200 shares of the stock be issued, to be sold at $25 per share, and that the proceeds of such sale be placed in the treasury to be used for regular expenses." Thereafter, in pursuance of the resolution, the general manager and secretary of the corporation presented to the defendant a writing which contained the agreements that the plant of the corporation was to be located and its business to be carried on at Ilion, and that the defendant would purchase two nonassessable shares of the capital stock of the corporation at $25 for each share, and no more would ever have to be paid upon them. The defendant signed the agreement and purchased the two shares of stock upon the distinct understanding and agreement made between the defendant and the general manager and secretary of the corporation that $25 per share fully paid for the stock. He paid $50 for the two shares of stock at the time he received them. The corporation located its plant at Utica, New York, and not at Ilion. In December, 1902, the company was adjudged a bankrupt, and in April, 1906, the United States district court granted an order directing a call or assessment upon the defendant and others of $75 per share to meet the deficiency in the assets of said corporation to meet the obligations of its creditors, said assessments to be paid on or before July 1, 1906, and the defendant was duly served with a copy of said order. The court found as a conclusion of law that the plaintiff was entitled to recover the sum of $150,—a conclusion which the facts found do not support.

The liability of the defendant is to be determined by the law of the state of New Jersey. That state, through its laws, gave the corporation its existence, powers, liabilities, and the limits within which it was free to act, and a citizen of this state, who became a shareholder in it, entered into contract relations, the extent and obligation of which depend upon those laws, in so far as they do not violate a statute or the settled public policy of this state. Lowry v. Inman, 46 N. Y. 119; Hancock Nat. Bank v. Ellis, 166 Mass. 414, 55 Am. St. Rep. 414, 44 N. E. 349; Molson's Bank v. Boardman, 47 Hun, 135.

The relevant laws of New Jersey are not disclosed or laid before us by the printed record; nor do the findings make known the provisions of the charter of the bankrupt other than that stated relating to the authorized capital stock. We are confined to the case as the record presents it. The laws of other states are facts which must be alleged and proved, and of which we cannot take judicial notice either in their language or their interpretation. Genet v. Delaware & H. Canal Co. 163 N. Y. 173, 177, 57 N. E. 297; Hancock Nat. Bank v. Ellis, 166 Mass. 414, 55 Am. St. Rep. 414, 44 N. E. 349.

In the absence of those facts, we must presume that the common law of New Jersey is the same as the common law of New York. Ruse v. Mutual Ben. L. Ins. Co. 23 N. Y. 516, 522.

It is urged by the respondent, at this point, that the order of the United States district court directing the assessment of the shares of the defendant conclusively determined the validity and the amount of the assessment. It is true that the regularity and validity of the proceeding in that court and its conclusions cannot be attacked in this action; but the existence or nonexistence of an obligation on the part of the defendant to pay the assessment was not within the subject-matter of which that court took jurisdiction. To enable the plaintiff to enforce the liability of the delinquent shareholders to the extent only which the deficiency in the corporate assets required and to effect parity of contribution between them, it was necessary that an account of the assets and debts, of the entire amount of the capital remaining unpaid upon the issued shares, and the part of the face value of his shares unpaid by each stockholder, should be taken, and the aggre-

Inasmuch as no statute of the state of New Jersey, nor provision of the charter of the corporation relative to the liability of the defendant, was proven, we turn to the common law, remarking parenthetically, however, that we have not been referred to and have not found any domestic statute which prescribes, as a condition to the exercise here of the rights derived from the state of New Jersey, that the shareholders shall be liable to the creditors or their representative up to the nominal value of their stock, and there is therefore no statutory, as there is no charter, prohibition against the issuance of the shares of the capital stock for less than their par value as named in the charter, and no statutory mandate that the shares shall be deemed issued and held subject to the payment of such value. Nor do the principles of the common law of this state work such results. In Christensen v. Eno, 106 N. Y. 97, 60 Am. Rep. 429, 12 N. E. 648, 650, the action was brought by a judgment creditor of an insolvent corporation organized under the laws of Illinois to recover 40 per cent of the authorized par value of $100 each of 25 shares of the stock of the company issued to but unsubscribed for by the defendant, upon which the 40 per cent was not paid, but, as a gratuity, was credited as paid, when the stock was issued. Judge Andrews, writing for this court, which reversed the judgment in favor of the plaintiff, said (citing authorities): "But the liability of a shareholder to pay for stock does not arise out of his relation, but depends upon his contract, express or implied, or upon some statute; and in the absence of either of these grounds of liability, we do not perceive how a person to whom shares have been issued as a gratuity has, by accepting them, committed any wrong upon creditors, or made himself liable to pay the nominal face of the shares as upon a subscription or contract." p. 102. The principles which determined our judgment in that case were reaffirmed in Christensen v. Colby, 110 N. Y. 660, 18 N. E. 480.

In the case at bar, no statute supports the alleged liability of the defendant, and the express agreement between the corporation and the defendant was that the defendant should pay 25 per cent of the nominal value of the shares and no more. The respondent contends, however, and therein he has been successful in the courts below, that the creditors of the corporation represented by the plaintiff have the right to compel the payment of the unpaid 75 per cent because the capital stock is a trust fund for the security of the creditors, and that a liability in their favor to the extent of the unpaid part of the nominal value of the actual shares exists and can be enforced. Such contention availed the plaintiff in the Christensen Case until it reached this court, the general term saying therein that the practical effect of the transaction was to take out of the assets, to which the creditors were entitled, the 40 per cent indorsed as paid upon the stock, when in fact it was not paid. It is strenuously urged that this case is not controlled by the principles which decided the Christensen Case, for the reason that the defendant subscribed for the two shares of the capital stock, while in the Christensen Case the stock certificate was merely issued to and accepted by the defendant. The subscription, as expressed in the agreement between the defendant and the corporation, has been completely fulfilled by the payment in full of the sum it bound him to contribute, and therewith his liability to the corporation or the creditors terminated, unless there issued from the trust fund doctrine, through implication, a contract which, in the paramountcy given it by the fact that it was the irresistible product of the law, nullified the expressed stipulation that $25 was the whole sum to be paid upon each share, and substituted in its place the requirement that, as to the creditors, there should be paid $100, or so much thereof as the satisfaction of their demands made necessary. That doctrine has not such potency. Its peculiar vigor is that, contrary to the 51 L.R.A. (N.S.)

common law of England, it secures to the creditors of insolvent corporations or their representatives the right of enforcing subscriptions for shares of which the corporation has deprived itself by release or defeasance. It declares that the capital or capital stock of a corporation is a substitute for the personal liability which subsists in individual or partnership undertakings, and is a fund set apart as a security for the payment of the corporate debts. The capital or capital stock which it thus segregates is not the capital stock authorized or named in the charter of the corporation. If it were, the members would be bound by the doctrine to contribute on account of it the sum within its named value needed to pay the debts of the insolvent corporation. The statement in the charter does not create a security for the creditors. It creates authorized or potential capital stock and shares which, transferred into actual shares through the acquisition of subscribing members and their payments, produces the money or property which, put into a single corporate fund, is the actual capital or capital stock on which the business is undertaken, and the assets or fund contemplated by the trust fund doctrine which the directors or stockholders may not lawfully diminish by appropriating or squandering it or giving it away. And as there is not a fund or security in the nominal or potential shares, there is none in the excess of the nominal value over the subscribed value of the shares. The subscription agreements, as they are enforceable through their express provisions or implication or statutory conditions, are the sources and the measure of the duty of the subscribers. Christensen v. Eno, 106 N. Y. 97, 60 Am. Rep. 429, 12 N. E. 648; Burrall v. Bushwick R. Co. 75 N. Y. 211. The doctrine further declares that unpaid subscriptions are a part of the capital, and that a subscriber cannot be discharged to the injury of creditors by arrangement or device to which creditors do not give their assent, and by which he is to pay less than his subscription. Stoddard v. Lum, 159 N. Y. 265, 45 L.R.A. 551, 70 Am. St. Rep. 541, 53 N. E. 1108; Ward v. City Trust Co. 192 N. Y. 61, 84 N. E. 585; Hazard v. Wight, 201 N. Y. 399, 94 N. E. 855. The doctrine does not create or nullify subscriptions. It lays hold of the assets of an insolvent corporation, and in doing that it compels subscribers to fulfil their legal obligations and perform their legal duties; but it does not beget those duties or obligations; it does not make unlawful or invalid a subscription which, apart from it, was valid and lawful. The question with it is: Has the subscriber fully performed the subscription agreement as it in fact and in law exists? And an affirmative finding renders it inapplicable and inoperative. In the case at bar there were not statutory conditions upon which the shares might be owned. The agreement between the defendant and the corporation expressed with completeness the obligation and liability of the defendant for his shares. He has fulfilled the obligation and thereby destroyed the liability. The trust fund doctrine is inapplicable, and the findings of fact do not constitute a cause of action.

We have not considered or determined either the manner or the extent in which a statute of New Jersey, inimical to the express agreement of the corporation and the defendant, would, through implication, affect it, or the effect of the statement of the corporation that it would locate its plant and carry on its business at Ilion, because the record submitted to us does not present those questions.

The judgment should be reversed, and a new trial granted; costs to abide the event.

Courts — review of municipal action.

1. The court will not ordinarily supervise the action of municipal authorities in establishing fire limits.

Note. — Power to prohibit or restrict repair of wooden buildings within fire limits.

Absolute prohibition.

That structures already in existence may be confiscated by a municipality in view of overriding necessity, such, for instance, as prevention of the spread of a conflagration, is conceded. Whether the two single facts, that a structure is built of combustible material, and that it is located within fire limits, create a sufficiently urgent

The police power, under our Federal system of government, has been left with the states, and the only limit to its exercise in the enactment of laws by their legislatures is that they will not prove repugnant to the fundamental law, the state Constitution, and the Federal Constitution, or laws made under its delegated powers.

Mr. L. B. Wetmore, for appellee:

It looks hard that defendant should be punished for carrying out the true purpose and spirit of the law, even though he may have violated the letter of the law.

First Nat. Bank v. Sarlls, 129 Ind. 201,

13 L.R.A. 481, 28 Am. St. Rep. 185, 28 N. E. 434.

The ordinance is not only confiscatory in its natural and unavoidable effect, but it is unreasonable also. It has the effect of taking the property of the citizen from him without due process of law, and is therefore unconstitutional.

Ibid.; Seneca v. Cochran, 84 S. C. 279, 26 L.R.A.(N.S.) 124, 66 S. E. 288; People ex rel. Standard Bill Posting Co. v. Hastings, 77 Misc. 453, 137 N. Y. Supp. 186; State v. Lyle, 100 N. C. 497, 6 S. E. 379.

The first and main test of an ordinance being valid or not is its reasonableness or unreasonableness, and it is a matter of law for the courts to declare.

buildings previously constructed, simply because they are wooden buildings. Before their destruction or compulsory removal can be justified, they must become nuisances. Yet this ordinance, by forbidding repairs, would accomplish by indirection what could not be done directly. It would first compel the owner to allow it to become and remain a nuisance, and then punish him for so doing by destroying or removing his property."

But this statement is extreme. Notwithstanding the well-settled rule that building ordinances are in general not retroactive, the prevention of danger from possible fires will no doubt justify some direct confiscation (even apart from the matter of repairs) of certain structures in esse which are not nuisances. See, for instance, Re Newell, 2 Cal. App. 767, 84 Pac. 226 (a movable tent "house" used as a place of business); Salem v. Maynes, 123 Mass. 372, and Knoxville v. Bird, 12 Lea, 121, 47 Am. Rep. 326 (new structures scarcely under way); Seattle v. Hinckley, 2 L.R.A.(N.S.) 398, and note (fire escape). The question is one of degree; and the reasonableness which is requisite to bring within the scope of the police power regulations adopted in pursuit of the policy of ultimately discontinuing wooden buildings within fire limits is found, if at all, in contrasting the magnitude of the private loss with the increment to the public safety.

In Morton v. Wessinger, 58 Or. 80, 113 Pac. 7, it was held that an ordinance which made it unlawful to construct frame buildings, or "to alter or enlarge the same," within fire limits, was not intended to and could not apply to the completion of a new frame structure partially finished at the time the ordinance was adopted. Compare this case with Salem v. Maynes and Knoxville v. Bird, supra, on the showing made as to the extent to which the work had progressed. On the subject of remodeling, reconstructing, or augmenting building as construction or erection within fire limit statute or ordinance, see note to Mayville v. Rosing, 26 L.R.A.(N.S.) 120.

The plainest case for outright confiscation by an absolute prohibition of repairs would seem to be where a building is in such a dangerous condition that it cannot be made safe by repairs. This was the situation in Monteleone v. Royal Ins. Co. 47 La. Ann. 1563, 56 L.R.A. 784, 18 So. 472. Speaking obiter, the court gave indication that in such case the prohibition was legitimate. The same opinion was expressed in Com. v. Hayden, 211 Mass. 296, 97 N. E. 783.

In such case, however, the building practically amounts to a nuisance. On the subject of municipal power over wooden building as nuisances, see note in 38 L.R.A. 170.

In First Nat. Bank v. Sarlls, supra, the limitation of permissible repairs to those which might be made for $300, was held arbitrary. The building "may be a mere wreck or remnant which $300 would practically rebuild, or it may be valuable, worth many thousands of dollars, and the cost of repairs, although $300 or more, relatively insignificant." The court was of the opinion that, under general welfare clauses of their charters, cities may doubtless prevent the repair of a wooden building within fire limits, "when to repair would practically be to rebuild," but cannot, "at least without express statutory authority, enforce a general sweeping prohibition of all repairs;" and a query was made even as to the constitutionality of such statutory authority, although the court did not have to decide the point. The case is no authority as to what may be done under an appropriate statute short of absolute prohibition, for, aside from that provision of the charter permitting legislation for the "general welfare," the only clause available to sustain the ordinance was one authorizing the city to "prevent the erection of wooden buildings" within the established fire limits.

Under ordinary conditions, as is conceded in STATE v. LAWING, State v. Johnson, 114 N. C. 846, 19 S. E. 599, and State v. Shannonhouse, — N. C. —, 80 S. E. 881, infra, minor repairs must be permitted. A proprietor, because his building is within fire limits, cannot be compelled to let it go to rack and ruin. O'Brien v. Louer, 158 Ind.

Abbott, Mun. Corp. § 545; Barger v. Smith, 156 N. C. 326, 72 S. E. 376.

Clark, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The charter of Lincolnton (Laws 1899, chap. 369, § 70) provides: "Said board of aldermen may establish fire limits in said town, within which it shall be unlawful for any person to erect, construct, or repair any building of wood or other material inflammable or peculiarly [subject] to fire."

Under authority of above provision of law, the aldermen enacted town ordinance, § 34, as follows: "No person shall erect any building or structure unless the outer walls thereof be of brick, stone or concrete, and covered with metal, stone or other noninflammable roofing, within the fire limits as designated by § 33, on page 8 of the printed ordinances of said town; nor shall any person remove any building, not so constructed from without into, said prescribed fire limits, nor from one place to another within said fire limits; provided, the above ordinance shall not apply to the construction or repair of hitching stalls within said fire limits." The prescribed fire limits are very restricted, and are in the center of the town, and mostly abutting on the courthouse square.

It appears from the special verdict that within the fire limits of the town, the defendant owns a hotel building consisting of a main building, three stories high, constructed of brick, with a two-story ell ex-

211, 61 N. E. 1004; Seneca v. Cochran, 84 S. C. 279, 28 L.R.A. (N.S.) 124, 66 S. E. 288. But as to what degree of restriction or rate of confiscation is reasonable, the cases, as might be expected, are not entirely in accord.

Discretionary prohibition by withholding permit.

In Ex parte Fiske, 72 Cal. 125, 13 Pac. 310, the court considered an ordinance which provided: "No wooden building within the fire limit shall be altered, changed, or repaired without permission in writing signed by a majority of the fire wardens, approved by a majority of the committee on fire department and the mayor, which permit shall fully express the alterations, changes, or repairs allowed, a copy of which shall be filed by the grantee, etc." No doubt was entertained with respect to the validity of this section, except with reference to the provision that certain officers might grant permission to make repairs; and that was sustained upon the ground that an absolute prohibition of repairs would work useless hardships in many cases, and, as a general rule for exceptions could not be established beforehand, the power to grant relief was properly conferred on certain officers, whom the court must presume would not exercise it wantonly nor for purposes of profit or oppression. A similar provision was present and impliedly approved in Griffin v. Gloversville, 67 App. Div. 403, 73 N. Y. Supp. 684.

And in State v. Johnson, supra, the court, referring to Ex parte Fisk, sustained the validity of an ordinance providing: "It shall be unlawful without the consent of the board, for any person or corporation to erect, alter, or repair any wooden building within said fire limit." And in accord with these two cases is State v. Shannonhouse, — N. C. —, 80 S. E. 881, infra.

But in an earlier North Carolina case, State v. Tenant, 110 N. C. 612, 15 L.R.A. 424, 28 Am. St. Rep. 715, 14 S. E. 387, an ordinance which required a permit for the erection of any house or building within the city limits, or any improvement or change in any such building, without specifying the conditions under which permits could be withheld, was declared unconstitutional because it gave arbitrary power to the city authorities. A very similar provision, expressly applicable to repairs, was looked upon with disfavor in Com. v. Corson, 36 Pa. Super. Ct. 7, where the ordinance was held void for uncertainty; and in Newton v. Belger, 143 Mass. 598, 10 N. E. 464, a like ordinance was held void on the ground that no statutory authority existed under which it could be passed; so, also, in State v. Crepeau, 29 R. I. 340, 71 Atl. 449. For a valid statutory authorization to withhold permits in Massachusetts, see Greene v. Damrell, 175 Mass. 394, 56 N. E. 707.

In Roanoke v. Bolling, 101 Va. 182, 43 S. E. 343, the city permitted the repair of damaged buildings not more than one half destroyed, and provided that the city engineer should determine the amount and extent of damage. Where the evidence before the court showed that the building was not more than one half destroyed, it was held that the city was without power to withhold a permit to repair. The court expressly referred to the power granted by charter or statute, which extended only to the prohibition of the erection of wooden buildings within fire limits, to the abatement of nuisances, and the enactment of laws for the general welfare; but the opinion impliedly suggests more fundamental objections to the possibility of vesting an unregulated discretion in administrative officers.

And in Harvey v. Elkins, 65 W. Va. 305, 64 S. E. 247, it was held that the exercise of discretion under an ordinance permitting the withholding of permits must be reasonable, and could not be used to prevent minor repairs to a wooden building, such as replacing a window and part of a wall taken out to remove a safe, changing an inside partition, repapering, changing the electric lights, and painting the building outside. Compare State v. Shannonhouse, — N. C. —, 80 S. E. 881.

tending out therefrom, and the ell (constructed prior to the establishment of any fire limit in the town) is of wood, being an ordinary frame building with a shingle roof. The roof of shingles had become decayed and in such a rotten condition that it leaked badly. The defendant, after the passage of the ordinance above quoted, removed the old rotten shingle roof, and recovered the same with sheet iron.

It cannot be doubted that the people of the state, acting through their legislature, have authority to authorize the governing body of any town to establish fire limits for the protection of life and property therein which would be endangered by fire. There is nothing here to show that the town authorities have acted unreasonably in the establishment of fire limits. Whether they have acted with judgment or not is a matter for the people of the town who can correct their action, if not agreeable, by making their wishes known to the authorities, or by the election of a new board, if necessary. This court has neither the information nor the authority to supervise their conduct, ordinarily at least, though in a case of palpable oppression an injunction might possibly lie until the people of a town can pass upon the matter in the election of officers. As was said by Pearson, Ch. J., in Brodnax v. Groom, 64 N. C. 250, as to the action of county commissioners in matters within their jurisdiction: "This court is not capable of controlling the exercise of power on the part of the general

In Sioux Falls v. Kirby, 6 S. D. 62, 25 L.R.A. 621, 60 N. W. 156 a provision requiring a permit to make repairs to wooden buildings was held invalid on the ground that it created an arbitrary power, although the ordinance contained a clause requiring the issuance of the permit if the inspector is satisfied that the repair is "in compliance with the provisions of this chapter." There was a dissent, however, from this very extreme view.

On the power to enforce the requirement of a permit by making the failure to obtain one a misdemeanor punishable by fine and imprisonment, see State v. Zurich, 49 La. Ann. 447, 21 So. 977 (held not to exist apart from statute); and New Orleans v. Danne-man, 51 La. Ann. 1093, 25 So. 931 (otherwise under express statutory authority).

Generally, on the subject of power of municipality to require permit to construct or repair building within its limits, see note in 13 L.R.A.(N.S.) 737; and as to its power, when granting permit, to impose conditions as to length of time of the continuance of structure, see note in 18 L.R.A.(N.S.) 402.

Power of municipality under charter or statute.

As to what constitutes repair within a fire limit statute or ordinance, see note in 26 L.R.A.(N.S.) 124.

Power to forbid the erection of wooden buildings within fire limits is sometimes held to be inherent in municipal corporations as such, or at least easily inferable from general welfare clauses (McQuillin, Mun. Corp. § 948); but the power to restrict repairs, being an encroachment upon tangible private property, might well be more strictly limited within express terms of conferment. State v. Schuchardt, 42 La. Ann. 49, 7 So. 67, in line with the Sarlis Case, quoted supra, on this point, held that power to prohibit the repair of a roof with combustible material could not be inferred from a charter clause permitting the establishment of fire limits and the prohibition of the erection or reconstruction of wooden buildings therein. Similiter, Reg. v. Howard, 4 Ont. Rep. 377. An even stricter application of the rule was made in Com. v. Hayden, 211 Mass. 296, 97 N. E. 783, where the word "alterations" was held, in the light of the context, not to include repairs. See also Com. v. Corson, supra (in a jurisdiction where, in general, all authority of boroughs with respect to fire limits must be express. McQuillin, Mun. Corp. § 948); and Roanoke v. Bolling, supra.

And see, on the strict construction of confiscatory clauses, Louisville v. Webster, 108 Ill. 414, where the right to prohibit the "erection or repair" of wooden buildings was assumed, and even, arguendo, the right to direct their destruction if damaged more than 50 per cent of their value; but the ordinance involved was held invalid because not strictly in pursuance of statutory authority as to the manner of procedure.

But in Ex parte Cain, 56 Tex. Crim. Rep. 538, 120 S. W. 999, it was said that power to prevent the making of an addition to, or the covering with shingles or other combustible material of, "any building now within the fire limits," unless such "repairs" are less than 20 per cent of the value of the building, was "inherent" in all cities for the "prohibition of and protection against conflagration." The ordinance was applied, however, with respect to an "addition" to a wooden building.

In Ex parte Heidleberg, 51 Tex. Crim. Rep. 581, 103 S. W. 395, the extent of the power conferred upon the municipality was to prohibit the repair of wooden buildings only. The ordinance adopted extended to wooden and other sorts of buildings. For this reason it was held invalid, and a conviction for repairing a wooden building was set aside, as made under an invalid ordinance. The case does not in any way reflect on the power of the legislature to give the authority specified in the statute.

But power to prohibit repair of a wooden building damaged by fire to more than 30 per cent of its value has been held to be authorized by a charter provision permitting the prohibition of the erection or "ad-assembly or of the county authorities, and it cannot assume to do so without putting itself in antagonism as well to the general assembly as to the county authorities, and erecting a despotism of five men, which is opposed to the fundamental principles of our government and usages of all times past. For the exercise of powers conferred by the Constitution, the people must rely upon the honesty of the members of the general assembly and of the persons elected to fill places of trust in the several counties. This court has no power, and is not capable if it had the power, of controlling the exercise of power conferred by the Constitution upon the legislature department of the government or upon the county authorities." The above has been cited and approved in very numerous cases. See Citations in Anno. ed.

It may be noted that, since this ordinance was adopted May 13, 1912, there has been an election of a new governing board for the said town, and the ordinance must have been approved by the people of the town and the new officials, as it has not been repealed.

The decisions are thus summed up: "The prevention of and protection against conflagration is generally recognized as an apdition" to buildings within fire limits whose outer walls are not composed of certain materials. Davidson v. Walla Walla, 52 Wash. 453, 21 L.R.A.(N.S.) 454, 132 Am. St. Rep. 983, 100 Pac. 981. Compare Roanoke v. Bolling, 101 Va. 182, 43 S. E. 343, supra, and Harvey v. Elkins, 65 W. Va. 305, 64 S. E. 247, supra.

And authority to prescribe the materials to be used in buildings has been held to warrant restrictions of major repairs without a permit, or any repairs at all, if the building is damaged to more than one third of its value. State v. Shannonhouse, — N. C. —, 80 S. E. 881, infra.

Prohibition against increase of fire risk; manner of repair.

It seems to be generally conceded that all repairs of wooden buildings which tend to increase the existing fire risk may be forbidden by ordinances passed under appropriate statutory authority.

A prohibition of repairs with other than fireproof material, enacted under a charter provision which gave power to prohibit the erection, placing, or repairing of wooden buildings within established fire limits, was sustained in King v. Davenport, 98 Ill. 305, 38 Am. Rep. 89, which was an action of trespass for the removal by the authorities of a new shingle roof erected by plaintiff's testatrix. In Skaneateles v. Hennessey, 62 Misc. 347, 116 N. Y. Supp. 788, the court departed from the issue to express an opinion upholding the same restriction stated in somewhat more general terms. The provision was also present in Chimene v. Baker, 32 Tex. App. 520, 75 S. W. 330, but not passed upon, the ordinance being sustained as to a prohibition of the erection of a building with combustible materials. See, however, State v. Schuchardt and other cases cited supra.

In O'Brien v. Louer, 158 Ind. 211, 61 N. E. 1004, supra, the ordinance forbade repair in any manner that would make the building more susceptible to fire, and required a permit from the city authorities to make repairs. The case, however, is authority only for the proposition that a remodeling of the store fronts and interior partitions of the lower floor is not within the prohibition of this ordinance. 51 L.R.A.(N.S.)

In Brady v. Northwestern Ins. Co. 11 Mich. 425, the court entertained no doubt of the validity of an ordinance prohibiting the repair of a building partially destroyed by fire without the permission of the common council, and providing that permission should not be granted where the repairs would "increase the fire risk." And see also State v. Johnson, 114 N. C. 846, 19 S. E. 599.

There seems to be a possible distinction, however, between the fire risk of a district and that of a particular building; and in line with the decision in STATE v. LAWING, a law directed toward diminishing the risk of the district is sometimes applied in a case where the effect of the proposed improvements will be to make the building itself less dangerous than it is as it stands. Lederer Realty Corp. v. Hopkins, — R. I. —, 71 Atl. 456.

The earlier cases on this branch of the subject are collected in the note to Davison v. Walla Walla, 21 L.R.A.(N.S.) 454.

Patterson v. Johnson, 214 Ill. 481, 73 N. E. 761, involved an ordinance which, without regard to fire limits, made it unlawful to repair, reconstruct, or remove any frame building injured more than 50 per cent of its original value by wear and tear, by the effect of the elements, or by fire. Upon an issue which arose over the removal of such a building, the validity of the ordinance was sustained.

The rule laid down in State v. Shannonhouse, supra, with respect to the keeping up of existing wooden buildings within fire limits, was as follows: The prohibition of trivial repairs is not within the scope of the police power, and cannot be effected; the unqualified prohibition of repairs by ordinance, where the building is damaged more than one third of its value, is valid under statutory authority to "prescribe the character of any building, and the materials to be used in any building, within fire limits." Between these two extremes and under the same statutory authority, administrative officers may be vested with discretionary power to withhold permits to make repairs, and it was held not an unreasonable exercise of such discretion to refuse to permit a piazza to be torn away and replaced with new timber. C. F. L.

propriate exercise of the police power by municipalities, and the enactment of ordinances establishing fire limits, and forbidding the use of inflammable materials in buildings or in the erection thereof within such limits, has been uniformly sustained as proper methods of its exercise. While some courts hold that this power is inherent in a municipality, it nevertheless usually exists only by reason of an express grant or a necessarily implied statutory or constitutional delegation." 28 Cyc. 741.

Even in the absence of statutory authority, it has been held that the town authorities have the power to prohibit the repairing or altering of wooden buildings within prescribed limits. Ex parte Fiske, 72 Cal. 125, 13 Pac. 310; King v. Davenport, 98 Ill. 305, 38 Am. Rep. 89; State v. O'Neil, 49 La. Ann. 1171, 22 So. 352; Brady v. Northwestern Ins. Co. 11 Mich. 425. In First Nat. Bank v. Sarlls, 129 Ind. 201, 13 L.R.A. 481, 28 Am. St. Rep. 185, 28 N. E. 434, it was held that the power to prohibit the repair of a building did not exist unless granted by the general law or by the charter of a town. This last is the case here.

In our own state, in State v. Tenant, 110 N. C. 609, 15 L.R.A. 423, 28 Am. St. Rep. 715, 14 S. E. 387, the ordinance was held invalid solely because it left the matter of such building to the arbitrary discretion of the board of aldermen, and did not, as in this case, prescribe a uniform rule of action governing the exercise of the discretion.

In this instance, the town, under the express provisions of the charter, has power to pass the ordinance prohibiting the erecting or repairing of a wooden building, and, in State v. Johnson, 114 N. C. 846, 19 S. E. 599, an ordinance such as the one now under consideration was sustained against the defendant, who was prosecuted for making repairs to a house that had been partially destroyed by fire.

In Durham v. Eno Cotton Mills, 141 N. C. 635, 7 L.R.A.(N.S.) 321, 54 S. E. 460, Walker, J., says, in speaking of a somewhat similar act to protect the waters of creeks, etc., from pollution: "The design of the act is not to take property for public use, nor does it do so within the meaning of the Constitution. It is intended to restrain and regulate the use of private property to as to protect the common right of all the citizens of the state. Such acts are plainly within the police power of the legislature, which power is the mere application to the whole community of the maxim, Sic utere tuo, ut alienum non laedas; nor does such restraint, although it may interfere with the profitable use of the property by its owner, make it an appropriation to a public use, so as to entitle him to compensation." After citing various authorities it is further said: "Many instances of such an exercise of this power can be found. The state regulates the use of property in intoxicating liquors by restraining their sale, not on the ground that each particular sale does injury, for then the sale would be prohibited, but for the reason that their unrestricted sale tends to injure the public morals and comfort. The state is not bound to wait until contagion is communicated from a hospital established in the heart of a city; it may prohibit the establishment of such a hospital there, because it is likely to spread contagion. So, the keeping of dangerous explosives and inflammable substances and the erection of buildings of combustible materials within the limits of a dense population may be prohibited because of the probability or possibility of public injury. Such instances might be indefinitely multiplied; but these are sufficient to illustrate this case. The object of this legislation is to protect the public comfort and health. For that purpose the legislature may restrain any use of private property which tends to the injury of those public interests."

It is urged that the placing of a metal roof upon this wooden ell makes it not more dangerous, but less so. But this loses sight of the object of the ordinance, which is not only to prohibit the building of wooden buildings within the prescribed limits, but, while not requiring the pulling down of the wooden buildings now within the limits, prohibits their repair in order to prevent their indefinite continuance therein, as would be the case if they can be repaired from time to time. As was said in State v. Johnson, supra, this does not prohibit slight repairs, such as putting in broken windows, or hanging a shutter, or fixing up the steps. But it does prohibit such repair, as in this case, of putting on a new roof, which makes the building habitable and thereby insures its continuance. This is contrary to the spirit and the letter of the ordinance, and defeats its purpose, which is to permit only brick, concrete, or stone buildings to be erected, and contemplates the discontinuance of wooden buildings as fast as they become by decay unfit for further use or habitation. The substantial repair of such buildings is therefore forbidden.

In State v. Baskerville, 141 N. C. 818, 53 S. E. 744, Hoke, J., says: "It is well established that an act of the legislature will never be declared unconstitutional, unless it plainly and clearly appears that the general assembly has exceeded its powers." In Ogden v. Saunders, 12 Wheat. 213, 6 L.

ed. 606, and Cooley, Const. Lim. 7th ed. 253, the Supreme Court of the United States held that "no act should be held unconstitutional unless it is clearly so beyond a reasonable doubt."

The action of the legislature authorizing the enactment of this ordinance, and of the board of aldermen in passing it, is not a taking of private property for public uses; but it is the restriction of the defendant in the unlimited use of his property by virtue of the police power (Dill. Mun. Corp. 301, 727), for the purpose of protecting the community from the dangers to which the public would be exposed by the continuance of a wooden building in that locality, by the requirement that, when it becomes unusable by decay, it shall be replaced by a safer construction than wood.

Upon the special verdict the court should have directed that the jury return a verdict of guilty.

Re Cramond, 145 Fed. 966, 17 Am. Bankr. Rep. 22, following Re Emslie, supra.

In South End Improv. Co. v. Harden, — N. J. Eq. —, 52 Atl. 1127, upon a bill of interpleader filed by the owner to determine the relative priorities of the claims of materialmen who had filed stop notices, the court held that the legal demands of the materialmen, followed by service of notices upon the builder, created a lien or equitable assignment of the amount due the materialmen on the funds in the hands of the builder; and the rights of all materialmen who had served legal stop notices before the filing of the petition in bankruptcy by the builder were enforceable in the state court.

A mechanics' lien claimant who, upon the adjudication of the contractor in bankruptcy, participates in a creditors' meeting and proves his claim, having waived the lien as required by § 56b of the bankruptcy act as a condition of such participation, cannot assert the lien against the proceeds of the contract, in the trustees' hands, though the waiver was by mistake made broader than gether with such other statements from the record as are necessary to a full understanding of the questions presented to this court for decision, so that no examination of the record itself need be made in this court.

Statute — construction — mechanics' lien.

6. The provisions of the mechanics' lien law should be interpreted so as to carry out the object had in view by the legislature in enacting it; namely, the security of the classes of persons named in the act, upon its provisions being in good faith substantially complied with on their part.

Mechanics' lien — inaccuracy in contractor's name — effect.

7. Where materials are furnished by a subcontractor to a firm of building contractors composed of K. & S., for the erection of a building, and in his statement for a lien such subcontractor names K. as the person with whom he dealt as the contractor, and where there is nothing to indicate that the owner of the land whereon the building was erected was misled or injured by the failure of the subcontractor to correctly state the name of the contractor, such subcontractor's lien will not be declared invalid because of such error.

On Petition for Rehearing.

Mechanics' lien — parties — contractor.

8. Under the provisions of § 6156, Comp. Laws 1909, where an action is brought by a subcontractor or materialman to enforce a lien against the property of the owner, the original contractor is an indispensable party thereto.

Same — bankruptcy — trustee.

9. Where, however, in such case, the original contractor during the construction of a building is adjudged a bankrupt, the bankruptcy trustee should be made a party defendant in actions by subcontractors or was intended, the intention being to waive only the lien upon the bankrupt's property, and not upon the improvement itself, since, after the payment into the bankruptcy court of the amount due under the contract, the fund constitutes assets, and the waiver applies to it. Brown v. City Nat. Bank, 72 Misc. 201, 131 N. Y. Supp. 92, 26 Am. Bankr. Rep. 638.

A mechanics' lien or stop notice filed by a subcontractor within four months before the contractor's bankruptcy is neither a lien obtained by legal proceedings, nor an encumbrance created by the bankrupt, so as to render it assailable by the trustee as within the liens or assignments invalidated by § 67 of the bankruptcy act. Re Emslie, 42 C. C. A. 350, 102 Fed. 291, 4 Am. Bankr. Rep. 126; Fehling v. Goings, 67 N. J. Eq. 375, 58 Atl. 642, 13 Am. Bankr. Rep. 154, followed in National Fire Proofing Co. v. 51 L.R.A. (N.S.)

materialmen, and the unenforceable judgment taken against him made the basis upon which the liens claimed against the property are predicated.

Same — enforcement — effect of bankruptcy.

10. Where, on the construction of a building, the principal contractor becomes a bankrupt, and the owner requests or consents to an order of the bankruptcy court directing the receiver or trustee of such contractor to complete his contract, and such order is made, the mere fact of bankruptcy of the original contractor will not preclude recovery against the owner, or the enforcement of a lien against the property for services rendered or materials furnished within the scope of the contract.

Appeal — reversal — absence of party — new trial.

11. On an action brought to enforce against the property liens claimed by subcontractors and materialmen, and the original contractor is not made a party, the judgment will not be reversed and rendered, but the case will be remanded to allow such original contractor to be made a party, and a new trial granted therein.

ERROR to the District Court for Oklahoma County to review a judgment in plaintiffs' favor in a suit to foreclose a mechanics' lien. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. John S. Hunter for plaintiffs in error.

Messrs. Burwell, Crockett, & Johnson for Oklahoma Brick Company.

Messrs. Oliver C. Black and H. Y. Thompson, for trustee:

An adjudication in bankruptcy of a build-

Daly, 76 N. J. Eq. 35, 74 Atl. 152, affirmed without opinion in 77 N. J. Eq. 583, 78 Atl. 1135.

But it is held in Fairlamb v. Smedley Constr. Co. 36 Pa. Super. Ct. 17, 22 Am. Bankr. Rep. 824, that a suit by a subcontractor against a contractor, in which the owner is summoned as garnishee, is "a legal proceeding" within the meaning of § 67 of the bankruptcy act providing that all liens obtained through legal proceedings within four months prior to the filing of the petition are void, and that the property affected by the lien shall be discharged therefrom. It was held, therefore, that where the suit was brought within four months of bankruptcy, the proceeding would be dissolved at the motion of the trustees who intervened.

Where the lien arises from the act of filing, and not from doing work or furnishing material, the filing of a lien after banking contractor does not cut off the right of a materialman to file and enforce a lien.

ruptcy is ineffective to give the lienor any rights as against the contractor's trustee.

Thus, pointing out that the lien given by the New Jersey statute upon money due for public improvements does not arise from doing the work or furnishing materials, but from filing notice, the court in John Agnew Co. v. Board of Education, — N. J. Eq. —, 89 Atl. 1046, held that an order of the bankruptcy court appointing a general receiver for the bankrupt contractor, directing the transfer of the estate to the receiver by the bankrupt, and enjoining all other persons from transferring or otherwise interfering with the assets, placed the property in custodia legis, and rendered ineffectual the subsequent filing of laborers' and materialmen's liens against the fund due the contractor. See also Re Roeber, infra.

So, it is held that, in view of § 70a of the bankruptcy act, vesting title to the bankrupt's property in the trustee as of the date of the adjudication, the lien upon the amount due for a public improvement under a statute providing that the same attaches from the date of its filing cannot, as against the contractor's trustee in voluntary bankruptcy, be created by filing the same after the filing of the petition, where the adjudication occurs on the same day. Garretson v. Clark, — N. J. Eq. —, 57 Atl. 414. In this case it appeared that the lien was filed before the adjudication, but the court said in effect that this made no difference where the petition was filed and the adjudication made on the same day.

But, where the mechanics' lien statute is construed by the state court to give a preferential statutory right in the nature of an equitable lien until the expiration of the time allowed for filing a lien, the failure of a subcontractor to file a lien until after the adjudication of the contractor in bankruptcy does not give the trustee priority

Kane, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This was a suit to foreclose a mechanics' lien, commenced by the defendant in error, R. H. Drennan, who was plaintiff below, against Lena L. Eberle and John M. Eberle, in which the other defendants in error and the cross petitioner, the Oklahoma Brick Company, were made defendants. A referee made findings of fact and conclusions of law, upon which there was a decree entered in favor of all the lienholding defendants, except the Oklahoma Brick Company (and a few other claimants who did not appeal), whereupon Lena L. Eberle and John M. Eberle, plaintiffs in error, commenced this proceeding in error, to reverse the decree of the several lienholds, and the brick company appealed from the action of the court in refusing to allow its lien.

It seems: That on the 7th day of July, 1906, Robert Kruger and John M. Eberle signed a written contract in their own over the subcontractor, where he filed a lien within the time allowed by the state statute. Crane Co. v. Pneumatic Signal Co. 94 App. Div. 53, 87 N. Y. Supp. 917, 11 Am. Bankr. Rep. 747, affirmed without opinion in 182 N. Y. 545, 75 N. E. 1128. In rendering a like decision in Re Grissler, 69 C. C. A. 406, 136 Fed. 754, 13 Am. Bankr. Rep. 508, the court refers to a contrary decision rendered by it in Re Roeber, 57 C. C. A. 565, 121 Fed. 449, 9 Am. Bankr. Rep. 303, which, pointing out that the state (New York) statute gave a lien from the time of the filing of notice thereof, followed decisions of the state court cited as holding that, until the filing of the lien, the subcontractor is merely a general creditor, and holding that therefore the intervention of the contractor's bankruptcy before such filing gave the trustee rights superior to those of the subcontractor. In the Grissler Case it is declared that after the decision in Re Roeber, the New York court of appeals held in John P. Kane Co. v. Kinney, 174 N. Y. 69, 66 N. E. 619, that the mechanics' lien act gave a preferential right during the time allowed for filing. It is also to be noted that this correction of Re Roeber, supra, re-establishes the excellent opinion of the district court in that case in 121 Fed. 444, 9 Am. Bankr. Rep. 778, which, until the decision of the Grissler Case, stood reversed.

Where, by stipulation between the contractor's trustee and the subcontractor who filed a lien after the bankruptcy, the liens were discharged and the money paid to the trustee, it was held that the subcontractor's lien was valid, and that he was entitled to payment out of the fund received by the trustee. Re Huston, 7 Am. Bankr. Rep. 92 (referee), citing and following the unreported case of Re Smith, decided by Judge Thomas in the eastern district of New York.

An agreement between the owner and name, by the terms of which Kruger was to erect and complete a brick business house for Eberle on certain lots which, it afterwards developed, belonged to Eberle's wife. In pursuance to said contract, said Kruger, together with one Henry Sessing, proceeded to erect the house upon said lots, and it was in furnishing materials to Kruger on this contract the liens sought to be foreclosed arose. That on the 19th day of December, 1906, and before the completion of said building, Robt. Kruger filed his voluntary petition in bankruptcy, and was on the same day adjudged a bankrupt, and Robt. Eacock was duly appointed receiver for the bankrupt estate, and the proceedings in bankruptcy were then and there duly referred to the referee in bankruptcy for final settlement. Thereafter the defendants in error filed with the clerk of the district court their several mechanics' lien statements against the property in controversy, and about the same time they each filed with the court of bankruptcy their money demand and claim against the estate of Robt. Kruger, bankrupt, covering the same items and subject-matter, and in like amount as set forth in their several mechanics' lien statements, except they did not plead their claim for a mechanics' lien in the bankruptcy court. Each of the claims thus filed was approved in favor of the claimants, and judgment rendered thereon against the estate of Robt. Kruger. Thereafter Mr. Drennan commenced this action, as aforesaid, making the Eberles the trustee in bankruptcy, and all the other lien claimants parties defendant.

The contentions of plaintiffs in error are indicated by the following propositions in the form of questions quoted from the brief of their counsel: "(1) Can a mechanics' lien be had or maintained where the contract for the improvement of a tract or piece of land is not made with the owner? (2) Can a subcontractor or materialman principal contractor extending the time for completing the work is binding upon the contractor's trustee in bankruptcy in a controversy between the trustee and subcontractors claiming to have filed liens within the time allowed therefor after the completion of the work. Harrison v. Knaffl, — Tenn. —, 161 S. W. 1003.

The superiority of the claimant's rights over those of the contractor's trustee is held by a New York court not to have been affected by the amendment of 1910 to § 47a of the bankruptcy act, wherein it was enacted that the trustee, as to all property in, or coming into, the custody of the bankruptcy court, shall be vested with all the rights of a lien creditor; and also, as to all property not in the custody of the bankruptcy court, shall be deemed vested with all the rights of a judgment creditor holding an execution duly returned unsatisfied. Hildreth Granite Co. v. Watervliet, 161 App. Div. 420, 146 N. Y. Supp. 449, 31 Am. Bankr. Rep. 703, reversing 82 Misc. 243, 143 N. Y. Supp. 867, 30 Am. Bankr. Rep. 789.

Right to enforce lien against the property improved.

On this point the present note supplements the earlier one appended to Pike Bros. Lumber Co. v. Mitchell, 26 L.R.A. (N.S.) 409. It will be observed that in the case just cited the right to enforce the lien against the improvement was denied, while in EBERLE v. DRENNAN it is allowed.

In Hastings v. Thompson, 47 Pa. Super. Ct. 424, involving an action against the owner to enforce a mechanics' lien, it was held that the plaintiff's claim attached as of the date when the first work was done, and that during the time allowed by the 51 L.R.A. (N.S.)

statute for filing the lien, the plaintiff had a preferential statutory claim which was perfected by filing the lien after the adjudication of the contractor in bankruptcy. It was therefore held, as in cases in the above subdivisions involving the respective rights of the trustee and the subcontractor under similar state statutes, that the lien was not obtained through legal proceedings so as to render it null under § 67 of the bankruptcy act. The court further held that the plaintiff's lien extended to work done after the adjudication, and that his rights in this respect were not affected by the Pennsylvania statute providing that where bankruptcy proceedings are instituted against any contractor or owner, they operate to suspend all proceedings upon any contract or subcontract with him, and if he be adjudged a bankrupt, then the contractor or subcontractor may, at his option, refuse to proceed further under the contract.

Pike Bros. Lumber Co. v. Mitchell, supra, which is also reported in 132 Ga. 675, 26 L.R.A. (N.S.) 409, 64 S. E. 998, was followed in Rome Brick Co. v. West, 134 Ga. 65, 67 S. E. 400, holding that, in order to foreclose a materialman's lien for materials furnished the contractor to be used in improving the property of another, it is necessary that the materialman have judgment against the contractor in a previous action, or that the contractor be sued concurrently in the foreclosure proceedings with the owner of the property improved; and that, if the contractor be adjudged a bankrupt, so that no judgment in personam can be had against him in an action at law, his immunity from liability to a personal judgment will not give the materialman a right to foreclose his lien in equity against the property improved. Note, in this connection, EBERLE v. DRENNAN. L. A. W.

or workman bring an action and foreclose his mechanics' lien against the owners of property, where there is no privity of contract between the owner and such subcontractor or materialman or workman, without making the original contractor, or his personal representative, a party to such action, and procuring first a personal judgment against the original contractor? (3) Were any of the mechanics' lien claimants in this case subcontractors or materialmen that come within the terms of our statute?"

The referee found, and his findings are entitled to the same weight as the special verdict of a jury, that John M. Eberle and Lena Eberle were husband and wife, and that the title to the property described was in Lena Eberle; that whilst the title to the land in question was in Lena Eberle, and the contract for the building was signed by John M. Eberle, yet he was acting as the agent of the wife in his transactions with Kruger, and all his actions were ratified by his wife, with full knowledge of all that had been done. As this finding is amply supported by the evidence, it disposes of the first contention of plaintiffs in error.

It is true, as contended by counsel, that the statute (§ 6151, Comp. Laws 1909) requires that the labor or material for which a lien is claimed must be furnished under a contract with the owner of the land, but a contract made through the agency of one who is authorized to represent the owner, or whose acts are fully ratified by the owner with full knowledge of all the facts, is the contract of the owner of the land within the meaning of the statute.

On the second proposition, the referee found that, the claims having been adjudicated and allowed in the bankruptcy court, the trustee being a party to this action, and a general prayer for relief being asked, the principal obligor is sufficiently a party to this action to entitle the parties otherwise entitled thereto to a foreclosure. No authorities are cited in support of this proposition by counsel for any of the parties. Counsel for plaintiffs in error cites some authorities to the effect that an original contractor is a necessary and indispensable party to an action to foreclose a mechanics' lien by a subcontractor. Phillips, Mechanics' Liens, § 395, p. 643; Rockel, Mechanics' Liens, § 229, p. 553; O'Brien v. Gooding, 194 Ill. 466, 62 N. E. 898; 27 Cyc. 435. Those cases differ from the one at bar, however, in that there was no trustee in bankruptcy in them who was made a party to the foreclosure proceedings. Whatever may be said upon the merits of the foregoing contention or the correctness of the referee's conclusion, the second contention of the plaintiffs in error must be decided against them on another ground. It is well settled that a defect of parties must be taken advantage of by demurrer if the defect appears upon the face of the pleading, otherwise by an answer; and if such objection is not made by way of demurrer or answer, then the defect is deemed to be waived. Wyman v. Herard, 9 Okla. 35, 59 Pac. 1009; Miller v. Campbell Commission Co. 13 Okla. 75, 74 Pac. 507; Culbertson v. Mann, 30 Okla. 249, 120 Pac. 918. The plaintiffs in error, having failed to raise this question in any of their pleadings, are precluded from raising it at this time.

On the third proposition the referee found that the successful lienholders furnished the material and performed the labor which was used in the construction of said building under contracts with Kruger, the contractor. The statute (§ 6153, Comp. Laws 1909) provides that "any person who shall furnish any such material or perform such labor under a subcontract with the contractor, or as an artisan or day laborer in the employ of such contractor, may obtain a lien. . . ." There is no contention that the finding of the referee is not based upon sufficient evidence. It seems to us that under that finding the materialmen and laborers embraced therein were entitled to a lien.

There is another assignment of error, to the effect that the court erred in sustaining a demurrer to the first, third, and fourth counts of the plea and answer, filed by these plaintiffs in error to the amended petition and several cross petitions in the district court. As counsel has not complied with rule 25 of this court, in that he has not set forth the material parts of the pleadings to which the demurrer was sustained, together with such other statements of the record as are necessary to a full understanding of the questions presented to this court for decision, so that no examination of the record itself need be made in this court, we will not pass upon this assignment.

The finding of the referee in relation to the claim of the Oklahoma Brick Company was set aside by the court, and a new finding of fact by the court was substituted therefor, as follows: "That the Oklahoma Brick Company furnished the material, consisting of building brick for use in the erection of the building in controversy herein, to N. E. Sessing and Robt. Kruger, a partnership composed of Robt. Kruger and N. E. Sessing; that said brick were all used in the erection of said building, but that, the same having been furnished to the said firm of Sessing & Kruger, the said Oklahoma Brick Company is not entitled to any lien on said building; that there remains due and unpaid on said account the sum of $223.56."

On the authority of First Nat. Bank v. Oklahoma Nat. Bank, 29 Okla. 411, 118 Pac. 574, the cross petitioner contends that the court below was without authority to reject the findings of the referee and substitute findings of its own. Without passing upon that question, it seems to us the court drew an erroneous conclusion of law from the facts found by it. It is true that there is some evidence in the record tending to support the findings of the court that Kruger and Sessing were partners in so far as the brickwork of the building under construction was concerned; but, it being admitted that the brick company furnished the material for use in the building in controversy under a contract with Kruger, a member of the firm, the fact that Kruger and Sessing were partners would not deprive the claimant of its lien merely because its statement named Kruger alone as the person to whom the materials were furnished. The purpose of the mechanics' lien law is to afford security to a designated class of persons. The statute provides the procedure to be followed in order to come within the provisions of the law, and if one of that class furnishes material which is actually used in the construction of a building, and subsequently complies with the provisions of the law relative to the procedure necessary to establish a lien, he should not be divested of his right by reason of his failure to state with precision the party to whom the material was furnished. This is particularly true where it is not made to appear that the party against whose property the lien is claimed has been injured by reason of any such technical defect. The essential fact to be set out in the lien statement is that certain materials were furnished which were actually used in the construction of the building on certain described premises. The purpose of naming the contractor in such statement is apparently to apprise the owner under what authority the material was furnished, and thereby afford him protection as to payments to be made to the contractor; and unless the owner has been misled to his injury by reason of the erroneous designation of the parties by whom the materials were furnished, such a defect is not fatal.

In Putnam v. Ross, 46 Mo. 337, the notice of claim stated that the indebtedness was due from Ross & Shane, contractors. It turned out that the claim was against Ross alone, his former partner. The owners of the premises insisted that the error in the notice was fatal to the plaintiffs' 51 L.R.A. (N.S.)

lien but the court says: "The defendants' view seems to be founded upon the theory that the mechanics' lien enactment is in derogation of the common law, and that its provisions are therefore to be construed with a rigid strictness against those who seek to avail themselves of its intended benefits. There may be decisions which lend support to that theory, but the better opinion is that the provisions of the mechanics' lien law should be interpreted so as to carry out the object had in view by the legislature in enacting it; namely, the security of the classes of persons named in the act, upon its provisions being in good faith substantially complied with on their part. It has become the settled policy of this state, as in most, if not all, the states, to secure mechanics and materialmen by giving them a lien upon the property they have contributed to improve or create. The law itself has grown up from small beginnings to its present unquestioned importance. And the whole course of legislation on the subject shows that it has been the intention of the legislature to avoid unfriendly strictness and mere technicality. The spirit and purpose of the law is to do substantial justice to all parties who may be affected by its provisions. It has therefore been enacted (Gen. Stat. 1865, p. 911, § 19) that when a party who deals with the principal contractor, and not directly with the owner, wishes to avail himself of the benefits of the enactment, he shall notify the owner, ten days in advance of filing the lien, of his purpose to do so, stating in the notice the amount of his claim, and 'from whom it is due.' The plaintiffs sought to comply with that requirement, but failed to state with precision who was their debtor, giving the name of a business firm, instead of the name of the party who had been the senior member of that firm. He gave the name of his real debtor, but erroneously coupled with it the name of a third party who was not liable. Were the defendants misled to their injury by this mistake? If so, they ought not to suffer in consequence of the plaintiffs' inadvertence. But there is no probability that they were harmed by the error. At all events, it is not to be so presumed in the absence of evidence. If the error wrought the defendants any harm, it cannot be difficult for them to show it; but they aver nothing and prove nothing in that direction. Their objections rest on purely technical and overcritical grounds."

Substantially the same conclusion was reached in Tibbetts v. Moore, 23 Cal. 208, 9 Mor. Min. Rep. 348, where it was held that a notice which stated that the materials were furnished to "Moore & Company" was sufficient, although the materials were in fact furnished to Moore alone. And in Hauptman v. Catlin, 3 E. D. Smith (N. Y. C. P.) 666, where it was held that where a notice stated a claim against A and B, his wife, upon a contract with A alone, and the contract was in fact made by the husband, acting merely as the agent of his wife, the notice was sufficient.

The supreme court of Kansas (First Presb. Church v. Santy, 52 Kan. 462, 34 Pac. 974) passed upon the same question in a case somewhat similar to the case at bar. In that case the materials were actually furnished to a partnership, but in the lien statement the subcontractor named only the individual member with whom he dealt as the contractor. In discussing the question now under consideration, Mr. Justice Allen says: "In the statement filed by the Hutchinson Hardware Company, the trustees are named as the owners of the building, and George E. Thompson, one of the contractors, alone is named as the contractor. It is urged that this is insufficient; that the church corporation should have been named as the owner, and the firm name of Thompson, Hanna, & Company should have been given as the contractors. Section 3, art. 12, of the Constitution reads: 'The title to all property of religious corporations shall vest in trustees, whose election shall be by the members of such corporation.' In the statement five persons are named as trustees of the First Presbyterian Church of Hutchinson. As the legal title to the property, under the constitutional provision, is vested in the trustees, and, as they were named, not as individuals, but as trustees of the church corporation, the statement is clearly sufficient in that respect. George Thompson, one of the firm of Thompson, Hanna, & Company, is alone named as the contractor. It appears that the materials furnished by the hardware company were in fact sold and charged to Thompson, but were so sold to be used in the erection of the church building, and the items charged were entered on the daybook as for the church. Thompson alone was not the contractor, but he was the head of the firm who were the contractors. He, in fact, bought all of the hardware from the company for the purpose of using it in the erection of the building. It was so used. The plaintiff in error had the full benefit of it, and unless the defendants in error have failed to comply substantially with the law, they should be protected in their lien. The object of naming the contractor would seem to be to apprise the owner and other persons by what authority and under whom the subcontractor claims a right to his lien. Now, it might happen, doubtless often does, that subcontractors are not informed as to the names of all persons interested in the original contract and the firm name in which the contract is taken. It would not be just, nor does the spirit of the statute require, that subcontractors should be defeated of their liens if they make a mistake by incorrectly naming the original contractors, where the name is given of the contractor with whom they dealt, and who was, in fact, in charge of the work of erecting the building as a contractor. Tibbetts v. Moore, supra; Davis v. Livingston, 29 Cal. 283; Putnam v. Ross, 46 Mo. 337; Brown v. Welch, 5 Hun, 582."

It seems to us that under the foregoing authorities the court should have allowed the lien of the Oklahoma Brick Company upon its own findings of fact. In all other respects the judgment of the court below is affirmed, and the cause remanded, with directions to enter judgment in accordance with the views herein expressed.

All the Justices concur, except Dunn, J., absent.

A petition for rehearing having been filed, Dunn, J., on November 4, 1913, handed down the following response:

On the coming down of the original opinion in this case plaintiffs in error filed their petition for rehearing, as also did H. Y. Thompson, successor of W. C. Pierce, who was trustee in bankruptcy for Kruger, the original contractor. It is insisted by plaintiffs in error: First, that by and on account of the bankruptcy of the original contractor, the claims for liens against the property of these plaintiffs in error on the part of the subcontractors and materialmen were wiped out; that there is but one debt, which is the debt of the contractor, and when this is settled, either by payment or bankruptcy, the foundation for the lien fails, and to support this claim cite the case of Pike Bros. Lumber Co. v. Mitchell, 132 Ga. 675, 26 L.R.A.(N.S.) 409, 64 S. E. 998, and some other cases from that jurisdiction. Counsel for the lien claimants as against this contention cite, among others, the following authorities: Re Huston, 7 Am. Bankr. Rep. 92; Crane Co. v. Pneumatic Signal Co. 42 Misc. 338, 86 N. Y. Supp. 711, 94 App. Div. 53, 87 N. Y. Supp. 917, 11 Am. Bankr. Rep. 747; Re Grissler, 69 C. C. A. 406, 136 Fed. 754, 13 Am. Bankr. Rep. 508—to support the proposition that an adjudication of bankruptcy of the original contractor does not cut off the right of a subcontractor or materialman to file and enforce his lien against the owner's land; and in our judgment it was not the intention of the legislature in its passage of the mechanics' lien act to provide that the insolvency or bankruptcy of the principal contractor should defeat the claims mentioned. See also John P. Kane Co. v. Kinney, 174 N. Y. 69, 66 N. E. 619. It is true § 6156, Comp. Laws 1909, provides that the original contractor shall be made a party defendant in all such actions, and it is further true that where he has become a bankrupt he cannot be sued and the liability enforced personally against him, but the very purpose of the act is to subject the property of the owner to the payment of the debts incurred by the original contractor when he does not pay them himself, and it would be a strange anomaly if, when that very condition arises and the original contractor availed himself of the bankruptcy statute, the law which was made to protect such of his creditors would then, when needed most, wholly fail. When the owner begins to construct his building, engages his contractor, and the contractor purchases material or employs laborers, they all act with this statute in view, and with the knowledge on the part of all that the liability of the original contractor to materialmen and laborers within the scope of his contract may, on his failure to meet it, be enforced against the property. Under the authorities, the death of the original contractor will not defeat such claims, and his executor or administrator is properly made a party to the proceeding. Vernon v. Harper, 79 Ohio St. 181, 20 L.R.A.(N.S.) 44, 86 N. E. 882. And we can see no reason why the trustee in bankruptcy might not likewise be made the party defendant. Hence we conclude and agree with counsel for the claimants that the bankruptcy of the original contractor in this case did not wipe out the right to the lien of the materialmen and subcontractors.

But, it is contended, and the record discloses, that although nominally made a party, no prayer was made against the trustee, and no judgment taken establishing the debt of the subcontractors and materialmen as a foundation for their lien against the property of the plaintiffs in error, and this failure is made the ground for the insistence of the plaintiffs in error that the action must fail and the liens awarded by the judgment of the trial court be set aside and its judgment reversed. In this contention we are constrained to concur.

The statute § 6156, supra, provides: "In such actions all persons whose liens are filed as herein provided, and other encumbrances, shall be made parties, and issues shall be made and trials had as in other cases. Where such action is brought by a subcontractor, or other person not the original contractor, such original contractor shall be made a party defendant, and shall at his own expense defend against the claim of every subcontractor, or other person claiming a lien under this act, and if he fails to make such defense the owner may make the same at the expense of such contractor; and until all such claims, costs, and expenses are finally adjudicated, and defeated or satisfied, the owner shall be entitled to retain from the contractor the amount thereof, and such costs and expenses as he may be required to pay: Provided, that if the sheriff of the county in which such action is pending shall make return that he is unable to find such original contractor, the court may proceed to adjudicate the liens upon the land and render judgment to enforce the same with costs." No contention is made in this case that the proviso contained in the statute existed, and hence the terms of the statute are before us. While there is some conflict in the authorities on the proposition, in our judgment the great weight of them makes the original contractor in an action to enforce a lien such as in this case, not only a proper and necessary, but indispensable, party to the proceeding. Authorities supporting in full, or inferentially and effect, this proposition, may be noted as follows: Alberti v. Moore, 20 Okla. 78, 14 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1036, 93 Pac. 543; Emmet v. Rotary Mill Co. 2 Minn. 286, Gil. 248; Estey v. Hallack & H. Lumber Co. 4 Colo. App. 165, 34 Pac. 1113; Sayre-Newton Lumber Co. v. Park, 4 Colo. App. 482, 36 Pac. 445; Union P. R. Co. v. Davidson, 21 Colo. 93, 39 Pac. 1095; Steinmann v. Strimple, 29 Mo. App. 478; Edward McLundie & Co. v. Mount, 145 Mo. App. 660, 123 S. W. 966; O'Neil Lumber Co. v. Greffet, 154 Mo. App. 33, 133 S. W. 113; Wagner v. St. Peter's Hospital, 32 Mont. 206, 79 Pac. 1054; Missoula Mercantile Co. v. O'Donnell, 24 Mont. 76, 60 Pac. 594, 991; Kerns v. Flynn, 51 Mich. 573, 17 N. W. 62; Godfrey Lumber Co. v. Kline, 160 Mich. 565, 125 N. W. 682; Augir v. Warder, 68 W. Va. 752, 33 L.R.A.(N.S.) 69, 70 S. E. 719; Flake v. Central Hardware Co. 96 Miss. 838, 51 So. 461; Tracy v. Kerr, 47 Kan. 656, 28 Pac. 707.

The supreme court of Kansas in the case last cited, after quoting the foregoing statute, which is a part of the practice act adopted by us, speaking on this subject, says: "The language is so plain, the command that the contractor be made a party so imperative, that requirement is so mandatory, and the result of a failure or refusal to make him a party is so specifically stated, that there seems to be no fair ground, either by construction or otherwise, on which to place approval of the ruling of the trial court." Which ruling was to the effect that he was not an indispensable party. Dealing further with the same subject, it is said: "It may be suggested that if the subcontractor, or other person not the original contractor, neglect or refuse to make the contractor a party, the owner may do so on his own motion, and while it is probably true that the trial court would permit or order this to be done, yet the plain command of the statute is that the contractor shall be made a party, and we think it is primarily the duty of the party instituting such an action to do so."

Speaking to this same point, the Colorado court of appeals in the case of Estey v. Hallack & H. Lumber Co. 4 Colo. App. 165, 34 Pac. 1115, says: "Davis v. John Mouat Lumber Co. 2 Colo. App. 381, 31 Pac. 187, is conclusive of this case. The necessity of making the contractor a party is carefully examined and discussed fully. The court said: 'It has been often held that the contractor was an indispensable party to the action. With this we agree, and adjudge that the contractor is not only a proper, but a necessary and indispensable, party, against whom a debt must be established as the foundation of the decree for the foreclosure of the lien.' This conclusion is well sustained by authority. See Phillips, Mechanics' Liens, § 397; Vreeland v. Ellsworth, 71 Iowa, 347, 32 N. W. 374; Kerns v. Flynn, 51 Mich. 573, 17 N. W. 62; Sinickson v. Lynch, 25 N. J. L. 317; Pennoyer v. Neff, 95 U. S. 714, 24 L. ed. 565. The conclusion is founded on principle and sound legal logic. No privity of contract exists between the owner and the subcontractor; the contractor is the primary debtor; if the amount could be collected from him there would be no resulting claim against the property of the owner; the claim against the property is secondary, ancillary. Not only must there be a primary judgment against the contractor, but there must be an adjudication or settlement of the amount due subcontractors,—matters of which the owner can have no knowledge whatever,—and in order to fix the amount for which subcontractors could charge the property, an adjudication or accounting between the owner and the contractor is indispensable. It is claimed that by proceeding to trial without urging and relying upon the want of the contractor as a necessary party the irregularity was waived. In such cases there can be no waiver. A judgment against the contractor is an indispensable prerequisite to a lien upon the property. The owner and subcontractors cannot adjudicate and settle the accounts and equities between the contractor and the subcontractors, nor can they adjudicating and adjust claims and matters between the owner and the contractor. In one case the owner and contractor are the contracting parties; in the other, the contractor and subcontractors. The right to the lien is purely statutory, is subsidiary and contingent, dependent upon the enforcing the judgment against the contractor. The owner is not primarily liable; hence the indispensable necessity of the contractor being before the court as a party to a triangular adjudication, and the necessity, primarily, of a judgment against the contractor as a basis of proceedings against the property of the owner."

We therefore hold that the original contractor, by and through his trustee in this case, was an indispensable party to the proceeding brought for the purpose of establishing the liens in this case.

In reference to the claim of the estate of the bankrupt, represented by H. Y. Thompson, Esq., it is claimed that Robert Kruger, the original contractor, became a bankrupt during the time he was engaged in constructing the building, and had earned, under his contract, something over $1,400, but the same had not been paid because not due until the completion of the building. The receiver of the bankrupt applied to the referee in bankruptcy for an order directing him to complete the building, in order that the estate might receive the amount of money due, and at the same time J. M. Eberle, one of the plaintiffs in error, and agent for the other in the construction of the building, appeared in court and urged the referee to finish the building. Under this an order was made, and the building was completed at an additional expense to the bankrupt's estate, for all of which the trustee asked a lien. This the referee allowed, but the trial court denied, holding that the contractor and his trustee in bankruptcy, having failed to build and deliver to the owners the building, and having failed to pay for the materials furnished by the various lien claimants, were not entitled to recover any judgment or lien upon the building, from which action the trustee, by cross petition in error, has brought the matter to this court for review, and asks judgment upon the evidence to discover which we are referred to the 1,100-page record before us. None or but little of the evidence is set out in the abstract and briefs, either to support or defeat the claim of the trustee. The presumption is that the judgment of the trial court is correct, and the burden in this court is upon him who assails it to show that it is wrong. We have no way of knowing that the claim made and lien claimed by the trustee does not include within it some or all of the claims of the other parties who are likewise seeking to enforce them against the property of plaintiffs in error. The inequitable result of such a situation is too apparent to require more than its statement, if true, to reject it. We will not, however, foreclose the trustee in this manner, but will remit his claim to the same course that we do the others, for the authority was vested in the bankruptcy court to authorize the business of this bankrupt to be conducted for a limited period by the receiver. See bankruptcy act, § 2 (5); 1 Remington, Bankr. § 387; Re Richards (D. C.) 127 Fed. 772; Re Reinboth, 16 L.R.A.(N.S.) 341, 85 C. C. A. 340, 157 Fed. 672, 19 Am. Bankr. Rep. 15. And, if otherwise entitled to the lien, the fact that it arose out of service rendered by the contractor's receiver or trustee in bankruptcy will not be sufficient to defeat it.

This action has been an expensive one for all the parties, and it is to be deplored that it cannot be ended at this time, but it is better to conclude it later and have justice rendered between the parties than to conclude it now, and perhaps wrongfully.

The case of Godfrey Lumber Co. v. Kline, 160 Mich. 565, 125 N. W. 682, was one similar to the case at bar. In that case the plaintiffs failed because the principal contractor was not made a party defendant, just as the plaintiff and the other lien claimants have failed in this case, and for the same reason. That court, exercising, in our judgment, a righteous discretion, decreed that "the decree of the circuit court is reversed, with costs of both courts in favor of defendant, and the cause will be remanded to the circuit court, with permission to amend the bill of complaint by making the principal contractor a party defendant. Cassery v. Wayne Circuit Judge, 124 Mich. 157, 83 Am. St. Rep. 320, 82 N. W. 841; Prather Engineering Co. v. Detroit, F. & S. R. Co. 152 Mich. 585, 116 N. W. 376. If the parties so elect, the case may proceed to a hearing on the record already made."

The same order will be made in the case at bar. The filing of the claims in the bankruptcy court was not a compliance with the mechanics' lien statute, and could not affect this case, except, of course, any allowance there secured would reduce the amount of the lien, and, in our judgment, the order of the court appointing the referee was sufficiently broad, and was intended to require him to report the evidence. The entire matter on the record is before the court, and the parties may amend their pleadings, making the trustee in bankruptcy a party, with a prayer for judgment against him; and, if the present record already made is sufficiently broad upon which to predicate a finding by the court, the parties may, if they elect, avail themselves thereof, tendering such additional evidence as they may desire. The determination of the mooted points of law, it is hoped, will enable these litigants to settle the case and so close up the controversy; but, should this not be accomplished, it is expected that the evidence relied on for recovery in this court will be properly abstracted and the requirements of rule 25 as to briefs observed.

The petition for rehearing is otherwise denied.

OREGON SUPREME COURT. (In Banc.)

CHARLES H. MALZER, Respt.,
v.
HENRY SCHISLER, Appt.

(67 Or. 356, 136 Pac. 14.)

Contract — parol sale of land — delivery of deed to stranger.

The fact that, by direction of the purchaser, the deed was made to a stranger, does not change the rule that a parol contract to purchase real estate may be enforced if the deed has been executed and delivered.

(November 11, 1913.)

Note. — Action for purchase price on oral contract of sale of land where deed has been delivered.

As to taking possession of real property as part performance to satisfy the statute of frauds, see the note to Roberts v. Templeton, 3 L.R.A.(N.S.) 790.

As to deed delivered in escrow as satisfying the statute of frauds, see note to Moore v. Ward, 43 L.R.A.(N.S.) 391.

The general rule is that where a parol contract for the sale of land has been executed as to the part within the statute of frauds, by delivery and acceptance of a deed for the premises, the statute has no application, and the vendor may recover the purchase price in an action upon the contract. This was the rule (except where otherwise noted) laid down in the following cases: Worden v. Sharp, 56 Ill. 104; Knight v. Collings, 227 Ill. 348, 81 N. E. 346; Rogan v. Arnold, 233 Ill. 19, 84 N. E. 58 (dictum); Schlueter v. Leady, 103 Ill. App. 425; Huston v. Stewart, 64 Ind. 388; Stephenson v. Arnold, 89 Ind. 426 (holding that the fact that the contract provided for a conveyance by a third person did not prevent its enforcement by the vendor, in case the conveyance bargained for is executed);

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Wallowa County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover a balance due on the purchase price of certain land. Affirmed.

Statement by Eakin, J.:

This is an action to recover a balance due on the purchase price of land. Plaintiff sold a certain tract of land to defendant for the consideration of $1,700, and by defendant's direction conveyed the tract directly to Denny. Defendant paid $700 cash at the time of the contract, and assumed and agreed to pay a mortgage then existing on the land in the sum of $800. This left a balance of $200, which defendant agreed to pay within a few days. The complaint alleges that he has not paid the $200, and neglects and refuses so to do. After a demurrer to the complaint was overruled, defendant answered, denying the allegations of the complaint, and as an affirmative defense pleaded the statute of frauds, to which a demurrer was sustained. Defendant then filed an amended answer, which is a specific denial of every allegation of the complaint, except that he has not paid the $200. Upon the trial the defendant objected to the proof offered by the plaintiff to establish the agreement of sale and promise to pay, for the reason that it is an attempt to prove by parol an agreement for the sale of real estate, which objection was overruled. Upon trial verdict was rendered for the plaintiff. Defendant appeals.

Mr. Thomas M. Dill, for appellant:

Dec. 764 (holding that an action of contract will lie to enforce any oral promise to pay money presently in consideration of real estate sold and conveyed, but that where the contract is for an exchange of lands at agreed valuations, and one party only delivers a deed, the action must be upon the implied promise to pay the agreed value of the land conveyed, on a count for land sold and conveyed); Root v. Stocke, 42 Mo. 351 (holding that acceptance of the deed constituted a waiver of the statute of frauds); Skow v. Locke, 3 Neb. (Unof.) 176, 91 N. W. 204; Sowards v. Moss, 58 51 L.R.A.(N.S.)

Neb. 119, 78 N. W. 373, reversed on rehearing in 59 Neb. 71, 80 N. W. 268, on ground that there was not an unconditional delivery of the deed; Friedman v. Ender, 116 N. Y. Supp. 461 (holding that delivery of deed ratified and validated the oral contract); Johnson v. Hathorn, 2 Keyes, 476, 3 Keyes, 126, 2 Abb. App. Dec. 465; Farmer v. Willard, 71 N. C. 284; Smith v. Arthur, 110 N. C. 400, 15 S. E. 197 (possession of deed secured by fraudulent means,—held that bringing action for purchase money affirmed deed); Thayer v. Luce, 22 Ohio St. 62 (dictum); Simmons v. Edens, 1 Tenn. Civ. App. 56, as cited in 1914 Cyc. Ann. 358; Showalter v. McDonnell, 83 Tex. 158, 18 S. W. 491.

MALZER v. SCHISLER adheres to this rule, and also is authority for the proposition that the rule covers cases where the deed is, pursuant to direction of the vendee, delivered to a third person. But in connection with MALZER v. SCHISLER, see Liddle v. Needham, 39 Mich. 147, 33 Am. Rep. 359, in which a father verbally agreed that if a third person would deed certain land to the son, he would give his note, etc., and the deed was executed, but its acceptance by the son denied; and in which it was held, the father having refused to execute the note, that there could be no recovery against him, and, assuming that the son had accepted the deed, that the undertaking, if one was implied, would have to be imputed to the son, the recipient of the deed, and not to the father.

But it has been held that the execution of the contract by a conveyance of the land must precede the bringing of the action for the purchase price. Butler v. Lee, 11 Ala. 885, 46 Am. Dec. 230.

Another line of cases, while seemingly holding that a verbal contract for the sale of real property is within the statute of frauds, notwithstanding it has been performed on one side by a conveyance of the property, allows recovery of unpaid pur-writing, expressing the consideration, and is subscribed by the party to be charged.

Harper v. Goldschmidt, 156 Cal. 245, 28 L.R.A.(N.S.) 689, 134 Am. St. Rep. 127, 104 Pac. 451; Browne, Stat. Fr. 4th ed. § 345a; Turnham v. Calumet & O. Min. Co. 58 Or. 453, 112 Pac. 711, 115 Pac. 157; Johnson v. Hanson, 6 Ala. 351, 41 Am. Dec. 54; Raub v. Smith, 61 Mich. 543, 1 Am. St. Rep. 619, 28 N. W. 676; Goddard v. Miller, 48 Or. 201, 85 Pac. 517.

To make such an agreement obligatory, it is necessary that the other party shall have accepted or assented to the terms of the agreement the writing contains.

chase money, but upon the implied promise arising from the vendor's performance. But the difference between these and the preceding cases is technical, rather than substantial. Thus, it has been held that where a verbal contract for the sale of land has been executed on one side by a conveyance of the property, the proper action is upon an implied promise arising from the plaintiff's performance, implied promises not being embraced by the statute of frauds, and that no action can be maintained on the specific contract itself. Fisher v. Wilson, 18 Ind. 133, quoting Browne, Stat. Fr. §§ 115, 116, 124. See also Basford v. Pearson, 3 Allen, 387, 85 Am. Dec. 764, which, as shown supra, held that the recovery must be upon the implied promise to pay the agreed price, where there was an agreement for an exchange of lands at an agreed valuation, which contract was executed on one side only. And in Wilson v. Clarke, 1 Watts & S. 554, it was held that a vendor cannot recover the purchase price of land in an action based on a parol contract of sale, upon proof of performance of the contract on his part; but the court intimated that he might recover damages from the vendee for breach of the verbal agreement.

In some instances it has been held that where an oral contract for the sale of real estate has been executed as to the part within the statute of frauds, by a conveyance of the property, the statute has no application, but that the action is upon the implied contract to pay arising from the conveyance, rather than upon the expressed contract of sale. However, the debt implied from the conveyance is the purchase price agreed upon. It has been so held in the following cases: Murray v. Schuldt, 73 N. J. L. 489, 63 Atl. 904; Birch v. Baker, — N. J. —, 90 Atl. 297. And in Niland v. Murphy, 73 Wis. 326, 41 N. W. 335, it was held that the statute of frauds does not apply in such a case, and that in an action for breach of the promise to pay

Where the contract to purchase land is void by the statute of frauds, an action to recover for the balance of the purchase price cannot be maintained.

Baldwin v. Palmer, 10 N. Y. 232, 61 Am. Dec. 743, and note.

Mere payment of portions of purchase money, unaccompanied by any other act, is not sufficient to take a parol agreement for the sale of land out of the statute of frauds.

Blanchard v. McDougal, 6 Wis. 167, 70 Am. Dec. 458; Gangwer v. Fry, 17 Pa. 491, 55 Am. Dec. 578; Cooper v. Colson, 66 N. J. Eq. 328, 105 Am. St. Rep. 660, 58 Atl. 337, 1 Ann. Cas. 997; Browne, Stat. Fr. 4th ed. §§ 461, 462; Temple v. Johnson, 71 Ill. 13; Box v. Stanford, 13 Smedes & M. 93, 51 Am. Dec. 142.

In a few cases which have involved the question of delivery and acceptance of a deed as removing a parol contract for the sale of lands from the statute of frauds, the courts have also adverted to the fact that the vendee was put in, or entered into, possession, but the weight attached to the latter fact was not indicated. Thus, in the following cases it was held that the statute of frauds cannot be set up as a bar to an action on a parol contract for the purchase price of realty, where the conveyance has been executed and accepted and the purchaser put in possession, the ground being that in such case the contract is executed as to the part within the statute: Merrell v. Witherby, 120 Ala. 428, 74 Am. St. Rep. 41, 26 So. 974, reversing on rehearing 120 Ala. 418, 74 Am. St. Rep. 39, 23 So. 994; Stringer v. Stringer, 93 Ga. 320, 20 S. E. 242; Curran v. Curran, 40 Ind. 473; Arnold v. Stephenson, 79 Ind. 126; Worley v. Sipe, 111 Ind. 238, 12 N. E. 385; Greenlees v. Roche, 48 Kan. 503, 29 Pac. 590 (title bond delivered, accepted, and possession taken); Botkin v. Middlesboro Town & Land Co. 139 Ky. 677, 66 S. W. 747; Wolfe v. Hauver, 1 Gill, 84; O'Grady v. O'Grady, 162 Mass. 290, 38 N. E. 196; Waldron v. Laird, 65 Mich. 237, 32 N. W. 29 (deed and possession delivered to purchaser's son at his request,—decision put upon the ground of part performance); Smith v. Davis, 90 Mo. App. 533; Tucker v. Dolan, 109 Mo. App. 442, 84 S. W. 1126; Griffith v. Thompson, 50 Neb. 424, 69 N. W. 946; Suber v. Richards, 61 S. C. 393, 39 S. E. 540 (decision upon ground of part performance); Hamilton v. Gilbert, 2 Heisk. 680 (deed pursuant to agreement executed to third person); Zabel v. Schroeder, 35 Tex. 308. Of course, those cases wherein it appears that the decision turns upon the fact that possession was taken are not included herein.

G. J. C.

To take the case out of the statute of frauds, part performance must be of the identical contract alleged, which must be certain and definite, and proved as alleged.

Plymale v. Comstock, 9 Or. 318.

The assumption of, and agreement to pay, a real estate mortgage, constitute an agreement to answer for the debt, default, or miscarriage of another, and is void unless the same or some memorandum thereof, expressing the consideration, shall be in writing and subscribed by the party to be charged; and such agreement does not bind the purchaser personally, unless he assumes the payment of the debt.

Turnham v. Calumet & O. Min. Co. 58 Or. 453, 112 Pac. 711, 115 Pac. 157; Nelson v. Boynton, 3 Met. 396, 37 Am. Dec. 149; Barker v. Bucklin, 2 Denio, 45, 43 Am. Dec. 726; Miles v. Miles, 6 Or. 266, 25 Am. Rep. 522; Walker v. Goldsmith, 7 Or. 161; Trotter v. Hughes, 12 N. Y. 74, 62 Am. Dec. 137; Lewis v. Day, 53 Iowa, 575, 5 N. W. 753.

A deed deposited in escrow, not containing the terms of the contract of sale, is insufficient to take the case out of the statute of frauds, even though payment has been made of the purchase price.

Cooper v. Thomason, 30 Or. 161, 45 Pac. 296; Sursa v. Cash, 171 Mo. App. 396, 156 S. W. 779.

Mr. J. A. Burleigh, for respondent:

There was such part performance as would take the transaction out of the statute of frauds, granting that it ever came within the statute.

Swift v. Mulkey, 14 Or. 64, 12 Pac. 76; Cooper v. Thomason, 30 Or. 161, 45 Pac. 296.

Courts will enforce a parol contract relating to land within the statute of frauds, when the refusal to execute it would amount to practising a fraud.

Browne, Stat. Fr. § 438.

Where one party has done acts in part execution of the contract, with the knowledge and consent of the other, this will take the case out of the statute of frauds.

Brown v. Lord, 7 Or. 302; Plymale v. Comstock, 9 Or. 321; Wagonblast v. Whitney, 12 Or. 83, 6 Pac. 399; Wallace v. Scoggins, 18 Or. 502, 17 Am. St. Rep. 749, 21 Pac. 558; Cooper v. Thomason, 30 Or. 175, 45 Pac. 296.

When a purchaser accepts a deed of conveyance to real property conveying to him the legal title, the deed draws after it possession, and his payment of the greater portion of the purchase price is such part performance as will take the transaction out of the statute of frauds, and renders parol proof admissible to establish the terms of the verbal contract upon the faith of which the parties acted.

Cooper v. Thomason, supra.

Where the purchaser of land pays a part of the purchase price, and takes possession by taking a deed of conveyance carrying with it possession, the sale is taken out of the statute.

Jerman v. Misner, 56 Or. 393, 108 Pac. 179.

Possession alone under a verbal contract, when delivered to the vendee, is an act of part performance which takes the case out of the statute of frauds, even without the additional circumstances of the payment of consideration or the making of improvements.

Sprague v. Jessup, 48 Or. 218, 4 L.R.A. (N.S.) 410, 83 Pac. 145, 84 Pac. 802.

The writings, when taken together and explained by the surrounding circumstances, are sufficient within the statute of frauds to show a valid contract by defendant with plaintiff to buy the property upon the terms as alleged.

Flegel v. Dowling, 54 Or. 40, 135 Am. St. Rep. 812, 102 Pac. 178, 19 Ann. Cas. 1159.

The agreement of a vendee to pay a balance of the purchase price to a stranger to the contract is not within the statute of frauds.

Strong v. Kamm, 13 Or. 172, 9 Pac. 331.

Eakin, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Defendant makes but one point upon the appeal, namely, that the agreement of sale was in parol, and therefore that a promise by defendant to pay the $200 cannot be established. We understand the rule in such a case to be that where there is an oral agreement for the sale of land, and the property has been conveyed to the vendee, the agreement is so far executed that it is thereby taken out of the statute of frauds. In an action to recover the balance of the purchase price, the agreement to pay may be shown by parol, including the consideration for the promise to pay. In 39 Cyc. 1918, it is stated: "As a general rule the statute of frauds is a good defense to an action by a vendor on an oral contract of sale of land to recover the purchase price, unless a deed has been executed and delivered to or accepted by the purchaser. A purchaser in possession under a contract for title cannot resist payment of the purchase price on the ground that he did not sign the contract." See also Walker v. Owen, 79 Mo. 563; Cagger v. Lansing, 43 N. Y. 550; King v. Smith, 33 Vt. 22. In 20 Cyc. 294, where many authorities are cited, it is said: "The statute is no bar to an action for the price of land actually conveyed, where the deed has been accepted or title has otherwise passed, although the grantor could not have been compelled to convey, or the grantee to accept a deed, because the contract was oral." Defendant also suggests the point that the deed was not made to him, and that the property was not in his possession; but he made the contract of purchase and directed that the deed be made to Denny. Acceptance of the deed by Denny was acceptance by defendant. Plaintiff had no contract with Denny, and defendant's liability on his contract for the price is the same as though the deed were to himself. Our supreme court assumes the existence of this rule, and, going further, holds that a promise to pay the price to a third party is also binding upon the vendee, and may be proved by parol. See Kiernan v. Kratz, 42 Or. 474, 69 Pac. 1027, 70 Pac. 506; Feldman v. McGuire, 34 Or. 312, 55 Pac. 872; Cooper v. Thomason, 30 Or. 161, 45 Pac. 296. And this question was also involved in McLeod v. Despaigne, 49 Or. 536, 19 L.R.A.(N.S.) 276, 124 Am. St. Rep. 1066, 90 Pac. 492, 92 Pac. 1088.

The judgment of the Circuit Court is affirmed.

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Superior Court for King County in defendants' favor in an action brought to recover damages for breach of a written contract to form a partnership and establish a fur business. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. William Martin and Hugh C. Todd for appellant.

Mr. Ira Bronson for respondents.

Crow, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Action by Edward Webster against John L. Beau, H. T. Harding, and Ed Born to recover damages for the breach of a written contract. The complaint, which purports to state two causes of action, in substance, alleges: That plaintiff has passed a number of years in that portion of Alaska within the Arctic Circle, known as the "Mackenzie River Country," which is inhabited by fur-bearing animals. That during his sojourn there he acquired extensive and valuable information relative to the fur trade and the methods of obtaining furs from the native Indians and Eskimos. That in 1907, at Nome, Alaska, John L. Beau, one of the defendants, requested him to enter into negotiations with the view of jointly engaging in the fur-trading business. That later he asked that plaintiff accompany him to Seattle to confer with the defendants H. T. Hard-

I. Introductory.

a. In general.

For the general subject of loss of profits as an element of damages for breach of contract, see the note to Wells v. National Life Asso. 53 L.R.A. 33.

For arbitrary or mala fide termination of partnership as basis of action in tort, see the note to Com. v. Griffith, 25 L.R.A. (N.S.) 959.

As to right of one partner of dissolved firm to maintain action at law against another for fraud practised upon dissolution with respect to assets, see the note to O'rockett v. Burleson, 6 L.R.A.(N.S.) 263.

It is not intended in general to include cases other than those of partnership, but a few agency cases are included.

ing and Ed Born. That further consultations were held in Seattle, all parties named being present. That on November 12, 1907, a verbal agreement previously made was reduced to writing by Beau, on behalf of himself and the defendants Harding and Born, in the form of a letter or proposition which Beau signed, and which plaintiff accepted and also signed. That the defendant Beau then requested that plaintiff proceed to San Francisco to ascertain the plans of the whaling fleet for the next season, and also to secure suitable men to assist in conducting the contemplated fur-trading business. That Beau then advanced $95 to plaintiff for immediate expenses, and promised further advances as needed. That plaintiff went to San Francisco, where he wrote a number of letters and sent a telegram to the defendant

Beau, but received no answers. That in April or May, 1908, he mailed a registered letter to Beau, and received an answer in which Beau stated that he and his associates would not carry out the agreement. That plaintiff was capable of earning $5 per day; and that, for money disbursed in necessary expenses and for loss of time, he had sustained a loss of $1,985, upon which the $95 advanced by Beau should be credited.

The written proposal upon which the second cause of action is also predicated reads as follows:

Seattle, Wash., Nov. 12, '07.

Mr. E. Webster,

Seattle, Wash.

Dear Sir.—

Reference our conversation regarding Mc-

Most of the cases are those where the breach consists in excluding the wronged partner from the business, or in refusing to go on with him in business. The damage which he has suffered is the value of what he has lost, which in general, and apart from misappropriation of property, etc., is the amount of profits which he would have realized from the business had it been carried on according to the partnership agreement. As to this there is general agreement in the authorities, and where the profits have been earned the matter presents no difficulty. Where the profits are prospective, they ought to be estimated if it can be done with reasonable certainty, but if they rest merely on speculation and conjecture, they cannot be allowed. There is no substantial support for the doctrine suggested in one or two cases that prospective profits, while theoretically allowable, can never be shown with sufficient certainty. Loss of time or earnings and expenses incurred in carrying out the contract cannot logically be allowed where the profits can be shown or estimated, as the profits are only what is left after deducting the expenses, and the loss of time or earnings would have occurred even if the contract had been carried out. But where the evidence as to prospective profits leaves the matter in conjecture, it is not fair or reasonable that the wronged partner should be dismissed empty-handed, and the courts in such case will seek out some other way of compensation, which may include his expenses incurred in carrying out the contract or the value of his time and earnings lost, and, as has also been held, even the value of his services rendered to the other partners.

Contracts to go into a partnership.

It is often difficult, if not impossible, to say whether at the time of breach a partnership had actually been entered upon or not. But it is not in general necessary to solve this question, for, even if at the time of breach the partnership had not been entered into, an action will lie for damages 51 L.R.A.(N.S.)

for the breach. Goldsmith v. Sachs, 8 Sawy. 110, 17 Fed. 726; WEBSTER v. BEAU; Iloy v. Grenoble, 34 Pa. 9, 75 Am. Dec. 628; Hill v. Palmer, 56 Wis. 123, 43 Am. Rep. 703, 14 N. W. 23. See also Stone v. Dennis, 3 Port. (Ala.) 231, where the plaintiff recovered damages for a breach of covenant, and the court considered that the partnership had not commenced (in which view it was possibly mistaken). "Nothing is more generally settled than that a refusal to carry out an agreement to form a copartnership gives rise to a cause of action." Rockwell Stock & Land Co. v. Castroni, 6 Colo. App. 521, 42 Pac. 180. But an action for damages for failure to go into a partnership will not be sustained where there is no evidence as to the terms on which the parties were to go in. Figs v. Culer, 3 Starkie, 139.

Nor is the question, whether the partnership has or has not begun, material upon the theory of the measure of damages. "The measure of damages is the same in both cases." Ramsay v. Meade, 37 Colo. 465, 86 Pac. 1018, where, however, the court considered that the partnership had begun. This is not disputed in WEBSTER v. BEAU, where the decision turns on the absence of an existing business, and not on the fact that the contract was executory, for, of course, there may be an executory contract to take a partner or a new partner into an existing business.

Reduction of damages by other employment.

Whether the damages of one who has been excluded from a business by his partner will be reduced by the profitable employment of his time after the exclusion does not seem to have been decided.

In Bagley v. Smith, 10 N. Y. 489, 61 Am. Dec. 756, it was held that one who had broken a contract of partnership could not insist that his partner's claim for profits must be limited to the period between the dissolution and his partner's subsequent entry into some other business, the court suggesting that possibly the defend-

Kenzie river expedition will say: We will arrange to place a stock of trade goods there at such a place as you and we may select. The stock, to consist of such wares as we may deem proper for the native trade purposes, shall constitute approximately the value of \$12,000, including duty and freight. The stock to be shipped on such carrier as will make best and lowest rates, concurrent with safety. The title and ownership of all wares and buildings erected shall be vested in us. You are to devote your time and efforts to handling and trading off the said wares and merchandise for fur, whalebone, etc., and for your services you are to receive thirty-three and one third (33 $\frac{1}{3}$) per cent of the net profit of the McKenzie "Your Stations." The fur and trade goods obtained by you in exchange and otherwise shall be turned over to us on arrival of our boat each and every season; such furs are to be kept separate and distinct and sold to the best possible advantage, and separate and distinct accounts kept and rendered to you. All accounts and invoices and all matters pertaining to your station shall be subject to your inspection at all times. Two thirds, or 66 $\frac{2}{3}$ per cent, of the net profit, shall go to us. In taking stock of inventory for purpose of ascertaining profit or net results, the cost of building or equipment shall not be figured. We will put in another stock the second year as large or larger, if you advise us by mail to increase; otherwise practically same amount and commodities. Following propositions are to be part of our agreement, and you can avail yourself of any or either at any time:

ant could show that the plaintiff either was or might have been as profitably employed in business on his own account as he would have been, had the firm business been continued, but that the plaintiff might, perhaps, have disputed the competency of such evidence.

Exemplary damages.

There seems to be no ground in these matters for exemplary damages.

In Hoy v. Grenoble, 34 Pa. 9, 75 Am. Dec. 628, it was held to be error to allow damages against the defendant for "violation of faith," on breach of a contract to conduct the defendant's farm on shares, as this would be allowing vindictive damages.

But countenance was given to a claim for exemplary damages in Ball v. Britton, 58 Tex. 57, where the court, in sending a case back for a new trial, said: "Counsel for appellee insist that appellant was not entitled to exemplary damages, and refer us to the case of Houston & T. C. R. Co. v. Shirley, 54 Tex. 125, to the effect that such damages are not recoverable upon a breach of contract. In the case before us, there was a breach of contract, certainly; but there was much more. The plaintiff was, with every circumstance of contumely, excluded from a business in which he had an interest, and from premises in which he had a right to work, at least for the time being. The defendant appears to have taken the law into his own hands, and to have closed the partnership in a manner entirely too summary to be sanctioned by a court of justice."

b. Breach in failure to contribute.

The measure of damages for breach in failing to make an agreed contribution to the partnership funds differs widely according to the circumstances of the case. Where the case arises in adjustment of partnership accounts of a going concern, the measure of damages is the interest on the uncontributed money.

Thus, where one partner is in default for the amount of the capital that he was to pay in, and the other partner continues the business notwithstanding, the amount which he may recover from the delinquent partner is the interest on the money that the delinquent was to pay in, and he cannot recover for loss of profits that they might have made, had the money been paid in. Delp v. Edlis, 190 Pa. 25, 42 Atl. 462.

And so in Krapp v. Aderholt, 42 Kan. 247, 21 Pac. 1063, where the plaintiff sued for a dissolution and accounting, and alleged that the defendant had excluded him from the business, the defendant could not recover more than interest for the plaintiff's failure to contribute his share of the capital.

See also to similar effect, Hartman v. Woehr, 18 N. J. Eq. 383, infra, II. a.

See also in this connection the following cases infra, VIII.: Akin v. Luce; Westwood v. Cole; and Kinloch v. Hamlis.

But where the defendant is to furnish all the capital, and his failure to do so prevents or breaks up the business, then the case is similar to the ordinary case of exclusion of the wronged partner from the business, or the refusal to go on with him, and the measure of damages is in general the loss of profits. Dart v. Laimbeer, 107 N. Y. 664, 14 N. E. 291.

Thus, in Hunter v. Land, 81* Pa. 296, where the breach was the failure of the defendant to advance money which he had agreed to furnish for a partnership between him and the plaintiff in the buying and selling of horses, prospective profits were allowed.

So, where on a publishing venture the defaulting partner had failed to furnish the book which the concern was to publish, it was held that his associates might sue him for damages for failure to furnish the book, as that was his failure to bring property into the partnership out of which profits might be made, and they recovered expenses and an additional amount, apparently as for loss of profits. Gale v. Leckie, 2 Starkie, 107,

First. If the profits during or within five years shall be such that we have during these five years, or before, our money and 100 per cent profit, then and in that event, from that time on you shall receive 50 per cent profit, and be the one-half owner of all stock and buildings, and title vested in you to that extent.

Second. If you at any time invest or put in 16 $\frac{2}{3}$ per cent of all capital invested in your stations, then and immediately thereafter, you shall receive 50 per cent of the profits, and the 16 $\frac{2}{3}$ per cent, or one sixth, of the property, shall then be vested in your name.

Third. If at any time you can establish the conditions as in article first, you shall receive a salary in addition to the 50 per cent profit.

Fourth. In case you have made 100 per cent net profit or more the first year, then you shall have one half, or 50 per cent of the profit for your services, and same ratio if the net profits shall be large; this also applies to subsequent years.

Fifth. Any and all trading or buying the Schooner Abler does from spring 1909 on between point one-half distance between Point Barrow and your station, you shall receive twenty-five (25) per cent of the net profit. Of the profits derived from any purchases or trade made by Schooner Abler season 1908 from Camden Bay and East, you will receive 25 per cent of the profits. Losses

II. Profits as the measure of damages.

a. In general.

In most of the cases upon breach of a partnership contract, the breach is the exclusion of the wronged partner from the business, or the refusal to go with him in business. The measure of his damages in such case is his loss by the breach, which, apart from the question of misappropriation of contributed property, etc., is the amount of profits which he would have made, had the contract been carried out according to its terms.

The question of the recovery of profits by a wronged partner may be divided into the recovery of actual profits or estimated prospective profits. Where the term has expired before the suit or before the trial, and the business from which the plaintiff has been excluded has made profits, these may afford a definite basis of his loss; so where, irrespective of expiration of the partnership term, the partnership property is successfully used by one partner to the wrongful exclusion of the other, who elects to treat the excluding partner as his trustee. But the profits may be said to be prospective where none have been realized at the time of the trial, whether the business or venture from which the plaintiff was excluded is continuing or whether, by reason of the breach, either no partnership business has been carried on, or if begun it was broken up by such breach.

Exclusive use of partnership property.

The time for which profits are allowed will not cease at the expiration of the partnership if one of the partners wrongfully continues the exclusive use of the partnership property, for in such case the excluded partner may elect to treat the wrongdoer as his trustee, and require him to account for such property and any profits made by the use of it.

Thus, where one partner excluded the other from the business of the partnership, and took patents belonging to the firm and made profits with them, it was held that 51 L.R.A.(N.S.)

the excluded partner was entitled to receive his share of the profits and of the property, according to the terms of the partnership articles, and that the excluding partner held the property as trustee for that purpose. Ambler v. Whipple, 20 Wall. 546, 22 L. ed. 403.

So, in Hartman v. Woehr, 18 N. J. Eq. 386, the court said: "Even where the partnership has been legally dissolved, and one of two partners continues to carry on the business, unlawfully using the property of the other in it, the retiring partner is, at his option, entitled to his share of the profits made while his property is thus used." See also Beller v. Murphy, 139 Mo. App. 663, 123 S. W. 1029, infra, II. b.

In Karrick v. Hannaman, 168 U. S. 328, 42 L. ed. 484, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 135, the court said: "In a court of equity, a partner who, after a dissolution of the partnership, carries on the business with the partnership property, is liable, at the election of the other partner or his representative, to account for the profits thereof, subject to proper allowances. Ambler v. Whipple, supra; Pearce v. Ham, 113 U. S. 585, 28 L. ed. 1067, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 676; Hartman v. Woehr, 18 N. J. Eq. 383; Freeman v. Freeman, 136 Mass. 260; Holmes v. Gilman, 138 N. Y. 369, 20 L.R.A. 566, 34 Am. St. Rep. 463, 34 N. E. 205; 3 Kent, Com. 64."

b. Where term is completed before trial.

Under this head are properly included not only cases brought after the end of the term by time or by the completion of an adventure, but also those where the excluding partner has put an end to the business by a sale of the property, or the wronged partner has sued for a dissolution.

A partner excluded from the business is entitled to his share of the profits on the completion of the venture (Pearce v. Ham, 113 U. S. 585, 28 L. ed. 1067, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 676; Canfield v. Johnson, 144 Pa. 61, 2 Atl. 974; Beller v. Murphy, supra), or to the time of the decree of dissolution, when he sues for a dissolution (Zimmerman v. Harding, 227 U. S. 489, 57 L. ed. 608, 33 to be borne in same ratio as profit. You are to keep accurate account of all transactions.

Truly,
John L. Beau.

O. K. E. Webster.

For his second cause of action the plaintiff, after pleading the agreement, in substance, alleged that the defendants refused and neglected to purchase goods in the sum of $12,000 for the partnership as agreed; that, as a result of such refusal, the entire season of 1908 was lost, together with profits that would have been earned by the plaintiff; that the portion of Alaska to which it was agreed the plaintiff should go with the goods was a section but little frequented by traders, where heavy profits in the fur, ivory, and mercantile business would have been realized; and that the proposed partnership during the term of two years would have earned a net profit of $75,000. Plaintiff demanded judgment for $1,800 on his first cause of action, and for $25,000 on his second cause of action.

The defendants John L. Beau and H. T. Harding admitted the execution of the written agreement by John L. Beau, but denied all other allegations of the complaint. The defendant Ed Born has been dismissed from the action, and no further notice will be taken of him. The first trial resulted in a verdict for $14,905 in plaintiff's favor against the defendants Beau and Harding.

Sup. Ct. Rep. 387; Hartman v. Woehr, 18 N. J. Eq. 383).

In Karrick v. Hannaman, supra, where one partner excluded the other from the partnership affairs, carried on the business for his own benefit, and later sold off the property, the excluded party in his suit for dissolution, which came to trial after the partnership had expired by time, was allowed his share of the profits according to the partnership articles, and to his share of the property sold. The court said: "A partner who assumes to dissolve the partnership before the end of the term agreed on in the partnership articles is liable, in an action at law against him by his co-partner for the breach of the agreement, to respond in damages for the value of the profits which the plaintiff would otherwise have received. Bagley v. Smith, 10 N. Y. 489, 61 Am. Dec. 756; Dennis v. Maxfield, 10 Allen, 138."

Where after a time two partners who had paid their capital contributions in full excluded the third, who was partially in default, from the business, and he sued for a dissolution, it was held that he was entitled to his share of the profits, but would be charged with interest on the unpaid part of the share of the capital that he was to pay. Hartman v. Woehr, supra. This case was approved in Beller v. Murphy, supra, where A, being the owner of mining land, leased it for ten years to B and others and himself for mining operations, under a royalty of 10 per cent, and after a time B acquired part of the land, and B and A excluded the others from it, declared the lease forfeited, and leased the land to another concern at a royalty of 20 per cent. It was held that the remaining parties to the first lease, having waited until after the expiration of the ten years, were entitled to recover from A and B their shares of the extra 10 per cent royalty, and, although A died before the ten years and the partnership might be considered as having thereby expired, still there must be an accounting for the excess royalty received thereafter.

While it is not referred to by the court, it may be conjectured from the date of the 51 L.R.A. (N.S.)

trial in Dennis v. Maxfield, supra, that the adventure was then at an end and the profits fixed. In that case a captain of a whaling ship, hired by its owners at a compensation to be a certain proportion of the profits, was discharged while the voyage was still in progress, and it was held that he was not only entitled to his share of the profits prior to his discharge, but also to his share of the profits afterward, although these were in their nature contingent and speculative.

Where, during a term of a partnership for the manufacture and sale of gold pens, one of the partners was excluded by the other, he was allowed to recover the loss of those profits which he would have made during the stipulated term of the partnership. Bagley v. Smith, 10 N. Y. 489, 19 How. Pr. 1, 61 Am. Dec. 756. While this case was decided on broad grounds as to prospective profits, it is placed here as it is referred to in Van Ness v. Fisher, 5 Lans. 236, infra, II. c, as one where the excluding partner continued the business and the term had expired before the time of the trial.

Where, shortly before dissolution and in contemplation of it, a retiring partner secretly canceled contracts of the firm with outside parties, whereby it lost much business, in sustaining a judgment against the retiring partner, the amount of the profits of the season in the preceding year was considered and compared with that of the season following the dissolution, but the method of computation does not appear. Axton v. Kentucky Bottlers Supply Co. 159 Ky. 51, 166 S. W. 776.

The wronged partner of a repudiated partnership for operation in land was held entitled to recover his share of the profits based on the value of the land at the time of the breach, and was not limited to recovery of the value of his services. Clarkson v. Whitaker, 12 Tex. Civ. App. 483, 33 S. W. 1032, where A was to purchase land with the assistance of B, who was to manage it, and when it was all sold the profits, after repaying A, were to be divided, and shortly after A's death his successors repudiated the contract.

Upon the hearing of the defendants' motion for a new trial, the trial judge, being of the opinion that anticipated profits were too remote and speculative to be made the basis of a recovery, ordered the plaintiff to remit $13,585 from the verdict, or accept a new trial. Plaintiff refused to make any remission, and a second jury trial was had before a different judge, who instructed the jury and tried the cause upon the theory that lost profits for one year only could be recovered, and that there could be no recovery for expenses or lost time. Following this instruction, the second jury returned a verdict for $8,000 in plaintiff's favor against the defendant John L. Beau. Motions for a new trial were interposed by the plaintiff and the defendant

Beau. The defendants also interposed a motion for judgment notwithstanding the verdict. The latter motion was sustained, and a judgment of dismissal was entered, for the reason that the trial judge concluded that no contract between the parties had been proven. The plaintiff has appealed.

The trial judge in substance instructed the jury that the written instrument would not be binding upon the parties until (1) they agreed upon and selected a place or station in which to install their stock of goods, and (2) they had selected and approved a stock of goods which they deemed suitable for trading purposes. This instruction was given upon the theory that the written instrument itself contemplated the performance of these prerequisite conditions to make

c. Prospective profits.

(1) In general.

Of course, if the evidence shows that there would not have been any profits, there are, apart from matters of misappropriation or special agreement, no damages from the breach.

Thus, in Jones v. Morehead, 3 B. Mon. 377, it was held that a partner was not entitled to recover damages against a co-partner for excluding him from the business when under the circumstances there probably would not have been any profit, and necessarily the business must soon have been dissolved.

While prospective profits may not be recovered, on the ground of failure of proof, in cases where the basis of their recovery is merely speculation or conjecture, upon principle they are recoverable upon a breach of a contract of partnership.

Thus, prospective profits have been allowed to the plaintiff partner where the defendant partner excluded him from an existing retail business (Ramsay v. Meade, 37 Colo. 465, 86 Pac. 1018); sold the machinery and broke up a flour business in which the defendant was to furnish the capital, and the plaintiff was to manage the business (Dart v. Laimbeer, 107 N. Y. 664, 14 N. E. 291); failed in his contract to furnish steers on his farm, which the plaintiff was to conduct on shares with a share of profits in the steers (Rule v. McGregor, 117 Iowa, 419, 90 N. W. 811); failed in his contract to furnish live stock, to be managed on shares by the plaintiff on the plaintiff's farm (Brown v. Hadley, 43 Kan. 267, 23 Pac. 492); excluded plaintiff from a piece of real estate which they were to operate as partners (Maguire v. Kiesel, 86 Conn. 453, 85 Atl. 689); refused to carry out his contract, by which his house was to be managed as a hotel by the plaintiff on shares (Crittenden v. Johnston, 7 App. Div. 258, 40 N. Y. Supp. 87); refused to carry out his contract to permit the plaintiff to conduct his farm on shares (Hoy v. Grenoble, 34 Pa. 9, 75 Am. Dec. 628); failed to carry 51 L.R.A. (N.S.)

out his contract to provide the capital for the business of buying and selling horses (Hunter v. Land, 81 Pa. 296); excluded plaintiff from a quarry which they were to work, dividing the profits (Treat v. Hiles, 81 Wis. 280, 50 N. W. 896); failed in his contract to manufacture and introduce with due diligence a patented article, the patent of which had been assigned to him by the plaintiff for a fixed sum to be paid out of the net profits (Winslow v. Lane, 63 Me. 161).

In Taylor v. Bradley, 39 N. Y. 129, 100 Am. Dec. 415, reported more fully in 1 Abb. App. Dec. 363, it was held in an action on breach of a contract to manage a farm on shares, that it was error to disallow all damages except the increased expense of hiring another farm and of removing to it. (Note that the authority of this case lies in very narrow compass, that the opinions of the judges were individual, and that the opinion of Judge Woodruff is criticized in Wakeman v. Wheeler & W. Mfg. Co. 101 N. Y. 205, 54 Am. Rep. 676, 4 N. E. 264.)

In Gale v. Leckie, 2 Starkie, 107, where an author failed to furnish a book to publishers who were to divide the profits with him, the jury found damages for £50 more than the amount of the paper and printing expenses, the court having charged them: "You will no doubt indemnify the plaintiffs against the expenses which they have incurred in paper and in printing; it is a waste of time to say that to this they are entitled in the strictest justice. The sum of £90 has been stated by the witnesses as the amount of the profit which would probably have been derived from the first edition, and it is doubtful whether it would have reached a second."

Judicial explanations.

"It is not true that loss of profits cannot be allowed as damages for a breach of contract. Losses sustained and gains prevented are proper elements of damage; . . . future profits, . . . so far as they can be properly proved, . . . may form the measure of damage. As they are

it a binding contract. There was evidence that the station and stock of goods had been agreed upon. As the jury found in appellant's favor on the issue involved, the instruction, although excepted to by appellant, could not have been prejudicial as against him; yet, in view of the new trial which must be ordered, we announce our approval of the instruction as given.

Other assignments of error, in substance, present two questions: (1) Whether appellant can recover damages occasioned by loss of anticipated profits; and (2) whether he can recover damages occasioned by loss of time, and for necessary disbursements. The trial judge at first held he could recover for loss of anticipated profits only, and that, the contract being one for a partnership which could be terminated at any time after the business had actually been installed, appellant's claim for lost profits should be confined to those that might have been earning during the year 1908. He further held appellant could not recover for loss of time, or for expenses incurred. As before stated, a verdict was returned for $8,000; but later the trial judge sustained respondents' motion for judgment non obstante veredicto, on the theory that no valid contract had been shown. We conclude that he erred in sustaining the motion, and also erred in the theory upon which he tried the case.

There was sufficient evidence to be submitted to the jury upon the issue whether there was a definite, certain, and binding contract, and the jury, upon such evidence, prospective, they must, to some extent, be uncertain and problematical, and yet on that account a person complaining of breach of contract is not to be deprived of all remedy. It is usually his right to prove the nature of his contract, the circumstances surrounding and following its breach, and the consequences naturally and plainly traceable to it, and then it is for the jury, under proper instructions as to the rules of damages, to determine the compensation to be awarded for the breach. When a contract is repudiated, the compensation of the party complaining of its repudiation should be the value of the contract." Wakeman v. Wheeler & W. Mfg. Co. supra (not a partnership matter).

In Schrandt v. Young, 2 Neb. (Unof.) 546, 89 N. W. 607, where the case was probably not a partnership, the court said in approving the right to recover the loss of future profits in sheep: "To our mind, such damages are no more contingent or uncertain than would be the damages resulting in a personal injury to a professional man, and yet the books are full of cases where such damages have been allowed, based upon the probable damages."

In Maguire v. Kiesel, 86 Conn. 453, 85 Atl. 689, where the defendant excluded the plaintiff from a partnership to operate in a certain piece of real estate, in holding that anticipated profits were to be considered in estimating the damages, the court said: "The measure of damages in the present case is therefore reasonable compensation for the loss which the plaintiff suffered in being wrongfully deprived of the benefit of the agreement. That which it provided for was a sharing of anticipated profits. Such profits were therefore within the contemplation of the parties. . . . The measure of the loss must be found in the profits which under the agreement the plaintiff would have been entitled to receive. . . . If the compensation is to be adequate, as the law endeavors, as best it can, to make it, prospective as well as past profits must be taken into account in so far as the former are established with the requisite degree of certainty in respect to both connection and amount. . . . The question which arises in such cases relates not so much to the legal right of recovery as to the sufficiency of proof. There will be questions as to the proximate or remote character of the connection between the claimed profits and the alleged breach, and as to the certainty of the proof as to the amount. . . . The requirement of the law, however, is not that prospective profits, in order to furnish a foundation for recovery, must be established with absolute certainty. It is sufficient that it be shown that they are, in the ordinary course of events, reasonably to be expected," and that, in making up an estimation of prospective profits, past profits might be taken into consideration.

Illustrations.

On a contract of partnership to run a lumber sawmill, where defendant sold the mill before the expiration of the term, and the plaintiff was to be entitled to one fourth of the income of the mill and a certain stipulated price per day for hauling, it was held that the plaintiff was entitled to recover as an item of damage one fourth of the value of the gross cut of the mill per day for the unexpired term of the partnership, less the expenses per day, and in addition the sum per day for hauling less the expenses of the hauling, but that he was not entitled to recover for loss on mules purchased, which he was obliged to purchase under the contract, and sold at a loss, nor for various other expenses in matters which became useless to him owing to the breach of the contract, as all these were part of his operating expenses. Tygart v. Albritton, 5 Ga. App. 412, 63 S. E. 521, where the court said: "We think the damages are not remote, speculative, or legally uncertain, but were clearly in the contemplation of the parties when the contract was made. The profits on the contract sued for are 'the immediate fruit of the contract.' and the loss thereof can be 'traced solely to the breach of the contract.'" which was properly submitted, found a valid contract had been made. We hold that under the contract here involved appellant was not entitled to recover damages for loss of anticipated profits. The contract contemplated the establishment of a future business in a remote and sparsely settled country, under dangerous and adverse conditions. It did not pertain to any existing business. Any loss of profits would necessarily mean the loss of such anticipated profits as might possibly be earned in the future from a business not yet created, installed, or conducted. There was no going business which had previously earned profits sufficient to form a basis upon which to estimate probable future profits. Evidence offered to show a loss of profits in this action would necessarily consist of opinions of witnesses, uncertain and speculative in character. Who could anticipate or foretell that circumstances or contingencies might not have arisen after the business had been actually installed, which would result in a total failure to earn any profits whatever? It is common knowledge that parties expecting profitable results frequently enter upon business enterprises which terminate in failure. This court, in common with others, has held that loss of profits under certain conditions may be the basis of a recovery in actions for damages, and appellant has cited the following cases from this court in support of that rule: Skagit R. & Lumber Co. v. Cole, 2 Wash. 57, 25 Pac. 1077; Federal Iron & Brass Bed Co. v. Hock, 42 Wash. 668, 85 Pac. 418; Belch

In Treat v. Hiles, supra, where the plaintiffs discovered a quarry and induced the defendant to buy it under an arrangement that they were to work it with the profits divided as long as the quarry might last, and soon after the purchase the defendant excluded the plaintiffs from the quarry and worked it thereafter for a period of three years next preceding the trial, it was held that the jury reasonably allowed the plaintiffs for prospective profits four times the amount of the profit of the third year.

But in an action by a partner excluded from a partnership for the term of twelve years, to build and conduct a tannery, it was held that he could not, in order to show probable profits, introduce evidence of experts as to what the profits would have been, but the facts should be shown. Reed v. McConnell, 101 N. Y. 270, 4 N. E. 718.

Yet in Rhodes v. Baird, infra, II. c (2), the court, in refusing to allow prospective profits as too speculative, held that expert opinion was proper to show the market value of property the use of which was lost to the plaintiff by the breach of contract.

—California statute.

Where the loss of prospective profits is the natural and direct consequence of the breach of the contract, they may be recovered under the California statute providing that "the measure of damages for the breach of a contract is 'the amount which will compensate the party aggrieved for all the detriment proximately caused thereby, or which, in the ordinary course of things, would be likely to result therefrom.'" Shoemaker v. Acker, 116 Cal. 239, 48 Pac. 62, where, under the agreement, the defendant was to purchase land and provide the materials for its improvement and planting in lemon or orange trees, and the plaintiff was to give his time and attention to the improvement and management of the land, and was to be compensated by a share of profits therein, and he was excluded from the premises and the matter brought to an end by the conduct of the defendant before the expiration of the term.

Election of remedies.

Where the plaintiff entered into a contract of partnership with the lessee of an opera house, the plaintiff to be manager during the term of the lease, and before his services were to begin the defendant excluded him from the partnership, and thereafter sold the lease at a considerable figure, it was held that the plaintiff had one of two remedies,—he must either treat the contract as existing and then go for his share of profits, or else consider it as repudiated and go for his damages; and that, having considered it as repudiated, and having brought an action for damages for the breach, in which he was allowed to recover for loss of profits, he could not claim a specific interest in the amount which had been received from the sale of the lease, as he had nothing whatever to do with that amount. Greenwall Theatrical Circuit Co. v. Markowitz, 97 Tex. 479, 65 L.R.A. 302, 79 S. W. 1069.

(2) Where prospective profits are not allowed.

While it may be doubted whether there is any substantial authority for the view that on principle prospective profits are too speculative for allowance, individual cases refusing such profits might by themselves seem to give some countenance to such a theory. Thus, in Couch v. Parker, 1 Tex. App. Civ. Cas. (White & W.) 192, where the plaintiff was employed to manage a herd of cattle, and was to have a share of increase, and was ousted before the contract expired, it was held error to permit him to give his estimate as to what would have been his share of the increase up to the time of the trial and after the defendant had ousted him from the control, as it was considered that such imaginary, speculative, and hypothetical profits were too remote to be the basis of a legitimate claim. Compare with preceding cases.

In Rhodes v. Baird, 16 Ohio St. 573, where the agreement was that the plaintiff was to rent land of the defendant for ten years, and set out a peach orchard, the

v. Big Store Co. 46 Wash. 1, 89 Pac. 174; Church v. Wilkeson-Tripp Co. 58 Wash. 262, 137 Am. St. Rep. 1059, 108 Pac. 596, 109 Pac. 113.

The first three cases cited either award damages for actual losses which were not in the nature of profits, or disclosed an established business which presented facts and practical experience upon which an estimate of lost profits could be intelligently predicated. In the Church Case a recovery was allowed only for commissions on sales shown to have been actually made. An examination of the authorities will show that the courts with marked uniformity have announced the doctrine that, where an established business has been interrupted or destroyed by breach of contract, or by tort, a resulting loss of profits may become the basis of a recovery; there being a past experience sufficient to render the extent of such loss reasonably certain, and fairly susceptible of proof. Bogart v. Pitchless Lumber Co. 72 Wash. 417, 130 Pac. 490. The cases from this court cited by appellant, where the loss of profits was involved, are in harmony with this rule. The doctrine is equally well established that a loss of prospective profits will not become a basis of recovery in an action upon the breach of a contract to launch a new venture or business. "Where a profit has actually been made, this may be proved as very pertinent to the question what the future profits would probably have been, had not the business been interrupted, and as a material profits to be divided, and after the plaintiff had expended a large amount of money in setting out trees, etc., the defendant declined to execute the lease stipulated for, and evicted the plaintiff, it was held that it was erroneous to permit the plaintiff to prove the value of possible profits by showing the value of the trees and their possible crop, as such profits were remote and contingent, and that the expenditures of the plaintiff could not be recovered. While the opinion is obscure, it apparently confines the plaintiff to the value of the use of the premises, and states: "As respects the property, the immediate or proximate consequence of the breach of the contract, by the eviction, was the loss of the use of the premises for the term. To the extent that the damages depended on the loss of the use of the property, its market value at the time of the eviction, subject to the performance of the contract on the part of the plaintiff, furnished the standard for assessing the damages. If it had no general market value, its value should have been ascertained from witnesses whose skill and experience enabled them to testify directly to such value, in view of the hazards and chances of the business to which the land was to be devoted." Compare with Shoemaker v. Acker, supra, II. c (1).

It was indeed the opinion of an intermediate court in Van Ness v. Fisher, 5 Lans. 236, while not necessary to the decision, that profits beyond the time of trial could not be recovered, because they could not be calculated, and it sought to limit the theory of the decision in Bagley v. Smith, 10 N. Y. 489, 61 Am. Dec. 756, supra, II. b, and the cases therein cited, to profits up to the time of trial. But the decision in the Bagley Case was on broad grounds, and the later New York cases show that the opinion in the Van Ness Case is not of value on the question.

. Speculative profits.

Where prospective profits rest on speculation and conjecture they cannot be allowed.

Thus, upon breach of a contract to combine and hold stock for sale, it was held that plaintiff's speculative chance of possibly being able to sell a majority of the stock for a higher price than the current market value of ordinary stock, and the possibility that the plaintiff might have been able to combine with others in such a sale of the majority of the stock at a higher price, could not be considered in estimating the damages. Havemeyer v. Havemeyer, 13 Jones & S. 464.

For other cases of where prospective profits were held to be speculative, see infra, II. c (3).

—in a new business.

It will be seen that in WEBSTER v. BEAU, the court refused to permit an estimate to be made of prospective profits in a new business in a distant and sparsely settled country. While this decision may be supported on the ground that under the facts prospective profits would rest on speculation or conjecture, the court seems to go beyond what is necessary for the decision, and to suggest a general rule that prospective profits ought not to be allowed on breach of a partnership to go into a new business. It seems clear from the cases cited supra, c (1), that there is no such rule. It there appears that prospective profits in new ventures have been allowed in live stock contracts, in managing pieces of real estate, in publishing a new book, in buying and selling horses, etc.

It may be here noted that the following cases cited in the opinion in WEBSTER v. BEAU are not partnership cases: Central Coal & Coke Co. v. Hartman, 49 C. C. A. 244, 111 Fed. 98; Kenny v. Collier, 79 Ga. 743, 8 S. E. 58; Paola Gas Co. v. Paola Glass Co. 56 Kan. 614, 54 Am. St. Rep. 598, 44 Pac. 621; Winslow Elevator Co. v. Hoffman, 107 Md. 621, 17 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1130, 69 Atl. 394.

(3) Other bases of recovery where profits are too speculative.

It is the disposition of the courts in general to find some other measure of damages aid to the jury in the solution of this question; but where no profit has ever been realized, the mere loss of an opportunity to try to make a profit is of too uncertain value to be compensated." 1 Sedgw. Damages, 9th ed. § 193.

Counsel cite and especially rely upon Dennis v. Maxfield, 10 Allen, 138, to sustain appellant's right to recover for loss of prospective profits herein. Commenting on that case Mr. Sedgwick, in his work on Damages, immediately after the quotation above made, further says: "In Dennis v. Maxfield the plaintiff was hired for a whaling voyage, and was to receive a certain 'lay' or percentage of the profits, and additional compensation if the cargo reached a certain amount. Being wrongfully dismissed, it was held he could recover compensation for both items of loss; the voyage having ended and the profits of the voyage being known. . . . This, it must be noted, is a contract where the profits are those of a business, not the profits of the plaintiff's individual exertions. He may in such a case wait until the business is completed, and the profit realized, and then recover his proportion, as he did in the case just cited; or, if the business has been so long established that he can reasonably prove that a profit will be realized, he may recover at once upon the breach. But if it is a new enterprise, and there is no proof that profit will be made, the plaintiff can prove no loss, and should recover no damages on account of the loss of profits; the burden of where prospective profits are too speculative, as a basis of recovery.

Besides the cases infra, see also on this matter, Howe Mach. Co. v. Bryson; Rogers v. Bemus; Hunt v. Reilly; and Johnson v. Arnold, infra, III.; Kiralfy v. Macauley, infra, IV.; Ball v. Britton, infra, V. See also in this connection, Rhodes v. Baird, supra, II. c (1).

In Reiter v. Morton, 96 Pa. 229, where, after a contract for the manufacture of certain articles in iron, to continue for not less than fifteen years, had continued a little over a year, it was claimed by the plaintiff that the defendant wrongfully dissolved the partnership, it was held that it was error to allow the jury to find for prospective profits in a business of such a character to be carried on for so long a time. And the court laid down its opinion as to the measure of damages in such a case as follows: "We apprehend that in such an action as this the measure of damages would be the actual money value of the plaintiff's interest in the contract of partnership at the time of the breach. What would the interest sell for to a person willing to buy and having the means to buy? As illustrating this question, the actual state and condition of the property, business, and assets of the firm at the time, together with proof as to actual results accomplished, whether of profit or loss, or both, in the past, would be competent evidence. Beyond this, at least so far as conjectural profits in the future are concerned, it would not be safe to go. In these remarks we do not mean in any way to change or qualify the existing state of the law as to proof of profits in particular cases and in single transactions. There are many such when proof of the profit which might have been realized, had there been no breach, is eminently proper. What we decide now is the rule for this particular class of cases."

In Shropshire v. Adams, 40 Tex. Civ. App. 339, 89 S. W. 448, the court seems to have been of the opinion that one could not recover for the value of his share of a herd of cattle after several years' management by him under a contract in which he was to have one fourth; that the matter was too speculative and that there was an easy and safe rule of damages in those cases, which was to take the plaintiff's proportion or one fourth of the cost of cattle at the time they were to have been bought, with interest; but the matter was not decided.

III. Loss of time or earnings.

The authorities are not agreed as to whether the loss of time or earnings of the wronged partner is or is not an element of damages upon a breach of the contract. Logically loss of time or earnings is not a proper element of damages where the value of the loss of profits can be shown; but on the other hand, where the amount of prospective profits cannot be shown beyond mere conjecture, it is fair and reasonable that loss of time or earnings should be shown as a substitute. It would seem that in the Rockwell Case, infra, the court takes the view that loss of time is not a proper element in any case, and such was probably the view of the courts in the Adams and Williams Cases, infra. In the Meylert and M'Neill Cases, where proof of loss of time or services was allowed, it does not appear that any effort was made to show what the prospective profits would have been. In most of the other cases under this subdivision, we have the loss of time or earnings allowed distinctly as a substitute for prospective profits when these are too speculative for allowance.

It has been held that the damages do not take the form of the per diem value of the labor of the person against whom the wrong is committed. Rockwell Stock & Land Co. v. Castroni, 6 Colo. App. 521, 42 Pac. 180, where the arrangement was that the plaintiff was to go to defendants' farm, superintend the erection of buildings for the hennery business, buy hens and manage them, and the profits were to be divided, and after the buildings were erected and the hens bought, the defendants declined to go on with the arrangement. It was held that it was error to admit, as an proving a profit is upon him." This rule is well sustained by authority. Kenny v. Collier, 79 Ga. 743, 8 S. E. 58; Central Coal & Coke Co. v. Hartman, 49 C. C. A. 244, 111 Fed. 96; Paola Gas Co. v. Paola Glass Co. 56 Kan. 614, 54 Am. St. Rep. 598, 44 Pac. 621; Winslow Elevator Co. v. Hoffman, 107 Md. 621, 637, 17 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1130, 69 Atl. 394.

"Where a new business or enterprise is floated, and damages by way of profit are claimed for its interruption or prevention, they will be denied, for the reason that such business is an adventure, as distinguished from an established business, and its profits are speculative and remote, existing only in anticipation." 13 Cyc. 59.

"The loss of profits to a business which element of damage, the per diem value of the services of the plaintiff during the time that she had been on the farm, even though it was difficult to prove otherwise what she had suffered by the breach.

Where there had been previous contract relations between the parties, and the plaintiff had given them up at considerable loss when the contract of partnership was formed, it was held that it was error to permit the plaintiff to show this loss, as such evidence was not proper either to prove a breach or the amount of damages. Compensation for the contract broken according to its value, not at all according to any former contract, was all that the plaintiff could claim on a breach of the partnership agreement by the defendant. Addams v. Tutton, 39 Pa. 447.

So, it has been held that the loss of time or earnings is not an element of damages, as such loss is due to the contract, and not to the breach of it. In Williams v. Barton, 13 La. 404, where the defendant, at the solicitation of the plaintiff (his father-in-law), gave up his law practice in the city and entered upon the plaintiff's plantation, under an arrangement by which the latter was to provide the funds, and the plantation was to be conducted by the defendant and another, after a year the plaintiff brought an action for recovery of the land and personal property thereon. The defendant counterclaimed for the amount that his law practice would have probably given him during the time that he was on the plantation, but this was disallowed, as this loss was due to the contract, and not to the breach of it; but the court, on what ground does not appear, allowed him something over one third of the amount he claimed.

On the contrary, it has been held that one who has been deprived by the other contracting party of going on with a contract can recover as an element of his damage the amount of his earnings had he continued in his old business. Meylert v. Gas Consumers' Ben. Co. 26 Abb. N. C. 262, 14 N. Y. Supp. 148, where, upon the defendants' breach of a contract whereby the plain-has been wrongfully interrupted by another is an element of damage for which a recovery may be had; but it must be made to appear that the business was an established one,—that is, that it had been successfully conducted for such a length of time, and had such a trade established, that the profits thereof are reasonably ascertainable." States v. Durkin, 65 Kan. 101, 68 Pac. 1091.

A clear distinction is manifest between an interruption of or an injury to an existing business which has been successfully conducted for a considerable period of time, and the prevention of the establishment of an entirely new business. When the business is in contemplation, but not established, profits that may be anticipated therefrom are too speculative, uncertain, and conjectural to betiff was to act as their agent, the court allowed as an element of damage his probable earnings as a physician during the period from the making of the contract until its final abandonment. The court said: "I also find that, in consequence of the agreement between the plaintiff and the defendants, the former was induced to abandon his profession, from which he averaged an income of about $700 a month, and that, in consequence of the failure of the defendants to perform their agreements, the plaintiff not only lost the amounts which he actually expended, but the earnings which the evidence reasonably establishes he otherwise would have made from his profession. I therefore find that the loss of those earnings is a legitimate subject of damage in this case, and that the plaintiff is entitled to recover therefor the sum of $7,700, deducting therefrom the sum of $250, which the evidence shows he earned from his profession during the time of the running of said agreements. I also find that the whole of the plaintiff's time was necessarily devoted to his effort to introduce the burner in question upon the Pacific slope."

In Howe Mach. Co. v. Bryson, 44 Iowa, 159, 24 Am. Rep. 735, where there was a breach of a contract of employment or of agency to sell sewing machines, the court held that the measure of the agent's damages was either the profits upon sales that he would have made, or else the loss of his time and his expenses, and, as the number of sales he could have made was uncertain, he was entitled to recover damages for loss of time, two of the judges dissenting on the ground that the recovery must be upon the contract, and that the profits were not too uncertain for recovery. This decision, so far as it denies recovery on estimated loss of profits, is disapproved in Wakeman v. Wheeler & W. Mfg. Co. 101 N. Y. 205, 54 Am. Rep. 676, 4 N. E. 264, but was followed in Wilson Sewing Mach. Co. v. Sloan, 50 Iowa, 367.

In M'Neill v. Reid, 9 Bing. 68, 2 Moore & S. 89, 1 L. J. C. P. N. S. 162, where the defendant failed in his agreement to intro-come a basis for the recovery of damages in an action for the subsequent loss of such profits.

As there was evidence sufficient to sustain the finding of the jury that a valid and definite contract had been entered into between appellant and respondent Beau, and as, under the rule heretofore announced, appellant cannot recover damages for the loss of prospective profits, it necessarily follows that he is entitled to recover such losses as he actually sustained in the way of expenses incurred in performing his part of the agreement, and for loss of time while thus engaged. This was the view entertained by the court on the first trial, when appellant was ordered to remit a considerable amount of the verdict, or submit to a new trial, and is duce plaintiff into his firm, relying on which the plaintiff had given up an opportunity for a very lucrative employment, it was held to be proper to state to the jury that they might see that the plaintiff considered that the value of what he was to receive was the equivalent at least of that to be given up.

Loss of time has been allowed as a substitute for loss of profits when these could not be estimated.

Thus, where the partners were to build a sawmill, and owing to a breach by the defendant there was delay in building the mill, it was held that the fair rental value of the property was a proper measure by which to estimate the damages, and that, instead of profits which would have been speculative, the plaintiff, who was to run the mill, might prove the value of his time during the period of the delay, as he was not limited to a single mode of measuring or estimating his damages. Rogers v. Bemus, 69 Pa. 432. See also WEBSTER v. BEAU.

Perhaps it was upon this theory that loss of time was allowed for in Johnson v. Arnold, 2 Cush. 46, where the defendant prevented the carrying out of a contract under which the plaintiff was to go from Massachusetts to Indiana and there manage the defendant's store for two years, the defendant providing the store and stock, and the plaintiff his time and services, and the profits were to be divided; and the plaintiff was allowed compensation for the loss of his time and for the expenses of removing his family from Massachusetts to Indiana and back again, against the defendant's contention that any recovery at all could be only for the loss of profits during the term of the contract.

In Hunt v. Reilly, 50 Tex. 99, where a partnership for the publication of a newspaper, etc., for a year, was ended after a few months by a suit against two of the three partners, attaching and enjoining the use of property which they under the agreement provided for use in the partnership, the remaining partner was held entitled to be compensated for loss of profits. But the 51 L.R.A. (N.S.)

the theory upon which the case must be again tried.

Upon the last trial there was an absolute failure of evidence sufficient to show that the defendant H. T. Harding was a party to the contract, or that he had authorized the respondent Beau to act for him when entering into the contract. As to the defendant Harding the judgment of dismissal was properly entered. As to the respondent Beau the judgment is reversed, and the cause is remanded for a new trial upon the issues joined between him and the appellant. The appellant will recover his costs in this court for the respondent Beau.

appellate court, being dissatisfied with the amount allowed on the proof, held that he was on other proof entitled to recover what he could have earned in his trade during the time that he was thrown out of employment and unable to procure it, and also his expenses in procuring other employment, and gave him the option to take judgment for these amounts, or to go back and take a new trial with the idea that he might be able to adduce other evidence as to profits.

It may be noted in this connection that where the loss is a definite fixed sum, loss of time is not an element of damage. Thus, where the plaintiff came from the Sandwich islands to Massachusetts in pursuance of a contract with the defendant that the latter would employ him at $1,500 a year as foreman, he was not entitled to recover, as part of his damages, his expenses in coming from the Sandwich islands, when the defendant refused to employ him on his arrival; nor was he allowed to recover for the loss of his time on the journey. It does not appear what he was allowed to recover, but it seems to be suggested that he was allowed to recover $1,500. Noble v. Ames Mfg. Co. 112 Mass. 492.

IV. Expenses.

Expenses logically should be deducted from profits, the balance being the measure of loss. But where there is no sufficient evidence as to what the profits would have been, expenses incurred in carrying out the contract ought fairly to be allowed as an element of damages. And this was probably the theory on which they were allowed in Gale v. Leckie, supra, II. c (1); and such is the general rule.

Thus, in Kiralfy v. Macauley, 17 Ohio L. J. 331, where the plaintiff agreed to incur certain expenses, and provide the advertising, renting, and supplying of a building for theatrical performances, and the defendant was to bring his company to such building for such performances, and failed to do so, it was held that the court correctly charged the jury that, inasmuch as there was no evidence tending to show what profits would have been realized, as this was a performance not in a usual theatrical house, the plaintiff was entitled to recover such expenditures as the jury might find reasonable and necessary, less any loss which the jury might find would have been incurred, had the contract been carried out. Distinguishing Rhodes v. Baird, infra. See also WEBSTER v. BEAU.

In Woodbury v. Jones, 44 N. H. 206, where the plaintiff, in Minnesota, in accordance with an agreement with the defendant to live upon the latter's farm in New Hampshire for a year, rented his real property in Minnesota, sold his personal property, and came on to New Hampshire, and thereafter the defendant excluded him from the premises, it was held that he could recover the expenses of his removal from Minnesota to New Hampshire, as those expenses were incurred after the contract had been made and in part performance of it, but that he could not recover any loss he had suffered on account of the sales of his property in Minnesota, unless it was clearly part of the contract. See also Johnson v. Arnold, supra, III.

In United States v. Behan, 110 U. S. 339, 28 L. ed. 168, 4 Sup. Ct. Rep. 81, where the government, having decided to give up a project, notified the contractor to stop work, and the contract was one in which the contractor had been required to make large preliminary expenses, and he brought an action for his preliminary expenses and for his profits, it was held that the profits were too speculative, and therefore must be disregarded, as also any possible losses, but that the contractor was entitled to his expenses.

Expenses in procuring other employment were held recoverable in a case where there was no adequate proof of profits. Hunt v. Reilly, 50 Tex. 99, supra, III.

But where the plaintiff recovers on the theory of profits, he cannot include his expenses and losses necessary in performing his part of the contract. Tygart v. Albritton, supra, II. c (1).

In Rhodes v. Baird, supra, II. c (2), it was held that the plaintiff's expenditures made in obtaining or performing the contract did not furnish the measure of his damages, or constitute the fact to which his evidence ought to have been directed, as this would be enabling a party to take his chances on a contract, and, if he made a bad bargain, to charge his losses upon his adversary, and if he had made a profitable one, to deprive him of its benefits. But this case is distinguished in Kiralfy v. Macauley, supra, this subdivision, as not laying down a general rule, but simply as stating what would not be fair in the particular case.

V. Services.

It has been held that the value of a partner's services actually rendered to the firm might be recovered, where he was excluded from a business, and the contract of partnership had no definite term, so that it was determinable at any time. Thus, in Ball v. Britton, 58 Tex. 57, where the plaintiff, possessing the requisite knowledge and skill, entered into a partnership with the defendant to construct and operate ice works, the defendant to supply the capital, and the plaintiff to be paid a certain sum a month, until it was repaid out of the profits, thereafter the profits to be equally divided, no time was set for the partnership. After the works were completed and operated a short time, the defendant excluded the plaintiff from the business. The court said that it could not protect the plaintiff against his omission to name a time for the duration of partnership, and that "under the circumstances, we think the measure of damages is the value of the services rendered by him, including his skill, his time and labor in constructing and operating the factory. Of course, from this would have to be deducted whatever he may have received of the profits, if anything, over and above what had been advanced to him by the defendant. This would be the measure of the actual damage."

And where, under the articles of copartnership, one of the partners was to receive a certain salary for superintendence, and the other partners excluded him from the superintendence, he was entitled to receive his salary until the time of the dissolution. Jennings v. Beale, 146 Pa. 125, 23 Atl. 225.

In Hagenaers v. Herbst, 30 App. Div. 546, 52 N. Y. Supp. 360, affirmed in 164 N. Y. 603, 58 N. E. 1088, upon the breach of the contract of partnership, the plaintiff was allowed to recover that part of his compensation which was fixed in definite terms at so much a year, and was not allowed anything for profits; but he did not appeal from this decision, which was rendered in construction of a special agreement made at the time of the dissolution.

The reason of the decision does not seem very clear in White v. Rodemann, 44 App. Div. 503, 60 N. Y. Supp. 971, where it was agreed that the plaintiff was to pay the defendant a certain sum for a half interest in his school, which they were to conduct as partners. On the defendant's refusal to carry out the contract, the plaintiff recovered in the trial court the amount that he had paid down on the agreement, also some expenditures that he had made in advertising the school, and the value of his services rendered. But on appeal it was held that, inasmuch as it was found that the contract was only partial, and looked to a more complete agreement, it should be considered that the expenditures were made and the services rendered in view of a more complete agreement, which had not been made, and that therefore the recovery must be confined to the amount that the plaintiff had paid down on the agreement.

Allowance to excluding partner for services in making profits.

There is little in the cases as to allowances to the excluding partner for his services in conducting the business. If the articles provide for such an allowance, it seems that it ought to be made in estimating profits.

Thus, where, by the articles, each partner was allowed a certain amount for personal expenses, the excluding partner was allowed this amount, as he managed the business after excluding the other partner. Karrick v. Hannaman, supra, II. b.

But where there is no provision in the articles, it does not seem that such an allowance rests on any principle of law.

In Zimmerman v. Harding, 227 U. S. 489, 57 L. ed. 608, 33 Sup. Ct. Rep. 387, the court on appeal affirmed with reluctance an allowance to the excluding partner for salary, there being no provision of that kind in the partnership articles, but the point was not properly raised on the appeal.

It is possible that such an allowance was considered proper in Hartman v. Woehr, supra, II. b, but the court's expression in the matter is of such obscurity as to be of no material value.

VI. Freud—misappropriation.

It is intended to include in this note only those cases of fraud where the wrongdoer contracted with the intent of not going on with the business.

Where the plaintiff's cause of action is that the defendant, not intending to go into partnership with him, succeeded in procuring him to furnish money in good faith for the purpose of a partnership, with the intent of defrauding the plaintiff out of it, the plaintiff may maintain an action at law to recover the money. Hale v. Wilson, 112 Mass. 444.

In Child v. Swain, 69 Ind. 230, where a person entered into partnership with two others, being himself an insurance agent for various companies, and having a good reputation, and the other two partners on coming in paid a certain consideration to such agent, and he a few days later absconded, whereby they lost the benefit of his reputation and had great difficulty in retaining any of his agencies, it was held that they were entitled to recover for his breach of the contract, as damages, the money that they had paid in on forming the partnership agreement, not as rescinding the contract, but because of a breach of it.

In Crosby v. McDermitt, 7 Cal. 146, where one partner, under the agreement, advanced money and materials, and the other partner appropriated them to his own use, a recovery was had for the money advanced with interest, and for a further sum which may have been the value of the materials furnished and appropriated, but this is not shown by the report.

VII. Particular contracts—illustrations.

Where a partnership agreement involved the taking and cutting of certain timber of one of the partners for shingles, at a certain price in a certain time, on a breach in failing to take the timber the measure of damages would be the difference between the value of the uncut timber as it stood at the time of the breach, and its value when converted into shingles at the stipulated rates in the articles of partnership, the claim to take the course and effect of any other claim against the partnership. Northern v. Tatum, 164 Ala. 368, 51 So. 17.

Where the defendant, being established in business, made an arrangement with the plaintiff by which the plaintiff was to manage the business, and was to be paid out of the profits $15 a week until the profit amounted to $800, when the defendant should take such profit, give to the plaintiff half of the business, and thereafter they should share the profits equally, the defendant excluded the plaintiff from the business when the profits had nearly equaled $800. It was held that the plaintiff was entitled to recover such sum as would fairly compensate him for his loss, and in estimating this the value of the property which he was to receive, and which he had earned within a mere trifle, might be taken into consideration, and it would not be unreasonable compensation. Gilbert v. Grubel, 82 Kan. 478, 108 Pac. 798.

In Holmes v. Gilman, 138 N. Y. 369, 20 L.R.A. 566, 34 Am. St. Rep. 463, 34 N. E. 205, where a partner appropriated to his own use large amounts of money of his firm, and took out insurance in favor of his wife and paid the premiums wholly out of the firm's money, taking the policies in her name, and upon his death was indebted to the firm for an amount larger than the amount of the insurance policies, it was held that the other partner was entitled to recover the amount of such insurance.

It may be noted that in McWhirter v. Douglas, 1 Coldw. 591, where one of several partners made a certain promise to his copartner if he would continue in an extension of the old firm, instead of accepting another offer, it was held that the amount that he was to pay was not to be left to the future, but was to be presently estimated at the beginning of the term, or as near the beginning as the parties could attend to the matter, the promise being, "I will pay you the estimated discrepancy between what the business of H. & B. . . . promises for the next three years, as compared with an offer made to you by another party for same time, which we now presume to be, from $1 to $3,000, so soon as a correct amount can be arrived at."

Recovery of advances.

Where the defendant had paid the plaintiff a premium for every year of a partnership to last five years, and after about a year the plaintiff wrongfully ended the partnership, it was held that the defendant was entitled to recover four fifths of the premium which he had paid. Corcoran v. Sumption, 79 Minn. 108, 79 Am. St. Rep. 428, 81 N. W. 761, where the plaintiff had asked for profits, but it seems that he had lost his right to claim that there was no dissolution.

In Nelson v. Hatch, 70 App. Div. 206, 75 N. Y. Supp. 389, affirmed in 174 N. Y. 546, 67 N. E. 1085, where the contract was that the plaintiff was to advance certain moneys for the prosecution of a lawsuit in which the defendants were counsel, and the defendants breached the contract after a certain sum had been advanced, it was held that the plaintiff was entitled to recover from them what he had advanced, and this was so although it appeared that afterward said suit was decided against the interests represented by the defendants.

In Kerrigan v. Kelly, 17 Mo. 275, the plaintiff recovered advances made to the owner of a house and lot on the understanding that they should use the house and lot as partners in the ice business, and that the plaintiff should be a part owner of the house and lot as well as of the business, and the owner of the house and lot refused to make a deed.

Concealment of property from partner.

In Sneed v. Deal, 53 Ark. 152, 13 S. W. 703, where two partners contemplating a dissolution renewed to themselves individually and secretly by negotiation with a lessor, a lease of property then occupied by the firm, and afterward sold out their interest in the firm and its property to a third partner, he knowing nothing about the new lease, it was held that the two partners who obtained the new lease took it in trust for the firm, and that the partner buying them out took the new lease. The same was held on similar facts in Struthers v. Pearce, 51 N. Y. 357.

As to right of one partner of a dissolved firm to maintain action at law against another for fraud practised upon dissolution with respect to assets, see the note to Crockett v. Burleson, 6 L.R.A.(N.S.) 263.

VIII. Miscellaneous.

In Cane v. MacDonald, 10 B. C. 444, where, after a partnership of architects had been formed, one of the partners received a government position in connection with the erection of a government building, and for a time paid in his salary to the firm, but later declared the firm dissolved and declined any longer to account for the salary, it was held that he could not be compelled to do so.

In Battle v. Willox, 40 Can. S. C. 198, where the owner of a sand quarry agreed with the plaintiff to enter into certain specified contracts with third parties, and the plaintiff was to indorse notes for the owner and was to have the right to take a certain share of the profits or a certain interest in the quarry, and the owner sold the quarry after making only part of the contracts, it was held that the plaintiff was entitled to recover the share of profits he would have made, had the defendant carried out his contract.

was held that the measure of damages on a breach of a contract to conduct a farm on shares was the value of the contract, the court not deciding whether the contract was a partnership or not, but the case went back for a new trial on other grounds.

In Skinner v. Tinker, 34 Barb. 333, where the plaintiff recovered a verdict of $4,000 for the refusal of the defendant to perform an agreement to enter into a partnership for the practice of dentistry in Cuba, the plaintiff, relying on the contract, had sold his practice in Brooklyn and put himself under bond not to practise there. It was held that the partnership having no definite term, a partner might dissolve it at any time, but that the plaintiff was entitled to his damages prior to the dissolution; but how the damages were measured does not appear.

Where one partner refuses to contribute his share of the capital, but the other partner avails himself of his services and does not end the relation, he cannot deprive the defaulting partner of his interest in the firm and profits. Akin v. Luce, 45 N. Y. S. R. 692, 18 N. Y. Supp. 392.

And where a partnership between A, B, and C was entered into on the understanding that C was to indorse A's notes to enable him to supply his share of the funds, and thereafter C declined to do so, B and C could not expel A for his failure to supply his share and exclude him from the profits. Westwood v. Crissey, 139 App. Div. 841, 124 N. Y. Supp. 97, reversing Westwood v. Cole, 66 Misc. 53, 120 N. Y. Supp. 884.

And where, after a certain period, one of the partners apparently abandoned what he believed to be a losing business, he could not recover for profits after that time. Kinloch v. Hamlin, 2 Hill, Eq. 19, 27 Am. Dec. 441.

It may be noted that in Stone v. Dennis, 3 Port. (Ala.) 231, the court has something to say both about loss of time and loss of profits, but its meaning is not clear; also that McCollum v. Carlucci, 206 Pa. 312, 98 Am. St. Rep. 788, 55 Atl. 979, is not so reported as to be of material value on the subject.

WEST VIRGINIA SUPREME COURT OF APPEALS.

CLARKE E. BROWN et al, Plffs. in Err.,
v.
AMOS HATHAWAY.

(— W. Va. —, 80 S. E. 959.)

Limitation of actions — action on foreign contract.

1. When properly construed, the clause of § 18, chap. 104, Code 1906, providing that, "upon a contract which was made and was to be performed in another state or country, by a person who then resided therein, no action shall be maintained after the right of action thereon is barred by the laws of such state or country," restricts, and does not enlarge, the statutory period of limitations prescribed by other sections of the same chapter.

Same — construction.

2. Such provision, when thus construed, means only that, if the right to maintain the action is in fact barred by lex loci contractus, it is also barred by lex fori, if the former period is less than the latter, or is complete before action thereon in this state.

(February 3, 1914.)

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Greenbrier County to review a judgment in defendant's favor in an action on a bond and note executed in another state. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Craig & Wolverton, for plaintiffs in error:

The same limitation applies to foreign contracts sued upon in this state as if they had been sued upon in the state where they were made and were to be performed.

Nash v. Tupper, 1 Caines, 402, 2 Am. Dec. 197; Isenberg v. Rainier, 70 Misc. 498, 127 N. Y. Supp. 411.

Mr. S. N. Pace also for plaintiffs in error.

Mr. Henry Gilmer for defendant in error.

Note. — Applicability of statute of the forum referring limitation to law of other jurisdiction, where period at forum is shorter than that prescribed by the foreign statute.

The question under annotation presupposes that all the conditions contemplated by the statute of the forum are present, so that the statute would concededly apply and give effect to the limitation prescribed by the foreign statute, if it were shorter than that period prescribed by the law of the forum. Therefore, cases which turn upon the question as to where the cause of action is deemed to have arisen within the meaning of the statute, or upon considerations as to residence or other conditions affecting the applicability of the statute, are not within the scope of this note. On those points, see notes referred to in Index to L.R.A. Notes, "Conflict of Laws," § 43.

While there are many cases involving the construction and effect of statutes of the kind under consideration, there are but comparatively few which present the distinctive question above outlined. The majority of those in point sustain the decision in BROWN v. HATHAWAY, and hold that a statute which provides, under certain conditions, that if, by the law of the state where the cause of action arose, an action cannot be maintained thereon by reason of the lapse of time, no action shall be maintained thereon at the forum, is inapplicable, if the limitation prescribed by the law of the forum is shorter than that prescribed by the foreign statute in question, and that in such case the general rule that limitation is governed by the law of the forum will prevail, assuming that, apart from the statute under consideration, there is a limitation at the forum applicable to the action in question, notwithstanding its foreign elements. Hoggett v. Emerson, 8 Kan. 262; Fletcher v. Spaulding, 9 Minn. 64, Gil. 54; Drake v. Bigelow, 93 Minn. 112, 100 N. W. 664; Wright v. Mordaunt, 77 Miss. 537, 78 Am. St. Rep. 536, 27 So. 640.

In Hoggett v. Emerson, supra, the court said: "The laws of the forum determine 51 L.R.A. (N.S.)

the remedy. We must look to the laws of this state to determine whether the action was barred. Section 22 of our Code of Civil Procedure is the only one which refers to the limitation laws of other states. That provides that the limitations prescribed by the other sections of the statute may in some cases be reduced by the limitation law of the state in which the cause of action arose. It makes no provision for any enlargement of the limitations of our laws. More than that, it refers only to causes of action arising in another state between non-residents of this state. The petition does not show whether defendants in error were nonresidents or residents of Kansas at the times the notes were executed or matured."

In Fletcher v. Spaulding, 9 Minn. 64, Gil. 54, the court said: "We cannot see how this provision in any way affects the case at bar. The effect of it is simply to allow a citizen of Minnesota to plead the statute of limitations of a foreign state or country when it is more favorable than our own, and to allow the same citizen, when he is plaintiff in a foreign cause of action, which he has had from the time it accrued, the benefit of our own statute."

There are also some very strong dicta in the New York cases to the effect that the period prescribed by the statute of the forum would not, because of such a statute, be lengthened by the statute of the state where the action arose. Thus, in Howe v. Welch, 14 Daly, 80, the court said: "In order to prevent misunderstanding in the future, I deem it proper to say that but for the determination of the defendant to stake his case upon the efficiency of the Iowa statute as a bar, the courts of New York, after deciding that that statute had not run, would have tested the defendant's liability by the lex fori, the statute of limitations of the state of New York. In other words, if the debt were barred by the Iowa statute, no action could be maintained in a court of this state; but if the debt were not barred in Iowa, the statute of limitations of the state of New York might nevertheless have been a bar in this action." And in affirming Isenberg v. Rainier, 70 Misc. 498, 127 N. Y.

Lynch, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Upon the return day of a notice pursuant to and for the purpose authorized by § 6, chap. 121, Code 1906, plaintiffs, Brown & Brown, partners, moved for judgment against defendant on two writings obligatory,—one dated October 23, 1895, for $1,000, payable one day after date at Mt. Jewett Bank, Mt. Jewett, Pennsylvania; the other dated March 23, 1896, for $250, payable two months after date at the same bank. The contracts were therefore to be performed in Pennsylvania. The parties thereto then resided, and plaintiffs have since continuously resided, in that state. Defendant, though a resident of this state since 1897, was and remained a resident of Pennsylvania until after the right of action on the obligations had accrued.

Whether defendant may plead and rely on the statute of limitations of this state, to defeat a judgment on the obligations, presents the sole inquiry requiring examination. Under the statute of Pennsylvania, if applicable, the present action may be maintained; by our law the right to sue on similar contracts is barred in ten years after it accrues. Unless otherwise expressly provided, the general rule is that the law of the forum, and not the law of the place where the cause of action arose, governs as to remedies, as distinguished from the rights of the parties; and the statutes of limitations are part of the remedy, and not

Supp. 411, the court in 145 App. Div. 256, 130 N. Y. Supp. 27, said: "It may be said, however, that the apprehension expressed in one of the opinions that, under such circumstances as exist in the present case, a resident of this state might find himself open to suit by a nonresident without the protection of any statute of limitations, is unfounded. The effect of § 390a of the Code of Civil Procedure is not to substitute the foreign statute of limitations for our own, but to impose it as an additional limitation. Thus, an action, whether by a resident or nonresident, must be brought within the time limited by our general statute of limitations, and if it arose in a foreign state in favor of a nonresident, it cannot be brought after the time limited by the laws of the state in which the cause of action arose. Thus, a resident of this state, if not protected by the laws of the state in which the cause of action arose, by reason of his continued absence from that state, may still claim the protection of our own statute of limitations."

In BROWN v. HATHAWAY, the court said: "Though they cite Nash v. Tupper, 1 Caines, 402, 2 Am. Dec. 197, and Isenberg v. Rainier, 70 Misc. 498, 127 N. Y. Supp. 411, so construing a similar statute of New York, we decline to accept that construction." This statement regarding the holdings of the New York courts is clearly erroneous. The case of Nash v. Tupper did not arise under a statute, and the court enforced the common-law rule that the law of the forum applied. In the other case cited there is dictum supporting the statement, but, as will be seen (see same case, supra), the dictum was corrected, while the decision was being affirmed on appeal, both courts holding that the action was not barred by the foreign statute, while the local statute of limitations was not in question.

But in Kentucky where a statute which provides that "when a cause of action has arisen in another state or country, between residents of such state or country, or between them and residents of another state or country, and by the laws of the state or country where the cause of action accrued, an action cannot be maintained thereon by reason of the lapse of time, no action can be maintained thereon in this state," is construed to apply only in case the parties to the suit were nonresidents of Kentucky at the time the action accrued (Labatt v. Smith, 4 Ky. L. Rep. 422, affirmed in 83 Ky. 599, overruling Allen v. Hill, 78 Ky. 119; John Shillito Co. v. Richardson, 102 Ky. 51, 42 S. W. 847; Smith v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. 157 Ky. 113, 162 S. W. 564), it is held, contrary to the cases above cited, that where both parties to the action were nonresidents at the time the action accrued, the foreign statute will be applied, whether the period of limitation prescribed is longer or shorter than that prescribed by the law of the forum. Labatt v. Smith, 83 Ky. 599; John Shillito Co. v. Richardson, 102 Ky. 51, 42 S. W. 847; Smith v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. supra, where the court said: "The construction of this statute is no longer an open question. It has been held that the necessary effect thereof is to declare that if a cause of action arising in another state or country, between residents of such state or country, or between them or residents of another state or country, is not barred by the laws of that state or country, it is not barred in action between the same parties in the courts of this state."

Even assuming, as held by the cases first cited, that a statute of the character under discussion does not apply so as to give the foreign statute precedence over a shorter statute of limitation at the forum, when there is such a statute otherwise applicable to the case, it may be that when the statutes of limitation of the forum are consulted, it will be found that they do not prescribe any period applicable to the particular cause of action in question, or that the running of the statute of the forum in the particular case has been prevented by the absence or nonresidence of the defendant, in which event the action, if not barred by the foreign statute, may be maintained. Upon this hypothesis, however, the result is not due to the effect of the statute under consideration to make the foreign statute of the laws affecting rights of the parties to the contract.

But for plaintiffs it is urged that the concluding clause of § 18, chap. 104, Code 1906, when properly construed, contravenes thus rule, and in lieu of our own statutory bar substitutes that of Pennsylvania. It provides that, "upon a contract which was made and was to be performed in another state or country, by a person who then resided therein, no action shall be maintained after the right of action thereon is barred by the laws of such state or country." May the plain purport of the language and terms of this provision be so enlarged as to impress upon it by construction a meaning and purpose which, if intended, the legislature could have made clear by plain and unambiguous language? Plaintiffs would have us interpret it to mean that, upon a contract made and to be performed in another state, by a person who then resided therein, an action may be maintained in this state at any time after the cause of action arose therein, and before the expiration of the period of limitation fixed by such state, even though the right of action thereon were barred by the statute of this state. Though they cite Nash v. Tupper, 1 Caines, 402, 2 Am. Dec. 197, and Isenberg v. Rainier, 70 Misc. 498, 127 N. Y. Supp. 411, so construing a similar statute of New York, we decline to accept that construction. In our view, such construction does violence to the terms of the statute, and impresses on them a meaning not only not inferable therefrom, but in plain violation of the meaning and purport of the language employed. On the contrary, the clause, properly interpreted, means that, if the right to maintain an action on contracts made and to be performed in another state by one who then resided therein is barred by the laws of that state, no action thereon may be maintained in this state, though, if of limitation prevail whether it prescribes a shorter or a longer period, but to the absence of an applicable limitation under the law of the forum. The question as to the effect of absence or nonresidence to prevent the running of the statute of limitations is not within the scope of the present note, but, in illustration of the point just made, the case of McCann v. Randall, 147 Mass. 81, 9 Am. St. Rep. 666, 17 N. E. 75, is here referred to, it being held in that case that, the defendant never having been a resident of Massachusetts, the Massachusetts statute of limitation never began to run in his favor, and the question was simply whether the action was barred by the foreign statute invoked by the defendant.

So, in Crocker v. Pearson, 41 Kan. 410, 21 Pac. 270, the court said in effect that the five-year limitation of the Kansas statute was not applicable, because it was not made and to be performed in this state, it may not be so barred. Any other construction is unauthorized, and at variance with the decisions of other courts. When the will of the legislature is clearly expressed, it should control. All statutory provisions are to be construed and applied "according to the exact and specific language of the enactments." Hatch v. Spofford, 24 Conn. 432.

In construing a similar statutory provision, Wright v. Mordaunt, 77 Miss. 537, 78 Am. St. Rep. 536, 27 So. 640, holds that "its sole purpose and effect are to give to one sued in this state the benefit of a bar completed elsewhere." Hoggett v. Emerson, 8 Kan. 262, says the effect of such a clause is to reduce the limitation law of that state, but that "it makes no provision for any enlargement of the limitations of our laws." In Fletcher v. Spaulding, 9 Minn. 64, Gil. 54, it is said that the effect of the provision is simply to allow a citizen of Minnesota to plead the statute of limitations of a foreign state "when it is more favorable than our own," or to the same purpose "foreign statutes may also be taken advantage of against foreign plaintiffs when more favorable than our own. . . . Nor can we see any good reason why our citizens should rest under greater obligations toward foreign creditors than are imposed upon them in regard to our own."

The diversity of views among the courts discussing the clauses is perhaps more apparent than real. It is in part the result of a difference in phraseology. Some of them provide that no action shall be maintained if the bar of the foreign statute becomes complete "while the party to be charged was a resident of such state," or "while he resided therein," or "while the parties resided therein," or "when an action cannot be maintained by reason of the lapse of time." Hence each statute must and shown that the defendant was ever in the state of Kansas after the mortgage debt became due, and that the case was controlled as to its limitation by the statute of the state where the mortgage and notes were executed and payable, the period prescribed by that statute being ten years, which had not expired. It will be observed, for the reason just stated, that this case is not in conflict with the Hoggett Case, but on the other hand impliedly recognizes the doctrine of that case.

A somewhat similar distinction is discussed in the note to Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Burkhart, 46 L.R.A.(N.S.) 687, in connection with the question as to the law governing limitation where an action is brought in one state upon a cause of action created by a statute of another.

J. W. M.

can only be properly interpreted in view of the terms used by the legislature. Thus, the difference in the terms of the several state statutes affords, to some extent, an explanation for the existence of the divergent views obtaining in the various jurisdictions relating to a conflict in limitation laws.

Our conclusion is that the Circuit Court properly construed and applied our statute. We therefore affirm its judgment of June 29, 1911.

(— Ariz. —, 136 Pac. 273.)

Corporation — suit by minority stockholders — demand on management.

1. Demand on a corporation and its management to bring suit to recover corporation property which had been transferred

Note. — Necessity of applying to board of directors as a condition of right of stockholder to sue on behalf of the corporation.

The ordinary remedy for injuries to the corporation is to be sought primarily through corporate action. 10 Cyc. 964. Public policy requires that persons pooling their capital by becoming stockholders be prohibited from bringing actions or suits for the benefit of the corporation. Otherwise, no one would be safe in transacting business with a corporation, and dissolution would be inevitable.

But conditions frequently make it necessary, in the interest of justice and fair dealing, to permit a stockholder or stockholders to enforce corporate rights or restrain corporate action, and when such conditions exist the courts permit suits to be thus brought and maintained. Assuming that the corporation has a right of action in the premises, and that complainant is a stockholder in good standing who is indirectly injured, by virtue of his being a stockholder, on account of the injury to the corporation, what are the conditions that will enable him to sue in behalf of the corporation?

The note is limited to cases where the loss to the complaining stockholders is due solely to corporate loss, and the right of the complainant to sue is derivative, i. e., the stockholder claims the right to maintain a suit to enforce a corporate right beto another corporation is not necessary to sustain a suit by minority stockholders, where the managers, who had complete control of the affairs of the corporation, are shown to have been hostile to plaintiffs, and to have acted upon a preconceived plan to accomplish the result complained of.

Courts — jurisdiction — foreign corporation — submission.

2. A foreign corporation cannot complain if the court exercises a jurisdiction to which it has submitted itself.

Same — title to local property — foreign claimant.

3. The courts of the state within which is situated property alleged to have been fraudulently transferred by a domestic to a foreign corporation have jurisdiction of a suit to set aside the transfer.

Corporation — fraudulent management — action by minority stockholder.

4. It is fraudulent for the management of a corporation to permit its real estate of great value to be sold under execution for a nominal sum, when there are funds in their possession sufficient to pay the judgment, and the corporation dissolved for the purpose of destroying the value of the stock of a minority stockholder, which will give him a right of action therefor.

Limitation of actions — fraud — discovery — unsound mind.

5. An action by an executor to set aside a transfer of the property of a corporation cause of the effect indirectly upon himself as stockholder. Cases turning upon the standing of the stockholder are excluded. As to the right of stockholder to attack fraudulent transaction before he had acquired his stock, see note to Pollitz v. Gould, 38 L.R.A.(N.S.) 988.

One condition is that the stockholder cannot obtain the desired relief within the corporation, and the burden is upon him to show that this condition exists. The decisions show that if he proves to the satisfaction of the court that this condition exists, he has a prima facie right to bring suit in behalf of the corporation. The usual practice is to bring the suit in his own name and on behalf of all stockholders similarly situated, against the parties who are liable to the corporation. The corporation should also be made a party to the suit. As to the necessity of making the corporation a party to the suit, see note to Kelly v. Thomas, post, 122.

The stockholder may sufficiently prove that the condition above stated exists by showing that he made demand upon the corporate authorities to take such action in the premise as would do justice to the corporation, and that they refused to do so; or he may prove facts from which it is apparent that any such demand would have been useless. That he must show by one or the other of these two methods that no relief within the corporation is possible, in order to entitle him to maintain the suit, is a rule universally adopted by courts of equity.

of which his testator was a stockholder, on the ground of fraud, is not barred where the testator was insane from the time of the transfer until his death, and the executor began suit as soon as he discovered the fraud, while the statute provided that an action for relief from fraud shall not be deemed to have accrued until the fraud is discovered, and that the time of disability of a person of unsound mind shall not be deemed as a portion of the time limited for commencement of the action.

Laches — limitation period — freedom from fault.

6. Laches will not bar an action to set aside a transfer for fraud prior to the lapse of the limitation period, if complainant is free from fault.

(September 26, 1913.)

A demand upon and a refusal by the corporate authorities are, of course, a sufficient attempt to secure corporate action, and they are practically the only method of showing that a bona fide attempt to secure corporate action was made, so that in citing authorities the rule is usually stated in the form of demand and refusal, and showing that the attempt would be unavailing is treated as an exception to the general rule. Therefore, cases cited to the proposition that there must be a demand and refusal must be considered as broadly supporting the general rule and admitting the exception. The language used in every case shows that the court adopts this broad interpretation, yet the facts usually narrow the holding to simple demand and refusal. Of course, an honest but unsuccessful demand without a formal refusal, or a positive refusal without a demand, would have the effect of a demand and refusal.

In all the cases the term "corporate authorities" as above used includes the board of directors, and it may in some cases include the body of stockholders in meeting assembled, but that question is not here considered.

In the note to Continental Securities Co. v. Belmont, post, 112, the necessity of applying to a stockholders' meeting is considered, and it will be seen that even in those cases where such application is necessary, a prior application to the board of directors is required, so that all the cases there cited are equally in point here. In the cases included in this note, but not cited in the other one, the courts apparently assumed that an application to the board of directors was sufficient without further application to the stockholders, that question not being raised.

Subject to the broad construction above noted, the rule that a demand upon and a refusal by the board of directors to act in behalf of the corporation are a precedent condition to the stockholder's right to sue on behalf of the corporation is supported by the following cases:

—where the officers and directors have wronged the corporation in favor of another corporation of which they are also officers, fraud of the rights of the plaintiffs as stockholders of the Black Warrior Copper Company Amalgamated, a corporation, and in fraud of the rights of the holders of bonds issued by said corporation.

The defendant Warrior Copper Company defends alone. The other defendants make no appearance in the action. The said defendant demurred to the complaint upon the grounds that the facts stated do not constitute a cause of action, and because the court has no jurisdiction over a foreign corporation in this kind of action, because the matters and things alleged are shown to pertain to the internal affairs of this corporation, because the alleged cause of action is barred by laches and the statute of limitations, and because the intervenor's complaint does not show capacity to sue, in the absence of a showing that the Black Warrior Copper Company Amalgamated and its managing board were requested to sue the cause of action. The court by a general order sustained the demurrers without a more specific designation of any particular grounds, and, the plaintiff and intervenor electing to stand upon their complaints, judgment was rendered for the defendants, and, from which judgment, this appeal is prosecuted.

Appellant James A. Fleming, the original plaintiff, and L. E. Hewins as executor intervenor, only appeal, and assign error separately upon the orders of the court sustaining the demurrers general and special, viz.: Whether the complaint is sufficient to state —where the stockholder acts on behalf of the company to save its property in an emergency created by the inertia of the a cause of action; whether the plaintiff and intervener appellants are barred by laches and by the statute of limitations; and whether the complaints show equity.

In the most general manner we will observe that the plaintiffs show their rights as stockholders, and Fleming's additional interest as a bondholder, in the amalgamated corporation. The complaint then shows that the defendants, in furtherance of a conspiracy, and by the use of the courts and officers of the law, did, upon the face of the transaction, divest, on the 29th day of June, 1906, the amalgamated corporation of all its property, and thereby caused the stock and bonds of the plaintiff and others similarly situated to become wholly worthless. The complaint shows that at the time of the transaction complained of the amalgamated company was possessed of personal property consisting of its capital stock, then in the treasury undisposed of, and salable, of the reasonable value of $60,000; also fuel oil worth $2,500; also a stock of merchandise of great value; also timber and copper ready for market; also $19,849.75 cash on hand,—and this property, with other real property owned by the company, in the aggregate, was of a reasonable value of $2,000,000, and the company was indebted in the sum of about $15,000. In furtherance of the said conspiracy, the money and personal property were dissipated, and the real property was allowed to be sold under execution to satisfy the small indebtedness, and about the time of the sale of the real officials, and neither the directors nor other stockholders object to the proceeding, the only objection coming from the party against whom the suit is directed. Starr v. Shepard, 145 Mich. 303, 108 N. W. 709;

—where the bill sets out acts of the directors that are ultra vires, and breaches of trust that are frauds upon the stockholders, and that are beyond the power of the corporation and its directors to affirm, sanction, or make good. Heath v. Erie R. Co. 8 Blatchf. 347, Fed. Cas. No. 6,306;

—where the body of stockholders by a large majority vote ordered the directors to convey for a merely nominal sum all its property, worth $50,000, leaving it nothing but its name, and the directors had carried out the order, and the suit was by a minority stockholder, on behalf of the corporation, to annul the proceedings. Tillis v. Brown, 154 Ala. 403, 45 So. 589;

—where those charged with fraud in their own interest control a majority of the stock, and show conclusively that they would have immediately suppressed any suit for relief brought by the directors as a corporate action, even though the plaintiffs at the time of filing the complaint constitute a majority of the board. Mason v. Carrothers, 105 Me. 392, 74 Atl. 1030;

—where the board of directors commenced the suit against some of the members of the board, and the personnel of the board was changed, and the suit dismissed by the new board in collusion with the defendants, and as part of a scheme to defraud the corporation. The stockholders could secure the vacation of the order dismissing the suit and proceed with the case, instead of instituting a new suit if they chose that course. National Power & Paper Co. v. Rossman, 122 Minn. 355, 142 N. W. 818;

—where the bill is not to redress the wrongs committed by directors or officers of the corporation, but simply to have a non-going corporation, one that has utterly failed of the object and purpose for which it was formed, which owes no debts, dissolved and the assets distributed according 51 L.R.A.(N.S.)

to law. Minona Portland Cement Co. v. Reese, 167 Ala. 485, 52 So. 523.

In the following cases it was held that the facts did not bring the case within the exception, hence demand and refusal were necessary:

The fact that the corporation had dissolved at the time suit was brought, the cause of action having arisen before dissolution, will not relieve from the necessity of demand and refusal before bringing suit. Dillon v. Lee, 110 Iowa, 156, 81 N. W. 245.

And where but one of the directors has participated in the alleged fraud, the others presumably remaining loyal to the interests of the corporation, a demand and refusal are necessary before the stockholders can maintain the action. Ibid.

And the fact that five of the seven directors who took part in the fraudulent transactions of which complaint is made are yet directors is not sufficient to avoid the necessity of demand and refusal as required by Supreme Court equity rule No. 94, infra. Church v. Citizens' Street R. Co. 78 Fed. 526.

And the fact that the majority of stockholders are hostile to plaintiff's cause of action, while sufficient to avoid the necessity of appealing to the stockholders' meeting for redress, is not sufficient to enable a stockholder to sue in the corporate right without a previous demand upon the directors. Decatur Mineral & Land Co. v. Palm, 113 Ala. 531, 59 Am. St. Rep. 140, 21 So. 315.

The fact that the corporation has been enjoined by injunction from bringing any action for the relief sought by the stockholder is no excuse for his not asking it to act before bringing his action, but on the contrary the injunction is binding upon the stockholders as well as upon the corporation. Smith v. Bulkley, 18 Colo. App. 227, 70 Pac. 958.

The fact that the manager, who is alleged to have committed the fraudulent act complained of, and who is made a defendant, owns a majority of the stock and can elect a majority of the board, is not sufficient property under execution, the amalgamated company was disincorporated in order to prevent a redemption of the property from the sale, and the defendants organized the Warrior Copper Company, and appointed trustees to and they did purchase the property at the sale, and conveyed the property to the said Warrior Copper Company.

The complaints show that the parties defendant had at all times complete control of the affairs of the amalgamated company, that they were hostile to the plaintiff and to the intervener, and were acting upon a preconceived plan to accomplish the very results complained of, and for plaintiff and the intervener to demand that the Black Warrior Copper Company Amalgamated commence and prosecute this action would be a futile thing, which the law does not require. Nothing but a refusal could be reasonably expected to result from such demand.

The defendant Warrior Copper Company has submitted itself to the jurisdiction of the court for all purposes of this action, and it cannot complain if the court exercise that jurisdiction.

The property incidentally involved is within the jurisdiction of the court, and a decree of the court might affect the title to the property involved; therefore the court had jurisdiction to determine the matters, although the defendant Warrior Copper Company is a foreign corporation. This corporation is engaged in its business in Arizona, and is estopped to deny its right to avoid the necessity of a demand upon the board before bringing suit, where it appears that the members of the board now in office were elected by an unanimous vote, including the votes of the complaining stockholders, for such fact is not sufficient to overcome the presumption that the directors will honestly do their duty. Allen v. Wilson, 28 Fed. 677.

The court will not assume that a demand upon the directors was useless simply from the fact that the principal defendant was president of the corporation and owned a large majority of the stock. Law v. Fuller, 217 Pa. 439, 66 Atl. 754.

A stockholder cannot maintain an action in behalf of the corporation in the Federal courts, if the directors have instituted suit in a state court having jurisdiction for substantially the same relief. Memphis v. Dean, 8 Wall. 64, 19 L. ed. 326.

Pleadings.

That demand upon and refusal by the board of directors are a necessary precedent condition to the stockholder's right of action, where such right is derivative through the corporation, unless there is a sufficient excuse, is shown by the cases, supra, to be a universal rule. It logically follows that the pleadings must disclose the fact that the condition exists, otherwise no cause of action is set out, and the decisions support this proposition. There is, however, considerable variation in the different jurisdictions as to the particularity required in the pleading, and as to the sufficiency of the complaint, and the cases upon this question very often reveal the court's conception of the questions discussed, supra, what constitutes a demand and refusal, and other matters of detail. The Federal courts, by virtue of equity rules, quoted infra, have set the highest standard possible. The opinion in Hawes v. Oakland (Hawes v. Contra Costa Water Co.) 104 U. S. 540, 26 L. ed. 827, shows that the underlying purpose of the rule was to discourage the practice of resorting to the Federal courts where resort thereto is not absolutely necessary. 51 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Equity rule No. 94 of the Supreme Court of the United States quoted in Foot v. Cunard Min. Co. 5 McCrary, 251, 17 Fed. 47, and in other cases, reads as follows: "Every bill brought by one or more stockholders in a corporation against the corporation and other parties, founded on rights which may properly be asserted by the corporation, must be verified by oath, and must contain an allegation that the plaintiff was a shareholder at the time of the transaction of which he complains, or that his share had devolved on him since by operation of law; and that the suit is not a collusive one to confer on a court of the United States jurisdiction of a case of which it would not otherwise have cognizance. It must also set forth with particularity the efforts of the plaintiff to secure such action as he desires on the part of the managing directors or trustees, and, if necessary, of the shareholders, and the causes of his failure to obtain such action."

The Supreme Court has now embodied rule 94 into rule 27, with the addition of the following phrase, "or the reasons for not making such effort." See rule 27, quoted in Toledo Traction, Light, & P. Co. v. Smith, 205 Fed. 661.

Rule No. 94 was adopted upon the announcement of the decision in Hawes v. Oakland, supra, and it has been applied in practically every Federal case decided since its adoption. For this reason decisions of Federal courts upon the question considered in this note may not have the weight with state courts that they would otherwise have. In Miller v. Murray, 17 Colo. 408, 30 Pac. 46, the court, in holding that this rule is not binding on state courts, said: "It is worthy of note in passing that the subsequent decisions of the United States court upon this question are of little value in the state courts, for the reason that all such decisions must necessarily have been founded upon this rule, although, in some of the cases, mention of the rule is not to be found in the opinion." And in Church v. Citizens' Street R. Co. 78 Fed. 526 (see same case, supra, for holding), the court said: "Applying the general principles of equity jurisprudence, and following the current of

to so engage in business, in order to defeat the jurisdiction of the state courts when dealing with its property within that jurisdiction.

The facts and circumstances charged as amounting to fraud briefly summarized are as follows: The amalgamated company in December, 1903, was possessed of property of the aggregate value of $2,000,000, and owed but a trifling amount of indebtedness, outside of the debenture bonds. Subsequent to December, 1903, the defendants permitted a judgment for $14,000, and another judgment of $1,100, to be recovered against the amalgamated company, at the time having cash on hand in the sum of $19,849.75, and other valuable, salable personal property. The directors procured the issuance of executions on the two judgments, and a levy of the executions on the property of the company at a time when the company's treasury contained 12,000 shares of the capital stock of the company, worth on the market and readily salable for the sum of $60,000, and permitted, on March 25, 1905, the sheriff to sell property of said corporation of the value of $1,000,000 for a nominal sum of $1,203.25, and other property worth nearly $1,000,000, under execution issued on January 31, 1905, for the sum of $4,877.77. When all the property of the corporation had been either sold by the sheriff or dissipated by defendants, on May 24, 1905, they commenced a proceeding, through a stockholder having full notice of the facts mentioned, to dissolve the authority in the state courts on the subject, the court would be clearly of opinion that that would be a sufficient excuse. But the language of the rule in question, and the interpretation that has been given by the court which promulgated the rule, make it obvious that it was the purpose to introduce a more stringent rule in the national courts than the rule which is applied on the same subject in the state courts, and that such an excuse as is offered here does not satisfy the rule."

But the pleadings in a case brought originally in a state court, but later transferred to a Federal court, are not necessarily tested by that rule, since it applies only to cases brought originally in the Federal courts. Earle v. Seattle, L. S. & E. R. Co. 56 Fed. 909.

A suit in behalf of the corporation cannot be maintained by a stockholder unless the pleadings show that the board of directors have refused to take proper measures to remedy the matters of which complaint is made.

But, of course, where no demand upon or refusal by the board of directors is a necessary prerequisite to the suit (see cases above cited), there need be no allegation of such demand and refusal, but the facts from which the court can judge of the sufficiency of the excuse must be set out. The following are cases where, upon this ground, it was held that there need be no allegation of demand upon and refusal by the said amalgamated corporation. On June 24, 1905, by consent of defendants, such dissolution proceedings culminated in a judgment of the court disincorporating said amalgamated company upon the grounds and for the reason "the said corporation has disposed of all its corporate property, real, personal, and mixed, said property having been sold at execution sale, and that there is not at this time assets or property out of which money may be or could be secured for the purpose of exercising an equity of redemption." One of the members of said reorganization committee bid for, and bought, all the real property of the amalgamated company, so sold by the sheriff, and on November 18, 1905, demanded of, and on February 7, 1906, the sheriff made, his deed to the member of said committee, as trustee, conveying all the property of said amalgamated company to such party as trustee for said committee. In due time conveyances were made by the members of the said committee to the defendant the Warrior Copper Company. The result of these transactions was upon their face to divest the amalgamated company of all its assets for the inadequate consideration of $6,081.02. It further appears that, in pursuance of the said conspiracy, the plaintiff Fleming was ousted from the office of director and president of the amalgamated company, because he was a large stockholder of said corporation, and a holder of substantially all the issued bonds. A complaint is not sufficient —

—where it simply alleges that there has been a refusal to bring the particular action instituted by the plaintiff, for the directors have a right to choose between remedies equally effective. Newby v. Oregon C. R. Co. 1 Sawy. 63, Fed. Cas. No. 10,145;

—under Supreme Court rule No. 94, supra, which alleges that before bringing suit to set aside a lease, complainants applied to and requested said corporation to take such action as would lead to the annulling of said lease, and stated the grounds on which such lease was claimed to be void, especially alleging that the lease was invalid for the want of approval of the shareholders, and that they were advised by the officers of the corporation that no action could be taken in the premises with a view to such result, and that the company wholly refused and neglected to take action for such purpose, or to recognize complainants as having any right to interfere in the matter of said leasing, or to call upon the corporation to take any action thereon. McHenry v. New York, P. & O. R. Co. 22 Fed. 130; corporation, which simply alleges that the directors of the one corporation are also directors of the other, and that it would have been useless for plaintiff to demand that they bring suit, and that plaintiff would have made such demand had he not known it would be refused. Squair v. Lookout Mountain Co. 42 Fed. 729, following Hawes v. Oakland (Hawes v. Contra Costa Water Co.) 104 U. S. 450, 26 L. ed. 827;

—under Supreme Court rule No. 94, supra, in a suit to enjoin the transfer of part of the stock of the corporation to another 51 L.R.A. (N.S.)

—where the only allegation was that complainants offered to assume the expenses and conduct the litigation. Warren v. Para Rubber Shoe Co. 166 Mass. 97, 44 N. E. 112;

—where the allegation was that plaintiff demanded of his corporation as a stockholder, his share of the proceeds flowing from the use of that part of the road leased, when the action was to set aside the lease, since such a demand was not equivalent to a demand on the corporation to repudiate the lease. Flynn v. Brooklyn City R. Co. 9 App. Div. 269, 41 N. Y. Supp. 566, affirmed in 158 N. Y. 493, 53 N. E. 250;

—where it was averred that complainants "repeatedly protested" against the wrongs of which complaint was made, without even alleging that the protest was made to the directors. Boyd v. Sims, 87 Tenn. 771, 11 S. W. 948;

—where it is alleged that request was made to the directors to prosecute the action, without showing that the request was made to them as a board, and not as individuals. Latimer v. Richmond & D. R. Co. 39 S. C. 44, 17 S. F. 258 (the decision is not based upon this holding, as the court expressly says);

—where the averment was that, as the lessee is the owner of a majority of the shares of the lessor, the former elects and controls the action of the officers of the latter, who have therefore allowed themselves to be kept in absolute ignorance of its business, the suit being by a stockholder of the lessor company against the lessee, alleging false and erroneous accounts by the lessee to the lessor. Wolf v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 195 Pa. 91, 45 Atl. 936;

—where there are only vague and general

holding those offices, he was in the position to protect the amalgamated company and its stockholders.

These facts show an injury to the intervener by reason of a loss of the property upon which the sole value of his stock depends. The circumstances or facts charged, which show fraud, consist of the alleged conspiracy entered into by the defendants, having for its object the very purpose of causing the stock of the amalgamated company to become worthless. The internal affairs were purposely so managed that the company became involved in debt, and, to force the creditors to resort to the real estate, the personal property of the company was sacrificed and dissipated. The judgments were rendered against the company, and the defendants, charged with the management of its affairs, procured executions to be issued and placed in the hands of the sheriff, and caused the sheriff to levy on all the property of the company, and sell the same; the defendants bought the property at the sale for a nominal sum, then procured a judgment of dissolution against the company to prevent a redemption of the property. These are certainly facts which show in what the fraud consists, and how the transaction has been affected by the fraud. Cochise County v. Copper Queen Consol. Min. Co. 8 Ariz. 221, 71 Pac. 946.

Appellee contends that the claims of Fleming are stale, and ought not be enforced for that reason. We may concede this contention as applicable to the rights of Fleming; but the rights of the intervener estate are controlled by a very different state of facts. On April 26, 1900, E. B. Knox became a stockholder of the amalgamated company, owning 500 shares of stock until his death, during the year 1909, when the stock passed to the executor of his estate, L. E. Hewins, the intervener. The complaint of intervener, Hewins, avers that at the time of the several transactions complained of, and up to the time of his death, said E. B. Knox was insane, and had no knowledge of the transactions complained of, and that intervener, Hewins, had no notice or knowledge of any of the facts concerning such several transactions until after the commencement of this action.

Actions for relief on the grounds of fraud or mistake must be commenced within one year after the cause of action shall have averments of the directors' complicity in the wrongs of which complaint is made. Ziegler v. Lake Street Elev. R. Co. 22 C. C. A. 465, 46 U. S. App. 242, 76 Fed. 662, affirming 69 Fed. 176; fraud on the part of the directors still in control of the corporation, but no tangible facts sustaining the general averment. Smith v. Chasco & B. Piano Mfg. Co. 197 Fed. 466;

—where it simply alleges that "plaintiff has endeavored unsuccessfully, by application to the company, to secure relief and protection from the wrongs and against the dangers mentioned," without setting out the facts upon which the allegation is based, for it is merely a legal conclusion. Vogeler v. Punch, 205 Mo. 558, 103 S. W. 1001;

—where it fails to state that plaintiffs do not control a majority of the stock. Brandt v. McIntosh, 47 Mont. 70, 130 Pac. 413;

—where it simply alleges that a demand upon the corporation to sue would be useless, without setting out the facts that show the truth of the allegation. State ex rel. Fisher v. U. S. Grant University, 115 Tenn. 238, 90 S. W. 294.

accrued, and not afterward; provided, the cause of action in such case is not to be deemed to have accrued until the discovery, by the aggrieved party, of the facts constituting the fraud or mistake. Paragraph 2949, Rev. Stat. Ariz. 1901, as amended by act No. 16 of the Session Laws 1903.

"If a person entitled to bring any action . . . be at the time the cause of action accrues . . . 2. Of unsound mind; . . . the time of such disability shall not be deemed a portion of the time limited for the commencement of the action. . . ." Rev. Stat. Ariz. 1901, ¶ 2970.

The complaint avers that the deceased was of unsound mind at the time of the several transactions constituting the fraud, and the disability continued until his death, in the year 1909. The intervener became executor of the estate in 1909. The original action was commenced March 25, 1909. By the provisions of ¶ 2970, supra, the statute never commenced to run against the deceased. The complaint avers that the executor did not discover the facts constituting the fraud until after this action was commenced, when the complaint in intervention was filed. The complaint is not subject to a demurrer presenting the statute of limitations. On its face the cause of action is not barred.

Equity will, under circumstances especially revolting to a sense of justice, refuse relief where the remedy invoked is not barred by the statute of limitations; but in such case the complaining party is not wholly free from fault, and the rule of laches is applied operating in the nature of an estoppel. No such rule can justly be applicable to the facts of this case. A court of equity is equally bound with a court of law by the statute of limitations.

The complaint of the intervener is not subject to the vices contended for, and the court erred in sustaining the several demurrers of the defendant.

The judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded, with instructions to the Superior Court of Gila County to overrule the demurrers, and proceed with the cause according to law.

Franklin, Ch. J., and Ross, J., concur.

Petition for rehearing denied, November 17, 1913.

The following are cases in which the complaint was held to be sufficient:

It has been held that an allegation that the complainants requested the corporation to bring suit, which it neglected to do, is a sufficient allegation to authorize the suit by the stockholders. Memphis & C. R. Co. v. Woods, 88 Ala. 630, 7 L.R.A. 605, 16 Am. St. Rep. 81, 7 So. 108.

And an averment that one of the plaintiffs demanded of the president and officers of the corporation that the property be restored to it, and that the business be placed upon its former footing, was held to be sufficient in Becker v. Gulf City Street R. & Real Estate Co. 80 Tex. 475, 15 S. W. 1094, where the stockholders brought suit against the corporation, its officers, and another corporation with which it had been consolidated, asking for a receiver and a recovery on their own behalf as stockholders, so that the court really held that even this averment was unnecessary.

An allegation that the corporate officers have refused to perform their duties, or one which recites facts showing that it is unreasonable to expect that they will perform the duty, because concerned in the wrong complained of and hostile to all efforts to redress it, is sufficient. Northern Trust Co. v. Snyder, 113 Wis. 516, 90 Am. St. Rep. 867, 89 N. W. 460.

Where the suit was against the corporation and a majority stockholder therein, to compel him to pay back to the corporation salary that he had illegally obtained, an allegation that "the plaintiff has demanded of said Christy that he should pay back into said corporation the said back 51 L.R.A.(N.S.)

pay and salary, . . . which he refused to do," was, in Blair v. Telegram Newspaper Co. 172 Mass. 201, 51 N. E. 1080, construed so as to show that the plaintiff had taken all practicable steps to induce the corporation to bring suit.

In a suit where breach of duty on the part of the directors is alleged, an allegation that "said corporation, being wholly under the influence and control of said directors, the defendants herein, declines and refuses to institute any suit or proceeding against said defendants," was, in Albers v. Merchants' Exch. 45 Mo. App. 206, held to be tantamount to an allegation that the corporation had refused to act.

In Sage v. Culver, 147 N. Y. 241, 41 N. E. 513, a demurrer on the ground of failure to allege demand and refusal was overruled, since in the complaint: "(1) It is alleged in substance that the defendants, as officers and trustees of the defendant railroad, took from themselves, as trustees and officers of another railroad, a lease of the latter, which they practically owned and managed, to the defendant corporation at an exorbitant rent, which arrangement has the effect to unlawfully deplete funds and earnings of the defendant corporation, and to injure the plaintiffs as stockholders therein. (2) It is also averred in substance that the defendants, as officers and trustees of the defendant railroad, have taken from its treasury large sums of money and paid the same to themselves as individuals, on account of alleged loans or advances made by them to the corporation of which the plaintiffs are stockholders. That they have concealed the origin and nature of this debt from the plaintiffs, and have made false statements in regard to the same."

A complaint is sufficient if it states: (1) A cause of action which the corporation itself could maintain; (2) the facts which entitle the plaintiff to maintain the action in place of the corporation, i. e., that he is a stockholder therein and that the corporation has either refused or unreasonably failed to bring the action. Kavanaugh v. Commonwealth Trust Co. 181 N. Y. 121, 73 N. E. 562.

A complaint is sufficient where it is alleged that a letter was addressed to one who had been elected president of the company, and that he replied that he had resigned two years before, but it is shown that there never had been a meeting of the stockholders after his election, and it further appears that the action is directed against two men who are still directors, charging them with fraud. Averill v. Barber, 2 Silv. Sup. Ct. 40, 6 N. Y. Supp. 255.

Proof of a request and refusal in any mode, provided it be a legal request to the corporation, it was held in Hazard v. Durant, 11 R. I. 195, can be made, where suit was to charge an officer of the corporation with corporate funds which he was alleged to have appropriated, under an allegation as follows: "And your orator had well hoped that the said defendant corporation, the Credit Mobilier of America, would protect the rights and interests of its stockholders in the premises, and by proper proceedings at law or in equity compel the said defendant, Thomas C. Durant, to account for said moneys wrongfully and fraudulently converted to his own use, and withheld from said company as aforesaid, and that he would account for any pay over the same. And that said corporation would compel the said Durant to transfer all stock, bonds, moneys, and other rights and interests aforesaid, procured with and by the proper moneys of said corporation, to the same and to its stockholders. But now so it is, may it please your Honors, that the said defendants, though requested so to do, have wholly neglected and refused to comply with these reasonable expectations and request of your orator."

And it has been held that an allegation setting forth that complainant demanded of the corporation "that it institute the suit set forth in your orator's bill of complaint" against its codefendant, but that the corporation has refused and neglected to bring such suit, is a sufficient compliance with equity rule No. 94. Edwards v. Mercantile Trust Co. 124 Fed. 381.

A complaint by stockholders of a railroad company to enjoin the corporation from complying with a state statute relating to rates, containing an allegation that they had demanded of the corporate officers that they refuse to comply with the statute, and commence suits to enjoin its enforcement, but that the corporation and its officers had positively refused to do so, not because they considered that the rates were just, or that they would not be confiscatory, not because of the severity of the penalties provided for the violation of the statute, to the ruinous consequences of which they would not subject themselves, and which no action by themselves, their stockholders, or directors could avoid, is sufficient under equity rule, No. 94, supra. Ex parte Young, 209 U. S. 123, 52 L. ed. 714, 13 L.R.A.(N.S.) 932, 28 Sup. Ct. Rep. 441, 14 Ann. Cas. 764; Perkins v. Northern P. R. Co. 155 Fed. 445, affirmed without mention of this point in 184 Fed. 765, and order modified without this point being raised in 230 U. S. 352, 57 L. ed. 1511, 48 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1151, 33 Sup. Ct. Rep. 729.

Under the Revised Statute of March 26, 1881, § 3515, which provides that the defendant may demur to a petition when upon its face it appears "that the plaintiff has not legal capacity to sue," the objection that the complaining stockholder does not allege previous demand upon the corporation cannot be raised for the first time in the appellate court, for if it is not raised by demurrer, there is a waiver thereof, and the petition will be held to be sufficient. Bulkley v. Big Muddy Iron Co. 77 Mo. 105.

Where there are but four directors, two of whom signed the demand, and it was then served upon the other two, one of whom was the defendant, and at the time secretary, the service is sufficient, since under § 3531 of Iowa Code, service upon the secretary, of an original notice, is binding upon the corporation. The Telegraph v. Lee, 125 Iowa, 17, 98 N. W. 364.

Corporation — wrongful exchange of property — stockholder's action for accounting — offer to return.

1. Stockholders of a corporation are not, in order to maintain an action for an accounting against the corporation and strangers to whom corporate stock is alleged to have been fraudulently issued in exchange for securities belonging to such persons, bound to offer to return the securities so received.

Note. — Necessity of applying to body of stockholders as a condition of right of stockholder to sue on behalf of the corporation.

In the note to Fleming v. Warrior Copper Co. ante, 99, the general principles underlying this subject were stated as well as the general rule as to necessity of applying to Pleading — negating acquiescence in fraud.

2. Stockholders of a corporation suing the corporation and strangers to whom stock is alleged to have been fraudulently issued for an accounting are not bound to negative in the pleadings acquiescence by their predecessors in title in the fraud.

Corporation — suit by stockholders — refusal of directors to proceed.

3. Absence of response within the time specified by the directors of a corporation to a notification by stockholders that, if they do not institute a proceeding to recover stock alleged to have been fraudulently issued by the corporation, the stockholders will do so, is sufficient to justify the stockholders' suit, and it is not necessary to show notice to the body of stockholders collectively, and refusal by them to act.

the corporate authorities. It was there shown that there must be a demand upon and a refusal by the board of directors unless such facts are proved as would, in the opinion of the court, make such demand useless. Having made a demand upon and having been refused by the board of directors, is it necessary to make a similar demand upon the body of the stockholders?

The cases cited, infra, appear to justify the statement that the holding in CONTINENTAL SECURITIES CO. v. BELMONT, and the distinction there made between causes of action based upon acts that can and those that cannot be ratified, is sound common-law doctrine as shown by the early English decisions; that the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States and the rule there adopted are not inconsistent with that doctrine, and that some state courts have made the distinction, but others have not done so, probably because it was not pointed out, the distinction being unnecessary in the cases upon which they relied. Whether or not the latter would consider themselves bound by the doctrine of stare decisis if the distinction were to be pointed out is a question for their future consideration.

(1) Courts will not interfere in the management of a corporation in any case so long as the acts complained of are within the power of the corporation and are the result of the honest judgment of the corporation, acting through its officers.

(2) Where the acts complained of are within the power of the corporation, but are so injurious to the corporation, and through it to at least part of the stockholders, that it is apparent that the corporation has not exercised an honest judgment in the matter, then the court will interfere, but only as a last resort; i. e., after both the board of directors and the body of stockholders have been given a chance to rectify the wrongful acts.

(3) Where the corporation has no legal power or authority to commit the acts complained of, then any injured stockholder may sue; but he should obtain permission

Same — ratification of fraudulent act — binding effect.

4. An act of stockholders of a corporation which attempts to ratify a fraud or misapplication of the funds of the corporation by the directors is binding by way of estoppel only on such stockholders as vote in favor of the approval.

(June 11, 1912.)

A PPEAL by defendants from an order of the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court, Second Department, affirming an order of a Special Term for Nassau County denying their motion for judgment upon the pleadings in an action brought to require them to account to plaintiffs for stock al-from the board of directors to use the corporate name, and if refused permission he may proceed without applying to the stockholders.

It will appear, infra, that in all cases where these rules require an appeal to the body of stockholders before bringing suit, an exception thereto is made where it appears that such an appeal would be useless, etc. (for same exception to the general rule as to appealing to board of directors, see note to Fleming v. Warrior Copper Co. ante, 99), so that these general rules are not absolute. Thus exception is recognized by all the courts, and the cases upholding it are considered incidentally. In jurisdictions which observe the distinction between acts that are and those that are not capable of ratification, this exception becomes important only when the acts of which complaint is made are capable of ratification; for, in the other class of cases, there need be no appeal to the stockholders.

The reasoning upon which the distinction is made is sound, for, in the second class of cases, stated at the beginning of the note, if the stockholders in meeting assembled should ratify the acts complained of, it would probably legalize them, bring the case within class one, supra, and thus defeat the proposed suit by the stockholder. If they should reverse the board of directors, a suit by the stockholder would become unnecessary. If they refused relief, ratifying the actions complained of, and it yet appeared that the grossest injustice resulted to the complaining minority, probably to the undisclosed advantage of the majority, there the court would permit the suit by the complaining minority, whether one or many. But in the third class of cases the stockholders in meeting assembled have no power to ratify the acts complained of, and their reversal of the board would be merely perfunctory, and to require it would be simply red tape; and any attempt to approve the action of the board would be ineffectual. In this class of cases it is necessary to first apply to the board of directors in order to exhaust all means of obtaining an action in the corporate name; but leged to have been fraudulently and illegally issued. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Charles H. Tuttle, with Messrs. Davies, Auerbach, Cornell, & Barry, and Nicoll, Anable, Lindsay, & Fuller, for appellants:

A stockholder must show with particularity adequate and sincere efforts to induce action by the board of directors and the board's refusal to act; or, in the alternative, an adequate excuse for not making such efforts.

the same reason does not exist for requiring an appeal to the body of stockholders, for even that body could obtain corporate action only through the board of directors. Hence, no such appeal is required.

The holding in CONTINENTAL SECURITIES Co. v. BELMONT is in harmony with the rule adopted by the English courts. The court refers to Foss v. Harbottle, 2 Hare, 461, as explained by Bagshaw v. Eastern Union R. Co. 7 Hare, 114, 6 Eng. R. & C. Cas. 152, 18 L. J. Ch. N. S. 193, 13 Jur. 602, and no comment on those cases is needed. The substance of the holding is that where the acts of which complaint is made are not capable of being ratified by the body of stockholders, there need be no appeal to that body as a condition precedent to the stockholder's right of action, and the question of the reasonableness of such an appeal is immaterial. But where the "subject-matter of the stockholder's complaint is for any reason within the immediate control, direction, or power of confirmation of the body of stockholders, it should be brought to the attention of such stockholders for action, before an action is commenced by a stockholder, unless it clearly appears by the complaint that such application is useless."

The position of the English courts is made still plainer by Gregory v. Patchett, 33 Beav. 595, where it was held that "in matters strictly relating to the internal management of a company this court, though it should come to the conclusion that the course adopted is not warranted by the terms of the instrument, will not interfere, even though the minority should have summoned a meeting of all the shareholders, and the majority should have persisted in the course complained of. But if the measures adopted are plainly beyond the powers of the company, and are inconsistent with the objects for which the company was constituted, then the court will, at the instance of the minority, interpose to prevent the performance of the act complained of, and it will do so whether an appeal has or has not been made by the minority to the shareholders generally."

In Atwool v. Merryweather, L. R. 5 Eq. 464, note, it was apparent that the majority of the stockholders were supporting the bill, and it was held that it would be idle to require formal action granting permission to sue.

Foss v. Harbottle was cited with approval and followed in Mozley v. Alston, 1 Phill. Ch. 790, 4 Eng. Ry. & C. Cas. 636, 16 L. J. Ch. N. S. 217, 11 Jur. 315; Lord v. Copper Miners' Co. 2 Phill. Ch. 740, 1 Hall & Tw. 85, 18 L. J. Ch. N. S. 65, 12 Jur. 1059, also in Gray v. Lewis, 43 L. J. Ch. N. S. 281, L. R. 8 Ch. 1035, 29 L. T. N. S. 12, 21 Week. Rep. 923, where the court uses language which seems to go beyond the holding in Foss v. Harbottle and Gregory v. Patchett, supra, in that the court appears to hold that the consent of stockholders in meeting assembled must be sought even where the acts complained of are not capable of ratification; but in view of some references in the decision and some circumstances, it seems quite clear that the court did not intend to adopt that as a general rule, although the case is sometimes cited to that proposition.

Equity rule No. 94 of the United States Supreme Court, as amended and embodied in present rule No. 27, is quoted in full in the note to Fleming v. Warrior Copper Co. ante, 99, with some discussion as to the effect it has had upon later decisions. It should be here noted that it is not a rule of action, but a rule of pleading, and that the words, "if necessary," used in this connection, limit the requirement of the rule to cases where the court decides that an application to the stockholders is necessary. The rule is therefore not determinative of the question here under consideration.

Hawes v. Oakland (Hawes v. Contra Costa Water Co.) 104 U. S. 450, 26 L. ed. 827, is a leading case upon this question. The court said: "But, in addition to the existence of grievances which call for this kind of relief, it is equally important that before the shareholder is permitted in his own name to institute and conduct a litigation which usually belongs to the corporation, he should show, to the satisfaction of the court, that he has exhausted all the means within his reach to obtain, within the corporation itself, the redress of his grievances, or action in conformity to his wishes. He must make an earnest, not a simulated, effort, with the managing body of the corporation, to induce remedial action on their part, and this must be made apparent to the court. If time permits, or has permitted, he must show, if he fails with the directors, that he has made an honest effort to obtain action by the stockholders as a body, in the matter of which he complains. And he must show a case, if this is not done, where it could not be done, or it was not reasonable to require it." But it is quite evident that the court was referring to intra vires cases. For not only do the circumstances show that fact, but the court said: "There is no allegation of fraud or of acts ultra vires, nor of destruction of property, or of irremediable injury of any kind." And it is likewise evident that the court intended the decision to be in harmony with the English decisions, since it thoroughly reviewed them. However, the court did not feel called upon to make the distinction here under discussion, and for that reason the holding seems to have been misconstrued by some state courts, and the adoption of equity rule No. 94 by that court seems to have further confused some of the state courts. In a few cases the distinction has been made, and the rule here enunciated seems to have been applied in some cases without an inquiry as to whether or not the acts complained of could have been ratified.

The complaint fails to allege that the plaintiffs revealed the facts to the other stockholders; that the plaintiffs had appealed for action to the body of the corporation (the stockholders); or that such an appeal would have been futile, or could not have been made in time.

Hawes v. Oakland, supra, was followed at practically the same time in Huntington v. Palmer, 104 U. S. 482, 26 L. ed. 833, and Greenwood v. Union Freight R. Co. 105 U. S. 13, 26 L. ed. 961, which decisions make it absolutely certain that it was not intended to rule that there must be an appeal to the stockholders regardless of the subject-matter of the complaint. In the Huntington Case the suit was to set aside taxation of the corporation alleged to be illegal, which the board of directors had refused to resist. The court, in holding that the stockholder could not maintain the suit, said: "There is not, as in Dodge v. Woolsey, 18 How. 331, 15 L. ed. 401, any averment that these taxes are so burdensome as to be destructive of the corporation itself; nor that there was any fraud on the part of the directors, nor anything to show that their decision not to resist the taxes is unwise, or opposed to the best judgment they could exercise in the matter. There is no averment of any effort to invoke the control of the body of the stockholders, or any reason why it was not done. Nor is it made to appear that a single stockholder was consulted by the complainant, or has any wish to contest the payment of these taxes with the state authorities." But in the Greenwood Case a state legislature had repealed the charter of a street railway company, the directors had refused to resist, and no appeal had been made to the body of stockholders; the complaining stockholders alleged that the legislation was unconstitutional as impairing the obligation of contracts, and claimed the right to maintain the suit on behalf of the corporation; it was held that they had such right; the court said: "This whole subject was fully considered in the recent opinion of the court in Hawes v. Oakland, supra, in the decision of which we had the benefit of the able argument of counsel in this case, which was argued before that was decided. We refer to that opinion for the principles which must govern this branch of the present case. It is sufficient to say that this bill presents so strong a case of the total destruction of the corporate existence, and of the annihilation of all corporate powers under act of 1872, that we think complainant as a stockholder comes within the rule laid down in that opinion, and which authorizes a shareholder to maintain a suit to prevent such a disaster, where the corporation peremptorily refuses to move in the matter."

And it was held in Doctor v. Harrington, 196 U. S. 579, 49 L. ed. 606, 25 Sup. Ct. Rep. 355, and in Delaware & H. Co. v. Albany & S. R. Co. 213 U. S. 435, 53 L. ed. 862, 29 Sup. Ct. Rep. 540, that where the majority of the stock of the corporation

The complaint fails to state a cause of action because it does not allege that plaintiff's predecessors in title had not acquiesced in the acts complained of, or that the stock had been purchased in good faith, and not for mere vexatious purposes.

Messrs. J. Aspinwall Hodge, Stephen M. Yeaman, and Alexander Holtzoff, for respondents:

The pleadings fully and sufficiently allege facts which entitle the plaintiffs to act was owned or controlled by the defendant directors, making an appeal to the stockholders futile, there need be no such appeal. Here the exception noted supra was sustained, but there was no need for making the distinction here under consideration.

In Kessler v. Ensley Land Co. 123 Fed. 546, on demurrer, and in 129 Fed. 397, on amended complaint, there is an excellent discussion of the distinction, but in rather an indirect way, and it is there said, by way of argument, that "an honest and disinterested governing body or majority of stockholders, if rescission would not be advantageous or would be harmful to the corporation, might ratify actual fraud practised on it by an officer or director," the act complained of being within the charter powers of the corporation. Final hearing of the case is reported in 141 Fed. 130, which was affirmed in 79 C. C. A. 534, 148 Fed. 1019, where the court said: "The matters complained of in the bill were intra vires the Ensley Land Company, and as the record shows that a majority of the directors and stockholders, at the time of bringing the suit, were not interested adversely to the company, the right of the complainants, as stockholders, to bring and maintain this suit, is doubtful." And the court then shows that they had no such right for the reason that, under the facts, the company itself had no such right of action; hence, the point here considered was left undecided. Writ of certiorari was denied in 205 U. S. 541, 51 L. ed. 921, 27 Sup. Ct. Rep. 788.

On this point the court in Brewer v. Boston Theatre, 104 Mass. 387, said: "Whether there must be an effort to move the corporate body to the redress of its own injuries; and, to that end, an attempt to procure a meeting and vote of the stockholders; or whether an application to the present board of officers by whom the corporate affairs are managed, and a refusal by them to allow proceedings in its name and behalf, would be sufficient,—does not seem to have been determined by any clear concurrence of decision. It may depend somewhat upon the character of the corporate organization, and the extent of powers confided to its officers for the time being. Where the stockholders retain no control of the corporate business, except by means of an annual election of officers, those officers, during their terms of service, represent the corporation for all purposes; and a refusal by them to take proper action for the protection of its interests, or to allow the use of the corporate name for that purpose, ought to be sufficient to justify a proceeding in behalf of the individual stockholders, making the corporation a party defendant."

The court, in Albers v. Merchants' Exchange, 45 Mo. App. 206, seems to have recognized the distinction here made, i. e., that an appeal to the stockholders is not necessary where the breach of duty by the directors is incapable of ratification by the body of stockholders, but refused to apply the principle on the ground that the amount of the financial loss to the complaining stockholder occasioned by the breach was too insignificant, and that he was the only stockholder, out of the three thousand, willing to complain by suit; but the court may have had reference to the rule that the stockholder may sue in his own name and on his behalf, since the expression used is "may have relief in equity." This rule, of course, is not within the scope of this note.

In Rathbone v. Parkersburg Gas Co. 31 W. Va. 798, 8 S. E. 570, it was held that, "in order to confer upon a shareholder the right to sue, in a case in which the primary right is in the corporation, he must not only show that the directors are in default or wrongfully refuse to sue, but he must show that a majority of the shareholders have been appealed to, and that they are also guilty of misconduct, or wrongfully and wilfully refuse to act in the matter," where the corporation is solvent, the act complained of intra vires, and the suit will admit of delay. Here the distinction seems to have been made, but the case did not require a decision as to acts not capable of ratification.

And the Rathbone Case was cited and followed in Deveny v. Hart Coal Co. 63 W. Va. 650, 60 S. E. 789, and Ward v. Hotel Randolph Co. 65 W. Va. 721, 63 S. E. 613.

In Beckett v. Planters' Compress & Bonded Warehouse Co. — Miss. —, 65 So. 275, the court said: "Should the directors, in a representative capacity, and to bring this suit on behalf of the defendant corporation.

A demand on the board of directors is a sufficient prerequisite to a suit by a stockholder in behalf of the corporation, and the stockholder need not appeal to the general body of shareholders before instituting his action.

Greaves v. Gouge, 69 N. Y. 154; Flynn v. Brooklyn City R. Co. 9 App. Div. 269, 41 N. Y. Supp. 566, affirmed in 158 N. Y. 493, 53 N. E. 520; Wilkie v. Rochester &

when requested, decline to institute the suit, an appeal, if practicable, should be made to the stockholders themselves to take such action as they may deem proper and have the power to do." But it was held that, under the circumstances of the case,—the directors owned or controlled a majority of the stock,—no appeal to either the directors or to the stockholders was necessary, but the language quoted appears to recognize the distinction.

And the language used in the Hawes Case, supra, was quoted with approval in Virginia Pass. & Power Co. v. Fisher, 104 Va. 121, 51 S. E. 198, where it was held that an averment that the alleged wrongdoer was in control of a majority of the stock was sufficient to avoid the necessity of demanding action by the stockholders, but not sufficient to avoid a demand on the directors.

The above quotation from Hawes v. Oakland is also found in Dannmeyer v. Coleman, 8 Sawy. 51, 11 Fed. 97, 5 Mor. Min. Rep. 474, where there was no demand even upon the directors.

And in Bill v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 16 Fed. 14, a bill was dismissed because of a failure to aver that "any effort has been made by the complainant to secure such action on the part of the stockholders as, upon his theory of the transaction, they ought to take," and there were no circumstances alleged that dispensed with this requirement.

In Miller v. Murray, 17 Colo. 408, 30 Pac. 46, where plaintiff and those willing to co-operate with him owned a clear majority of the stock, and nearly two years had elapsed after plaintiff had knowledge of the alleged fraud before he brought suit, during all of which time the property was being developed and made more valuable by innocent shareholders of another company, it was held that plaintiff could not maintain the suit without alleging and proving that he had either made an honest but futile effort to obtain redress at a meeting of the shareholders, or had a valid excuse for not making such effort.

Miller v. Murray, supra, was cited and followed in Horst v. Traudt, 43 Colo. 445, 96 Pac. 259.

In Schoening v. Schwenk, 112 Iowa, 733, 84 N. W. 916, the court said: "It is doubtful, under the authorities, whether any proceeding by way of securing redress inside the corporation is necessary where it is plain that it would be futile. In this case there was no stockholders' meeting, and to call one required a majority vote of the board of directors (seven out of nine of them being defendants in this case), or a written application to the secretary by holders of two thirds of the stock. The defendants would hardly be expected to call a meeting of the stockholders to declare illegal acts which they had already done, and a sufficient proportion of the stock was held by defendants to make it impossible to get the necessary written application without their consent. Under these circumstances, we hardly think it incumbent upon plaintiffs to make application to either the board of directors or a stockholders' meeting."

In North v. Union Sav. & L. Asso. 59 Or. 483, 117 Pac. 822, the court said: "As a general rule a stockholder in a corporation is not allowed to sue to prevent misappropriation of corporate securities without first requesting the board of directors, and, in case of their refusal to act, then stockholders to proceed against the wrongdoers in the name of the corporation;" and cites Hawes v. Oakland (Hawes v. Contra Costa Water Co.) 104 U. S. 450, 26 L. ed. 827; Brewer v. Boston Theatre, 104 Mass. 378; and Foss v. Harbottle, 2 Hare, 461.

Shaw v. Staigt, 107 Minn. 152, 20 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1077, 119 N. W. 951, is a case where those in charge of the corporation fraudulently issued stock to some of their number for fictitious fishing locations, and the suit was brought by other stockholders; demand upon and refusal by the board of directors was shown, and it was held that there need be no farther demand upon the body of the stockholders; two points, however, make the case of little value here: (1) The court strongly intimates but does not definitely hold that demand even upon the directors would have been excused; (2) the court held that "here the injury complained of, and consequently the right of action, accrued to the stockholders, and not to the corporation as such." If the facts justified this holding the case would not be within the scope of the present note, but it is impossible to avoid the conclusion that the right of action was a derivative one, since the injury to the bona fide stockholders was caused solely by injuring the corporation.

But in Dunphy v. Traveller Newspaper Asso. 146 Mass. 495, 16 N. E. 426, the court, in dealing with a case involving subject-matter apparently within the authority of the corporation, said: "And so, if they deem themselves aggrieved as shareholders by the dealings of others with it, or by the acts of its managers, they are bound to seek their remedy through corporate channels, first, by application to the officers in charge, and, failing there, secondly, to the corporation itself, at a meeting of its members. If they can obtain justice at the hands of neither, the courts are open for their relief;" but goes on to say: "Even when their acts are ultra vires, or otherwise illegal, a complaining member must first seek his remedy within the corporation. The only exception to the rule that a stockholder must apply to the directors, and also, if need be, to the corporation, for redress of a wrong done it, before he can sue in a court of equity, for himself and in behalf of other stockholders, is when it appears that such application would be unavailing to protect his rights. Brewer v. Boston Theatre, 104 Mass. 378; Allen v. Wilson, 28 Fed. 677; Hawes v. Oakland (Hawes v. Contra Costa Water Co.) 104 U. S. 450, 26 L. ed. 827; Detroit v. Dean, 106 U. S. 537, 27 L. ed. 300, 1 Sup. Ct. Rep. 500; Dimpfell v. Ohio & M. R. Co. 110 U. S. 209, 28 L. ed. 121, 3 Sup. Ct. Rep. 573; Foss v. Harbottle, 2 Hare, 461. That may happen when the directors themselves are the wrongdoers, or are in fraudulent combination with them, or when the corporation is controlled by them, or when it is necessary that action should be taken too speedily to leave time for a corporate meeting of stockholders."

In Johns v. McLester, 137 Ala. 283, 97 Am. St. Rep. 27, 34 So. 174, the court said: "It is thoroughly well settled in this state that before a minority stockholder, or any number of them, can maintain a bill of this sort, he or they must make demand upon the managing officers or governing board of the corporation to correct the wrongs complained of, by legal proceedings or otherwise, and, meeting with failure or refusal, he or they must next seek redress through the stockholders as a body. And such demand or request must be clearly averred in the bill. Of course, this demand is not required when it is made clearly to appear that it would be refused, or that the litigation following would necessarily be under the control of persons opposed to its success, or when the persons constituting the governing board or a majority of them are the wrongdoers or under their control, and any effort to obtain redress through the stockholders would be unavailing for want of time or other cause. Of course, the excuse for not making the demand upon the governing board, or, if made upon that body, then the excuse for not seeking redress through the stockholders, must be clearly and distinctly averred in the bill. Montgomery Light Co. v. Lahey, 121 Ala. 131, 25 So. 1006, and authorities there cited."

In Montgomery Light Co. v. Lahey, supra, a bill alleging demand upon and refusal by the directors was dismissed on the ground that no allegation was contained therein of any effort to obtain relief from the body of stockholders, and no sufficient excuse for not doing so was alleged.

And this seems to be the rule in Alabama, without regard to the nature of the subject-matter of the suit. Louisville & N. P. Co. v. Neal, 128 Ala. 149, 29 So. 865; Bell v. Montgomery Light Co. 103 Ala. 275, 15 So. 569; Hagood v. Smith, 162 Ala. 512, 50 So. 374 (here there was a sufficient demand upon and refusal by the directors); Howze v. Harrison, 165 Ala. 150, 51 So. 614; Decatur Mineral Land Co. v. Palm, 113 Ala. 531, 59 Am. St. Rep. 140, 21 So. 315 (but it was here shown that a majority of stockholders were necessarily hostile to the suit, hence no demand upon them was necessary).

Under Montana Rev. Code, § 3835, which gives the majority of stockholders the power to control the election of directors, and § 3838, which enables stockholders to remove objectionable directors, it must be alleged and proved that complainants are minority stockholders. Brandt v. McIntosh, 47 Mont. 70, 130 Pac. 413.

The question of pleading, so far as it has been considered by the courts, has been incidentally discussed in citing the cases, supra. No doubt it is governed by the same principles that underlie the cases on the subject of demand upon the board of directors (see note to Fleming v. Warrior Copper Co. ante, 99); that is, if a demand upon the stockholders is necessary, it ought to be alleged, and if it is not necessary, that fact should appear in the pleadings, not as a general statement, but by means of particular facts from which the court may determine the necessity thereof.

Chase, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a representative action derived from the Interborough Rapid Transit Company. It is brought in behalf of the plaintiffs and all others similarly interested, as stockholders of said company, against the directors of said company and said company to require said individual defendants to account to said company for fifteen thousand shares of its capital stock, alleged to have been issued fraudulently and illegally, and without any valid or adequate consideration therefor, but upon an alleged consideration that was a pretense and subterfuge and intended to cover a gift or bonus to the defendants Belmont and Lutgen, and their nominees, and also to require said individual defendants to account for the dividends which have been paid on said stock. It is alleged that by reason of the facts set forth in the complaint the defendant corporation has suffered damage to an amount exceeding $4,500,000. Each of the defendants answered the complaint, and, after the answers were interposed, a motion was made for judgment upon the pleadings, dismissing the complaint pursuant to § 547 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which motion was denied. An appeal was taken therefrom to the appellate division, where the order denying said motion was unanimously affirmed. Leave was granted by the appellate division to the defendants, other than the defendant company, to appeal to this court, and the following questions were certified:

"(1) Does the complaint state a cause of action?"

"(2) Was the motion of the defendants for judgment against the plaintiffs on the pleadings rightfully denied?"

As the opinion will not discuss the complaint generally, but only in connection with the objections that are made to it by the appellants in this court, it is unnecessary to state its provisions except as required in considering such objections.

It appears from the complaint that each of the plaintiffs purchased his stock subsequently to the transactions complained of in the complaint. This court in the recent case of Pollitz v. Gould, 202 N. Y. 11, 38 L.R.A. (N.S.) 988, 94 N. E. 1088, Ann. Cas. 1912D, 1098, has definitely determined that a stockholder may bring an action in behalf of the corporation for the benefit of himself and all other stockholders to set aside as fraudulent an improper transaction consummated at the expense of the corporation before he acquired his stock.

It is alleged that the 15,000 shares of stock were issued pursuant to a resolution unanimously adopted by the directors of said company, of which the following is a copy, viz.: "Resolved that this company do purchase of August Belmont & Company one thousand nine hundred and seventy-five (1,975) shares of the capital stock of the Pelham Park Railroad Company of the par value of twenty-five dollars ($25) per share; one thousand nine hundred and thirty-five (1,935) shares of the capital stock of the City Island Railroad Company of the par value of twenty-five dollars ($25) per share; and twenty-seven thousand five hundred dollars ($27,500) in the first mortgage bonds of the Pelham Park Railroad Company, for the sum of one million five hundred thousand dollars ($1,500,000) to be paid by the issue and delivery of fifteen thousand (15,000) shares of the par value of one hundred dollars ($100) each in the full-paid nonassessable capital stock of this company, to such persons and in such amounts as the said August Belmont & Company may direct; which said sum is also to cover full compensation to the said August Belmont & Company for their services in procuring the assignment of the contract between John B. McDonald and the city of New York aforesaid, the sale to this company of the stock of the Rapid Transit Subway Construction Company, and the subscriptions to the remainder of the capital stock of this company." It is further alleged that the statement in said resolution in substance that said 15,000 shares of stock was to be issued and delivered in part to cover full compensation for certain alleged services rendered by the defendants Belmont and Luttgen was a pretense and subterfuge designed and intended to cover up the real transaction which was (except as to the actual cost of said stock and bonds of said railroad companies, namely, $32,185.97) a gift or bonus to said defendants Belmont and Luttgen and their nominees of said stock in the defendant company.

The appellants assert that the complaint is fatally defective because it does not offer to return the stock and bonds described in said resolution. The action is not brought for a rescission of the contract with August Belmont & Company, but for an accounting. The plaintiffs are not in possession of said stocks and bonds, and as individual stockholders are unable, through no fault of theirs, to return them. The plaintiffs do not bring this action because their rights have been directly violated or because the cause of action is theirs, or because they are entitled to the relief sought. They are permitted to sue in this manner simply in order to set in motion the judicial machinery of the court. Fom. Eq. Jur. § 1095. The court in the action can preserve and adjust the equities of the parties to it. Thomp. Corp. 2d ed. § 4568; 2 Mechem, Corp. § 1179; Kley v. Healy, 127 N. Y. 555, 28 N. E. 593, s. c. 149 N. Y. 346, 44 N. E. 150; Pritz v. Jones, 117 App. Div. 643, 102 N. Y. Supp. 549; Heckscher v. Edenborn, 203 N. Y. 210, 96 N. E. 441. The actual value of said stocks and bonds can be found in the action, and, if equity requires it, the defendant corporation can be directed to return such stocks and bonds to said August Belmont & Company.

It was not necessary for the plaintiffs to allege in the complaint that their predecessors in title did not assent to or acquiesce in the alleged fraudulent issue of said 15,000 shares of stock. It is not necessary to negative such assent or acquiescence in a fraud, unless it is otherwise to be presumed from the delay in bringing the action, or generally from the allegations of the complaint. If it exists, it is a matter of defense. Sage v. Culver, 147 N. Y. 241, 41 N. E. 513; Pollitz v. Gould, supra. If the rule were otherwise, the objection to the complaint would not avail the defendants in this case because the allegations of the complaint amount to a negative of any assent by the plaintiffs or their predecessors in title to the transactions alleged in the complaint.

It is also claimed by the appellants that it does not appear from the complaint that the defendant corporation and its board of directors were requested to bring suit to recover said 15,000 shares of stock or the value thereof, or that said corporation or said board of directors neglected or refused to bring such action. It appears from the complaint that on the 12th day of March, 1910, the plaintiff corporation, then being the owner of the stock now owned by the two plaintiffs, delivered to the defendant corporation and to its officers and directors a written communication directed to said defendant corporation and its president and directors, calling attention to the fact of the issue and delivery of said 15,000 shares of capital stock for a grossly inadequate and illegal consideration, and requesting and demanding that suit be brought in behalf of the corporation and in good faith prosecuted against the incorporators of said company and members of its board of directors during the year 1902 and said firm of August Belmont & Company to recover the damages suffered by reason of the action of the said incorporators and directors.

Said written communication also stated and provided as follows: "We hereby offer to properly indemnify the Interborough Rapid Transit Company against any damage or costs it may sustain as a result of bringing and prosecuting such suit. A copy of this letter is mailed to each director of the Interborough Rapid Transit Company. Unless within ten days from date you advise us that the request and demand herein will be complied with we shall conclude that you refuse." Thereafter the plaintiffs waited until May 4, 1910, when, no action having been commenced and no response having been made to said written communication, this action was commenced.

Upon the facts so alleged the plaintiffs treated the defendant corporation and its board of directors as having refused and neglected to bring such action, and the allegations relating thereto are sufficient to sustain the complaint. Kavanaugh v. Commonwealth Trust Co. 103 App. Div. 95, 92 N. Y. Supp. 543.

On this appeal as on the motion at the special term and on the hearing of the appeal in the appellate division, the allegations of the complaint are taken as true.

It is conceded that an action in equity cannot be maintained by the plaintiffs as individual stockholders for themselves and all others similarly interested, unless it is necessary because of the neglect and refusal of the corporate body to act.

It is necessary, therefore, in an action by the plaintiffs to set forth two things: First, a cause of action in favor of the corporation with the same detail of facts as would be proper in case the corporation itself had brought the action; second, the facts which entitle the plaintiff to maintain the action in place of the corporation. Kavanaugh v. Commonwealth Trust Co. 181 N. Y. 121, 73 N. E. 582; O'Connor v. Virginia Pass. & Power Co. 184 N. Y. 46, 76 N. E. 1082. It is not seriously contended that the complaint does not state a good cause of action in favor of the defendant corporation. It is insisted by the defendants that it was necessary for the plaintiffs, in addition to alleging a demand upon the defendant corporation and its board of directors, to bring the action, and their neglect and refusal to do so, to allege that they had given notice of the alleged fraud to the body of stockholders of the defendant corporation, and had demanded of said stockholders that some action be taken by them to redress the wrong, and that such body of stockholders had neglected and refused to take any action relating thereto. The cause of action belongs to the corporate body, and not to the plaintiffs and other stockholders individually, nor to the body of stockholders collectively.

The board of directors represents the corporate body. It is provided by statute in this state that the affairs of every corporation shall be managed by its board of directors. General corporation law (Consol. Laws 1909, chap. 23), § 34. The directors are not ordinary agents in the immediate control of the stockholders. The directors hold their office charged with the duty to act for the corporation according to their best judgment; and in so doing they cannot be controlled in the reasonable exercise and performance of such duty. The corporation is the owner of the property, but the directors, in the performance of their duty, possess it and act in every way as if they owned it. People ex rel. Manice v. Powell, 201 N. Y. 194, 94 N. E. 634. They are trustees clothed with the power of controlling the property and managing the affairs of a corporation without let or hindrance. As to third persons, they are its agents, but as to the corporation itself equity holds them liable as trustees. 2 Pom. Eq. Jur. §§ 1061, 1073, 1088, 1097; People ex rel. Manice v. Power, supra.

The claim of the appellants that the body of stockholders has some immediate or direct authority to act for the corporation or to control the board of directors in the matters set forth in the complaint is based upon an erroneous conception of the duties and powers of the body of stockholders in this state.

As a general rule, stockholders cannot act in relation to the ordinary business of a corporation. The body of stockholders have certain authority conferred by statute which must be exercised to enable the corporation to act in specific cases, but except 51 L.R.A. (N.S.)

for certain authority conferred by statute, which is mainly permissive or confirmatory, such as consenting to the mortgage, lease, or sale of real property of the corporation, they have no express power given by statute. They are not by any statute in this state given general power of initiative in corporate affairs. Any action by them relating to the details of the corporate business is necessarily in the form of an assent, request, or recommendation. Recommendations by a body of stockholders can only be enforced through the board of directors, and indirectly by the authority of the stockholders to change the personnel of the directors at a meeting for the election of directors. Such action may or may not result in securing adequate corporate action with reference to illegal or fraudulent acts. For reasons wholly apart from the matter in dispute, the stockholders may not desire to change a majority of the persons comprising its board of directors. Some of the reasons why the power vested in stockholders to elect directors is inadequate as a remedy for specific fraudulent acts are stated by Cook in his work on Corporations, § 740, in which he says: "There has been considerable discussion as to whether the stockholder, in addition to his request to the corporate officers to institute the suit, should not also be required to attempt to induce the stockholders in meeting assembled to take action by directing the directors to bring suit, or by refusing to re-elect them at the next election. The fact, however, that the stockholders in meeting assembled cannot control the discretion of the directors in bringing such a suit, that the remedy of refusing to re-elect them involves delay, and involves the assumption that a minority of the stockholders can by the election control such a suit, that irreparable injury or the vesting of great financial interests may occur in the meantime, and that laches may arise as a bar to the stockholder's suit, have settled the rule that the stockholder's request to the corporate directors to institute the suit is sufficient. He need not also apply to a stockholders' meeting." Although it is said that the authority of stockholders in the management of business corporations is exhausted when they elect the directors (Thomp. Corp. 2d ed. § 1178), nevertheless it is generally recognized that certain acts of boards of directors that are legal, but voidable, can be ratified and confirmed by a majority of the body of stockholders as the ultimate parties in interest, and thus make them binding upon the corporation. Morawetz, Corp. 2d ed. §§ 625, 626. Such recognized authority in stockholders to ratify and confirm the acts of boards of directors is confined to acts voidable by reason of irregularities in the make-up of the board or otherwise, or by reason of the directors or some of them being personally interested in the subject-matter of the contract or act, or for some other similar reason which makes the action of the directors voidable. No such authority exists in case of an act of the board of directors which is prohibited by law or which is against public policy. Kent v. Quicksilver Min. Co. 78 N. Y. 159, 4 Mor. Min. Rep. 47.

In any case where action is taken by stockholders confirming and ratifying a fraud and misapplication of the funds of the corporation by the directors or others the action is binding only by way of estoppel upon such stockholders as vote in favor of such approval. Morawetz, Corp. 2d ed. § 625. The distinction between acts that can and those that cannot be confirmed and ratified is shown in the report of two frequently cited English decisions, namely, Foss v. Harbottle, 2 Hare, 461, and Bagshaw v. Eastern Union R. Co. 7 Hare, 114. The former of these cases was limited to the approval of a legal but voidable act. In the Bagshaw Case, where the directors of a corporation had misapplied or were about to misapply certain moneys of the corporation, the court says: "No majority of the shareholders, however large, could sanction the misapplication of this portion of the capital. A single dissenting voice would frustrate the wishes of the majority. Indeed, in strictness, even unanimity would not make the act lawful. This appears to me to take it out of the case of Foss v. Harbottle, to which I was referred. That case does not, I apprehend, upon this point, go further than this: That if the act, though it be the act of the directors only, be one which a general meeting of the company could sanction, a bill by some of the shareholders on behalf of themselves and others, to impeach that act, cannot be sustained, because a general meeting of the company might immediately confirm and give validity to the act of which the bill complains."

It is the governing body or bodies of a corporation with power to enforce a remedy to whom complaining stockholders must go with their demand for relief. The governing body of corporations in this state, as we have seen, is the board of directors. A complaining stockholder must go to such board for relief before he can bring an action, unless it clearly appears by the complaint that such application is useless. If the subject-matter of the stockholder's complaint is for any reason within the immediate control, direction, or power of confirmation of the body of stockholders, it 51 L.R.A.(N.S.) should be brought to the attention of such stockholders for action, before an action is commenced by a stockholder, unless it clearly appears by the complaint that such application is useless. The decision reported in Hawes v. Oakland (Hawes v. Contra Costa Water Co.) 104 U. S. 450, 26 L. ed. 827, and other similar decisions in the Federal and state courts, are not in conflict with the decision about to be rendered herein. In such cases, as in this case, it is asserted that an application to the body of stockholders is unnecessary when it is unreasonable to require it. If the body of stockholders has no adequate power or authority to remedy the wrong asserted by the individual stockholders, it is unreasonable and unnecessary to require an application to it to redress the wrong before bringing a representative action. See opinion of Carr, J., in the appellate division herein, 150 App. Div. 298, 134 N. Y. Supp. 635. See also Delaware & H. Co. v. Albany & S. R. Co. 213 U. S. 435, 53 L. ed. 862, 29 Sup. Ct. Rep. 540. In this case, where the plaintiff alleges fraud and a substantial misappropriation of 15,000 shares of the stock of the corporation through a nominal purchase of property and the payment of a pretended claim for services, application to the body of stockholders was not necessary.

It is claimed by the respondents that the complaint discloses such a state of facts as would dispense with the necessity of making any demand either upon the corporation, its board of directors, or the body of stockholders before bringing an action to recover for the company the value of the 15,000 shares of stock alleged to have been illegally and fraudulently issued to the individual defendants.

We have not considered the allegations of the complaint with reference to such claim of the respondents.

The order should be affirmed, with costs, and each of the questions certified answered in the affirmative.

PENNSYLVANIA SUPREME COURT.

WILLIAM J. KELLY, Appt.,

v.

GEORGE W. THOMAS et al.

(234 Pa. 419, 83 Atl. 307.)

Corporation — suit by stockholders — necessity of demand.

1. A stockholder of a corporation cannot, without demand on the corporation and its directors, maintain an action against directors who are alleged to have fraudulently failed to enforce contracts in favor of the corporation and to protect its property, if defendants are minority directors, and no collusion with the majority is shown.

Parties — corporation — suit by stockholder.

2. The corporation is a necessary party to a suit by a stockholder to hold directors liable for refusal to enforce contracts in its favor and to protect its property.

Judgment — fraud — attack.

3. The question of the proper service of process on a corporation and the excessiveness of a judgment against it in a foreign court cannot be inquired into upon averments that the suit was kept secret from complainant, a stockholder in the corporation, by service upon an officer of the corporation, who was in the employ of plaintiff, and that the claim adjudicated was wrongfully and fraudulently excessive.

Court — jurisdiction of foreign corporation.

4. Courts of one state have no jurisdiction of a suit by a stockholder of a foreign corporation which does not transact its business within that state, against its directors, because of their failure to enforce contracts in its favor and to protect its property, since those are matters of internal management.

Pleading — multifariousness.

5. A bill by a stockholder of a corporation is multifarious which seeks to recover on behalf of the corporation against its directors for fraudulent management of its affairs, against another corporation to recover profits made by it on business which should have come to the former, and by such stockholder individually against the direc-

Note. — Necessity of making corporation a party to a suit by a stockholder in its behalf.

As to necessity of demand upon and refusal by the board of directors or the body of stockholders as a condition precedent to stockholder's right to sue in behalf of the corporation, see notes to Fleming v. Warrior Copper Co. ante, 99, and Continental Securities Co. v. Belmont, ante, 112, respectively.

In KELLY v. THOMAS, the court points out the fact that in a suit by a stockholder on behalf of the corporation the latter is a necessary party to the suit for the reasons that (1) the rights of plaintiff are dependent on establishing its rights; (2) defendant has the right to a decree that will conclude it from any further action; (3) the corporation itself is entitled to notice so as to be able to take care of its own rights. The rule that the corporation must be made a party seems to be universally adopted.

While it is the practice in the United States to make the corporation a defendant, it seems to be the practice of the English courts to bring it in as a plaintiff.

The practice in the English courts is for the complaining stockholder to obtain permission to use the corporate name as plaintiff, and this seems to be the form of the action even when it is not necessary to obtain permission; but in Silber Light Co. v. Silber, 48 L. J. Ch. N. S. 385, L. R. 12 Ch. Div. 717, 40 L. T. N. S. 96, 27 Week. Rep. 427, where the stockholders had passed a resolution forbidding the use of the corporate name in a suit against the directors for misappropriation of corporate funds, it was held that the corporate name would be stricken off as plaintiff, and added as a defendant.

And in Duckett v. Gover, 46 L. J. Ch. N. S. 407, L. R. 6 Ch. Div. 82, 25 Week. Rep. 554, where, by mistake, the corporation was made defendant, the complaint was amended by making it a plaintiff instead, in the absence of need of getting its consent. 51 L.R.A. (N.S.)

And there are many English decisions where this custom was followed without discussion of the point.

In the following cases it was held that wherever the suit is in behalf of the corporation, the rights of the complaining stockholder being derivative, the corporation must be made a party defendant:

Ruch, 54 Fed. 216, reaffirmed in 56 Fed. 416; Holton v. Wallace, 66 Fed. 409, affirmed in 27 C. C. A. 71, 39 U. S. App. 326, 77 Fed. 61; Kelly v. tors of the two corporations to recover for depreciation in the value of the stock of the former.

APPEAL by plaintiff from a decree of the Court of Common Pleas, No. 4, for Allegheny County, dismissing a bill filed to hold defendants liable for alleged fraudulent failure to enforce contracts in favor of a corporation of which plaintiff was a stockholder, and to protect its property. Affirmed.

The bill was filed against two corporations and the directors of one of them individually. Only part of the defendants appeared and they demurred to the bill. As an excuse for failure to demand that the defendant directors bring the suit, the bill alleged that they were themselves charged with the misfeasance set out in the bill, and that therefore demand would have been useless.

Swearingen, the presiding justice in the lower court, stated the facts as follows:

"The important averments are these: The complainant is the owner of 48 per cent of the capital stock of the Mississippi River Coaling Company, and C. Jutte & Company is the owner of 41 per cent thereof, less four shares assigned to several persons to qualify them as directors. August 13, 1904, the complainant and C. Jutte & Company entered into a written contract, whereby they agreed that a corporation should be formed under the laws of Louisiana, with a capital stock of $100,000, for which the complainant and his associates were to subscribe, and the object of which was to build docks at the mouth of Lake Borgue canal, in order to handle and store coal for the purpose of coaling steamers, supplying bunker coal, and loading cargo or bunker coal for export; that complainant was to transfer to said corporation a lease of certain property for its purposes; that C. Jutte & Company was to loan the corporation $40,000 upon its notes, to be secured by the stock, as soon as the complainant had obtained a contract for C. Jutte & Company to supply the Elder-Dempster Steamship Company with coal, and had produced reasonable assurance in writing that C. Jutte & Company was to obtain like contracts from other lines; that the dock company was to handle no coal except that of C. Jutte & Company and all contracts were to be made in the latter's name, and that the compensation of the dock company was to be all in excess of $2.85 per net ton, but it was not required to handle coal at a compensation of less than 30 cents per ton. Pursuant to said contract, a corporation of the state of Louisiana was formed and was named Mississippi River Coaling Company, with a capital stock of $100,000, which was subscribed by complainant and his associates. It was organized with a board of five directors. Complainant turned over to said corporation the lease, as he was required to do, for which he received $99,600 of said stock. He transferred to C. Jutte & Company $52,000 of said stock, obtained a contract with Elder-Dempster Steamship Company and assurances from other companies, and in all respects fulfilled his obligations under the contract. C. Jutte & Company loaned the sum of $40,000 to the dock company and received the notes therefor and the collateral; and the coal tipple and docks were erected. Said George W. Thomas became president of the said dock company, his son, Albert G. Thomas, secretary and treasurer, and J. W. Friend a director. Complainant was also a director. Said George W. Thomas and James W. Friend were also controlling officers and directors in, and the principal owners of, the stock of C. Jutte & Company.

"It was averred that the defendants, who controlled both corporations and had a large

And the fact that the corporation is made a party defendant in practically all the cases without the question having been raised shows that this is the universal practice in the United States. For a list of such cases, see the notes to Fleming v. Warrior Copper Co. ante, 99, and Continental Securities Co. v. Belmont, ante, 112. 51 L.R.A. (N.S.)

There are a number of cases sustaining the general proposition that where the court is able to do complete equity among the parties before it, there is no necessity of joining the corporation in the suit (see Toledo Traction, Light, & P. Co. v. Smith, 205 Fed. 643, and cases cited therein); but it is difficult to conceive of a case where that could be done where the stockholder is suing in the corporate right, for the corporation would necessarily be affected by any decision in the case, as the benefit to the complainants must necessarily flow through the corporation. So, the very conditions stated in the holdings take such cases out of the scope of this note.

interest in C. Jutte & Company, fraudulently failed to enforce said contract in favor of the dock company and against C. Jutte & Company, and fraudulently violated the same for the benefit of C. Jutte & Company; that, instead of selling coal through the dock company, C. Jutte & Company sold coal directly to said steamship companies, and deprived the dock company of the large profits it would have made; that C. Jutte & Company neglected to obtain other large and valuable contracts for the benefit of the dock company; and that said officers and directors permitted the coal tippie of the dock company to become out of repair and allowed washes to occur under its foundations, which could have been prevented at small expense. It was also averred that on January 31, 1907, C. Jutte & Company brought suit against said dock company in the United States circuit court for the eastern district of Louisiana, and service was had upon Albert G. Thomas, its secretary and treasurer, who was employed by and interested in C. Jutte & Company, said suit having been kept secret from the complainant; that on July 5, 1907, judgment was rendered in favor of C. Jutte & Company and against said Mississippi River Coaling Company in the sum of $70,489.95, with interest on $65,163.89 from January 1, 1907; and that the said claim was 'wrongfully and fraudulently excessive,' and was 'inflated and so made excessive as one of the means of depriving the coaling company of its property.' Execution was afterwards issued on said judgment and the property of the dock company was sold to officers and directors of C. Jutte & Company for the sum of $18,000; it being of the value of at least $125,000. The complainant finally averred that his stock in the dock company, which was worth $50,000, had been rendered worthless by reason of said acts of the officers and directors and controlling stockholders therein. . . .

"The bill shows that whilst the original contract was between the complainant and C. Jutte & Company, one of the covenants was that a corporation was to be formed, and thereafter the dealings of C. Jutte & Company were to be with that corporation, that such corporation was formed, and that both the complainant and C. Jutte & Company have performed their initial obligations to it. In fact, there is no averment in the bill that any covenant with C. Jutte & Company made with the complainant personally has been broken. Nor is there any averment that any of the defendants violated any contract made with him directly, or committed any breach of duty which they owed to him as an individual. On the contrary, the averments are that C. Jutte & 51 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Company subsequently broke the covenants it made with the Mississippi River Coaling Company,—covenants found in the original contracts, it is true, but none the less made with the dock company,—and that some of the defendants disregarded their duty to the dock company, not to the plaintiff, arising out of their fiduciary relations to it. It is charged that C. Jutte & Company, by some of the defendants, did not sell coal through the dock company; that it allowed the property of the dock company to depreciate; that it failed to secure other valuable contracts for the dock company. . . . Finally, complainant alleged that the defendant caused an excessive judgment to be entered against the dock company and its property to be sold."

Further facts appear in the opinion.

Messrs. Ernest Dale Owen, William M. Galbraith, and Oliver K. Eaton for appellant.

Messrs. Robert J. Dodds, William M. Robinson, and Reed, Smith, Shaw, & Beal, for appellees:

The gravamen of the bill of complaint, so far as respects this demurrant, concerns entirely the internal affairs of a foreign corporation, and therefore this court will take no jurisdiction of the cause.

Plaintiff had no personal right of action. McMullen v. Ritchie, 64 Fed. 253; Wolf v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 195 Pa. 91, 45 Atl. 936.

The presence of the Mississippi River Coaling Company is indispensable to the maintenance of the action, and it not appearing that said corporation is within the jurisdiction of this court or subject to its process, it will not entertain jurisdiction of the cause.

The bill of complaint is vague and uncertain, and, so far as it recites facts, shows no equity.

Wolf v. Pennsylvania R. Co. supra.

Moschzisker, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The material facts in this case fully appear in the opinion of the court below, published in connection herewith. The plaintiff alleged that the defendants, as officers of the Mississippi River Coaling Company (referred to by the court below as the "dock company"), had refused to enforce certain contracts against another corporation known as C. Jutte & Company, in which they were interested as stockholders and officers; that they had neglected to secure other valuable contracts for the coaling company; that they had failed to keep the property of said company in repair, and had permitted it to be sold for an inadequate price under a judgment secured by C. Jutte & Company through fraudulent collusion with them. These facts, if established, would constitute breaches of the defendants' duties to the coaling company, for which they would be directly liable to that corporation—not to its stockholders.

The plaintiff avers in his bill that "no demand has been made upon the officers and directors of the Mississippi River Coaling Company to bring or conduct this suit, for the reason that the same is brought against them, charging them with the misfeasance herein set out, and that such demand would therefore have been useless." It appears, however, that of the seven officers and directors of the coaling company only three are named as defendants in this proceeding, and the appellant expressly admits that he has no case against Albert G. Thomas, one of the three. He does not aver in detail specific acts done by any of the defendants showing fraudulent collusion, but contents himself with general allegations of fraud based upon the averment "that the principal and controlling officers and directors of said coaling company, especially G. W. Thomas and J. F. Friend, and not including your orator, were also the controlling officers and directors, and the principal owners of the stock of the said C. Jutte & Company, and had a larger and greater interest in said C. Jutte & Company than they had in said coaling company."

In Wolf v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 195 Pa. 91, 95, 45 Atl. 936, 937, the plaintiff charged collusion on the part of the directors of a corporation, and we said: "The averments of collusion relied on by plaintiff are that, as the lessee is the owner of a majority of the shares of the lessor, the former elects and controls the action of the officers of the latter. . . . The defect of this charge is that it does not rest on any acts averred, but on an inference that, by reason of the circumstances of their election, the directors will violate their duty and commit a breach of trust. There is, however, no presumption that officers will commit a breach of trust. The charge should rest on some act, affirmative or permissive, manifestly in violation of duty, and manifestly the result of fraud, and not of erroneous judgment." Fraud is largely a conclusion of law, and all our cases agree that general allegations which do not set forth the particular circumstances are not sufficient. Where it satisfactorily appears that a demand upon the officers of a corporation would be useless, such a course need not be pursued; but here the plaintiff has not made it plain from facts stated that a majority of the board of directors of the corporation in question had been, or probably would have been, faithless to their trust, hence he has not shown a right to maintain the suit in his individual capacity. We have held: "The right of an individual stockholder to act for the corporation is exceptional and only arises on a clear showing of special circumstances, among which inability or unwillingness of the corporation itself, demand upon the regular corporate management, and refusal to act, are imperative requisites. And the refusal by the corporate management must appear affirmatively to be a disregard of duty, and not an error of judgment; a nonperformance of a manifest official obligation, amounting to a breach of trust. . . . There must be averred and proved an actual application to the directors, and a refusal by them to bring suit or to allow plaintiff to do so in the corporate name; and, where misconduct of the directors themselves is alleged, the bill must show an effort to secure plaintiff's rights through meetings of the corporation." Wolf v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 195 Pa. 91, 94, 45 Atl. 936; McCloskey v. Snowden, 212 Pa. 249, 108 Am. St. Rep. 867, 61 Atl. 796. A shareholder has no distinct and individual title to the moneys and property of a corporation. Bidwell v. Pittsburgh, O. & E. L. Pass. R. Co. 114 Pa. 535, 541, 6 Atl. 729. In McMullen v. Ritchie (C. C.) 64 Fed. 253, 262, Mr. Justice Lurton, then a United States circuit judge, stated: "The injury done by the defendants, if any, was done to the corporation. . . . The wrong, if actionable, was one to be remedied by an action by the corporation, or by a shareholder for the benefit of the corporation upon the refusal of the corporation to sue. A stockholder cannot maintain a suit for the indirect injury done him as an indirect result of an injury to the corporation. This is too obvious to need elaboration." These words are applicable to the present case.

While the Mississippi River Coaling Company was named as a defendant, it was never served, and did not appear. The learned court below rightly decided that the presence of this corporation as a party to the record was indispensable to the maintenance of the action. The rights of the plaintiff depended upon those of the coaling company, and the latter was not before the court. Not only was its presence necessary to the plaintiff, but the defendants were entitled thereto so that the corporation might be concluded by any decree entered against them, and the company itself was entitled to notice in order that its interest and the rights of its creditors might be protected. See quotations from standard text-books upon this point in Willoughby v. Chicago Junction R. & Union Stockyards Co. 50 N. J. Eq. 658, 25 Atl. 277, 280, 281, and Eldred v. American Palace-Car Co. 44 C. C. A. 554, 105 Fed. 457, 458. There is nothing upon the record to show that it was impossible to secure service upon the individual defendants in the domicile of the foreign corporation. They were officers of that company, and, in the absence of any averment to the contrary, it is but reasonable to assume that they could have been served in the state in which that corporation had its being and transacted its business.

It appears from the bill that the dealings between Jutte & Company and the coaling company were adjudicated in an action at law brought by the former against the latter in the year 1907, in the United States circuit court for the eastern district of Louisiana, and that a judgment for a considerable sum was secured against the coaling company. The plaintiff sought to have the court below inquire into and practically set aside that judgment as fraudulent, upon the general averment that the suit was "kept wholly secret from your orator;" that the service was upon the secretary and treasurer of the coaling company, who was the son of one of the other defendants and in the employ of Jutte & Company; that the claim adjudicated was "wrongfully and fraudulently excessive;" that Jutte & Company "had no proper legal cause of action against the said Mississippi River Coaling Company;" that the proceedings were "wrongful, fraudulent, and oppressive, and the judgment in said suit was procured by deceit upon the court . . . and was part of the general wrongful and fraudulent scheme and design of the defendants . . . for the purpose of preventing your orator from getting the benefit to which he was entitled as a stockholder of the said . . . coaling company." Had it been proper for the court below to review this judgment, it was not called upon to do so under these general averments. We are convinced that no error was committed in determining that "it would be highly improper . . . under the averments of this bill to undertake to ascertain whether or not the dock company was properly served with process, and whether or not the judgment of that court was excessive in amount."

In the eyes of the law as laid down in this state the gravamen of the bill, so far as respects the demurrants, concerns the management of the internal affairs of a foreign corporation. As to this, we have said: "A Pennsylvania resident has no right to call upon the courts of his own state to protect him from the consequences of a voluntary membership in a foreign corporation. By the very act of membership he intrusted his money to the management of a corporation owing its existence to and governed by the laws of another state. . . . Without doubt, courts of equity in Pennsylvania have . . . jurisdiction to enjoin unlawful acts by such corporations; . . . but they have no jurisdiction as to their internal management. What constitutes internal management is well defined by Stone, J., in North State Copper & G. Min. Co. v. Field, 64 Md. 151, 20 Atl. 1039: 'Where the act complained of affects the complainant solely in his capacity as a member of the corporation, whether it be as stockholder, director, president, or other officer, and is the act of the corporation, whether acting in stockholders' meeting, or through its agents, the board of directors, then such action is the management of the internal affairs of the corporation; and, in case of a foreign corporation, our courts will not take jurisdiction.'" Madden v. Penn Electric Light Co. 181 Pa. 617, 621, 622, 38 L.R.A. 638, 37 Atl. 817, 818. This was said in a case where the business and tangible property of the foreign corporation were within our own state, and where stockholders charged the corporate management with conduct "which depreciated and rendered valueless their stock," and it was repeated under like circumstances in McCloskey v. Snowden, supra. The present corporation has no property, and does not conduct its business in this state.

We have examined Sloan v. Clarkson, 105 Md. 171, 66 Atl. 18; Miller v. Quincy, 179 N. Y. 294, 72 N. E. 116; Babcock v. Farwell, 245 Ill. 14, 137 Am. St. Rep. 284, 91 N. E. 683, 19 Ann. Cas. 74; State ex rel. Watkins v. North American Land & Timber Co. 106 La. 621, 87 Am. St. Rep. 309, 31 So. 172; Beale, Foreign Corp. §§ 309-312; 3 Clark & M. Priv. Corp. § 865, and the other cases cited by the appellants, and, while some of these do not entirely agree with the Pennsylvania doctrine, it is to be noted that in each instance where other jurisdictions have taken a more liberal view than our own in reference to granting relief involving an inquiry into the management of the internal affairs of a foreign corporation the business and property of the corporation affected were within the jurisdiction of the court. In view of the circumstances of the present case, we do not feel that a departure from our own rule would be justifiable; but in a case free from the peculiar difficulties of this one, where the foreign corporation was served and all the parties or property directly involved was within the jurisdiction of the court, if the actual exercise of visitatorial powers is not requisite to the relief, the rule as to noninterference should be restricted and not carried further than is absolutely required by universal fixed rules of law; for, where possible, we should prevent its use as a cloak to cover apparent fraudulent conduct on the part of officers of foreign corporations to the prejudice of Pennsylvania stockholders.

For the reasons already stated, the court could have done naught else than dismiss the plaintiff's case; but, in addition, the demurrer raised the point that the bill was multifarious, and this also was well taken; for in effect it seeks to maintain, first, an action by the plaintiff as a stockholder of the coaling company on behalf of that company to recover against certain of its directors and one of its stockholders for losses growing out of an alleged fraudulent and collusive management of its affairs; next, an action of the same character against C. Jutte & Company to recover profits made by that concern on coal sold which should have been disposed of through the coaling company; lastly, an action by the plaintiff individually against the directors of the coaling company and C. Jutte & Company to recover for the depreciation in the value of his stock in the former company.

The assignments of error are overruled, and the decree of the court below is affirmed, at the cost of the appellant.

GEORGIA SUPREME COURT.

S. D. CASSIDY, Plff. in Err.,
v.

C. M. WILEY, Ordinary.

(141 Ga. 331, 80 S. E. 1046.)

Intoxicating liquor — misuse of license — effect.

1. Where a person operating a place of business under a license authorizing the sale by retail of drinks in imitation of or intended as a substitute for beer, ale, wine, whisky, or other alcoholic, spirituous, or malt liquors, under Civ. Code 1910, § 1765,

Headnotes by LUMPKIN, J.

Note. — There appears to be no other case on the exact point decided in the above case as to the refusal of a license to sell "soft" drinks because of the unlawful sale of intoxicating liquors.

In general as to the power to prohibit or regulate the sale of "soft" drinks, see note 51 L.R.A.(N.S.)

was convicted of unlawfully keeping on hand at his place of business alcoholic, spirituous, malt, and intoxicating liquors, under Penal Code 1910, § 426, and it was conceded that the place of business so referred to was that where he conducted business under the license above mentioned, ipso facto, under Civil Code 1910, § 1769, he became disqualified from holding another similar license.

Same — refusal of license.

2. Under such circumstances, there was no breach of duty on the part of the ordinary in refusing to issue to such person a new license to conduct the same business, and there was no error on the part of the superior court in refusing to compel him to do so by writ of mandamus.

Constitutional law — refusal of liquor license — deprivation of rights.

3. The provision of Civil Code 1910, § 1769, in regard to disqualifying one who has violated the prohibition law under color of his license to sell what is commonly called "near beer" from holding another license to conduct that business, as applied to one who has been convicted of keeping spirituous, malt, and intoxicating liquors at his place of business, is not in conflict with the 14th Amendment of the Constitution of the United States, as depriving the applicant for the license of liberty or property without due process of law, nor is it violative of the clause of the state Constitution containing a similar provision.

ERROR to the Superior Court for Bibb County to review a judgment denying a writ of mandamus to compel the issuance to petitioner of a license to sell a substitute for beer. Affirmed.

Statement by Lumpkin, J.:

S. D. Cassidy filed a petition for mandamus against C. M. Wiley, ordinary of Bibb county, to compel the respondent to issue to him a license to conduct the business of selling a commodity in imitation of or intended as a substitute for beer, under Civil Code 1910, §§ 1763, 1765. The court granted a rule nisi, and upon the final hearing the case was submitted to the judge upon an agreed statement of facts, which was in substance as follows: On November 11, 1913, the plaintiff applied to the ordinary for a license for that year to engage in the sale of a commodity in imitation of or intended as a substitute for beer. The ordinary asked the plaintiff if he had been con-to Tolliver v. Blizzard, 34 L.R.A.(N.S.) 890.

As to power of municipality to regulate the sale of nonintoxicating alcoholic beverages, see note to State v. Dannenburg, 26 L.R.A.(N.S.) 890.

victed for a violation of the prohibition law since its passage in 1908, and the plaintiff admitted that he was so convicted in June, 1911. Thereupon the ordinary refused to issue to him a license, on the ground that § 1769 of the Code prohibited the plaintiff from obtaining a license. In the year 1911 the plaintiff was engaged in the business of the sale of a beverage or drink in imitation of or intended as a substitute for beer, under a license by the state; this license being granted to him on January 3, 1911, as a retailer of "near beer." On July 3, 1911, the plaintiff was convicted on an indictment charging him with a misdemeanor, in that on the 5th day of May, 1911, in Bibb county, Georgia, he did then and there unlawfully keep on hand at his place of business alcoholic, spirituous, malt, and intoxicating liquors. The unlawful keeping on hand, for which the plaintiff was convicted, occurred during the year 1911 at the plaintiff's place of business, where he held the "near beer" license above referred to, and while he was operating his place of business under that license. In addition to the agreed statement of facts, an affidavit of the petitioner was introduced, which in substance was as follows: In June, 1911, he was engaged in the business of the sale of a commodity or a beverage in imitation of or a substitute for beer, and was operating a place of business in the city of Macon, under and by virtue of a license issued to him by the ordinary of the county of Bibb and a license issued to him by the mayor and council of the city of Macon. While thus engaged he kept on hand at his place of business certain intoxicating beverages; but they were not kept by him under color of the license granted to him for the sale of a commodity or a beverage in imitation of or substitute for beer, but they were kept at his place of business in violation of law. The court denied the mandamus absolute, and the petitioner excepted.

Campbell v. Thomasville, 6 Ga. App. 212, 64 S. E. 815.

Lumpkin, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The present case arises under an application for a mandamus absolute to compel the ordinary to issue a license authorizing the petitioner to sell what is commonly known as "near beer." It has been held by this court several times that, in order to entitle one to the writ of mandamus, it must appear that he has a clear legal right to have a particular act performed, the doing of which he seeks to have enforced. Adkins v. Bennett, 138 Ga. 118 (1), 74 S. E. 838.

Civil Code 1910, § 1769, reads as follows: "Any person who shall sell, or furnish, keep, or give away, under color of the license herein required, any liquor, drink, or beverage prohibited by law, shall, in addition to any penalty which he may otherwise be liable to, forfeit said license and be forever disqualified from holding any such license or being in the employment of any person holding such license; and any person holding such license who shall knowingly employ any person so disqualified shall forfeit his license and be in like manner disqualified." In Cassidy v. Howard, 140 Ga. 844, 80 S. E. 1, it was held that, in an equitable proceeding to abate and enjoin a "blind tiger" under the provisions of Civil Code 1910, §§ 5335 et seq., on the hearing of the application for an interlocutory injunction, the defendant could not be adjudged to be disqualified from doing business under a "near beer" license held by him, from ever doing business under any such a license, and from being employed by another engaged in business under such a license, and that, in such a proceeding, he could not be enjoined from so doing. It was said in the opinion that the expression, "in addition to any penalty which he may otherwise be liable to," he shall forfeit his license, etc., was inapplicable to the equitable proceeding provided by the statute for the abatement of a "blind tiger," but constituted an additional penalty upon such person, if convicted of a violation of the general prohibition law. This decision, however, did not hold that the indictment for a violation of the prohibition law must allege, and the evidence prove, that the violation was under color of the license held by the defendant, and that the judge in trying the criminal case had to include in his sentence a declaration of disqualification. The law does not so provide, but expressly declares that, in addition to any penalty to which he may otherwise be liable, he shall forfeit his license, and be forever disqualified from holding any such license. The language of this act makes it self-operative. By the Penal Code 1910, § 426, the sale, bartering, giving away to induce trade, or keeping or furnishing, or manufacturing, or keeping on hand at a place or business of any alcoholic, spirituous, malt, or intoxicating liquors, is declared to be a misdemeanor. For a violation of this law, an offender is subject to fine or imprisonment, or both. If a person holding a "near beer" license, under color of it, violates the law just mentioned, and is convicted of such violation, he is subject to fine or imprisonment; but, in addition, the Civil Code 1910, § 1769, declares him to be disqualified from thereafter engaging in that character of business. Ipsa facto upon conviction he becomes disqualified, and it requires no judgment of disqualification to make him so. It is the law, not a judgment announcing it, which works the disqualification. It is suggested that he should be indicted for violating the prohibition law "under color of the license," and should be tried and convicted therefor, and sentenced accordingly. The difficulty about this suggestion is that there is no such distinct criminal offense as violating the prohibition law under color of a license. Section 426 of the Penal Code creates no such offense different from any other violation of the law, and § 1769 of the Civil Code does not undertake to create a new criminal offense, but simply to provide for a disqualification arising from a conviction under the other law. If an indictment should undertake to describe a different offense from that provided in the statute, either it might be demurrable, or the superadded words might be surplusage. But no new offense can be created by the courts by tacking a civil statute onto a criminal one.

There are two classes of forfeitures, disqualifications, or the like. In one class they are made a part of the penal statute, enter into the trial of the criminal case, and are declared as a part of the sentence pronounced by the court in that case. In the other they do not form any part of the trial or sentence in the criminal case; but the forfeiture or disqualification is declared by the statute itself upon the happening of some event, such as a conviction under the penal law, or a judgment imposing the usual penalty under that law. Under the first class of statutes mentioned, a judgment of forfeiture or disqualification is necessary. Under the latter, no judgment declaring a forfeiture is essential; but from the existence of certain facts the law declares a certain result. Both classes of statutes have been recognized as legal in this state. In Newman v. State, 101 Ga. 537, 28 S. E. 1005, the statute under consideration declared that, "if any vendor of intoxicating liquors shall be convicted of the violation of any law controlling or regulating the liquor traffic, it shall be a part of the sentence that his license shall be forfeited, and that he shall be disqualified from selling any form of intoxicating liquors for the term of one year from the date of the sentence in his own name or right as agent or otherwise, and, if he shall sell, or become in any way interested in the sale of, such liquors after his license has been revoked, he shall be guilty of a misdemeanor." Here the revocation of the license and disqualification were distinctly made a part of the sentence to be imposed by the trial judge, and it only became a misdemeanor for the defendant to sell liquor after such a revocation was made. It was accordingly held that, as the judgment must follow the pleadings, the indictment or presentment should charge that the defendant was a licensed dealer. On the other hand, in Sprayberry v. Atlanta, 87 Ga. 120, 13 S. E. 197, a municipal ordinance, enacted under charter authority, provided that "the conviction in a state court of any person licensed to retail spirituous or malt liquors, for the violation of the state statute in relation to the sale of ardent spirits to a minor or a person already intoxicated, or the conviction of a retailer before the recorder's court for the violation of any of the provisions of this ordinance, shall work an immediate revocation of the license of such person; and for any further exercise of the privilege granted by such license he shall be punished as one retailing without license." Evidently it was not necessary, under an indictment in the state court or the summons in the recorder's court, for a judgment of forfeiture of the municipal license to be declared. There was no provision of law for any such declaration. But, upon a judgment of conviction, the law itself provided for the forfeiture. In delivering the opinion, Mr. Justice Simmons said (87 Ga. 124): "And we think they can also impose a condition that, upon his conviction of a violation of a state law or of a city ordinance regulating the sale of liquors, his license shall be ipso facto revoked." In Cassidy v. Macon, 133 Ga. 689, 66 S. E. 941, the ordinance involved provided that the conviction of the holder of a "near beer" license of a violation of the municipal ordinance prohibiting the having or keeping of intoxicating liquors in the city for the purpose of illegal sale should work an immediate cancellation, revocation, and forfeiture of such license. There was no provision in the ordinance requiring the recorder to declare a forfeiture, and it appears from the record on file that the judgment of the recorder did not contain any such declaration. A resolution was introduced before the municipal council to declare a revocation and cancellation of the license, and the person to whom it had been granted filed an equitable petition to enjoin the municipality from interfering with his business. If it had been necessary to have a judgment of forfeiture, the introduction before the municipal council of an ex parte resolution would not have answered. This court gave it no effect in considering the case, but upheld the ordinance providing for a revocation or forfeiture ipso facto upon conviction. The difference in views of some of the judges who presided in that case will be mentioned later.

There are other laws providing for certain disqualifications besides those in regard to the sale of liquor or "near beer." The Constitution declares that "no person who, after the adoption of this Constitution, being a resident of this state, shall have been convicted of fighting a duel in this state, or convicted of sending or accepting a challenge, or convicted of aiding or abetting such duel, shall hold office in this state, unless he shall have been pardoned; and every such person shall also be subject to such punishment as may be prescribed by law." Civil Code 1910, § 6407. Here is a provision for the imposition of the ordinary punishment under the penal law, and also for a disqualification arising from a conviction; but it would hardly be contended that the constitutional disqualification would be of no force unless the judge, in pronouncing sentence, saw fit to incorporate in it such a provision. By the Civil Code 1910, § 35, it is declared that certain classes of persons shall not be permitted to vote. One of these classes includes "those who shall have been convicted in any court of competent jurisdiction of treason against the state, of embezzlement of public funds, malfeasance in office, bribery, or larceny, or of any crime involving moral turpitude, punishable by the laws of this state with imprisonment in the penitentiary, unless such person shall have been pardoned." Here is a disqualification resulting by statute from the fact of conviction. But no judge ever thought of including in every sentence pronounced upon a person so convicted that he should be disqualified from voting, nor will it be contended that the disqualification would be inoperative because it was not declared by the judge.

In the statute now under consideration there is no hint of any requirement that either the indictment or accusation or sentence should include any provision in regard to disqualification. Indeed, there is nothing in express terms said about any conviction, but only as to the perpetration of certain acts. But, in view of the expression that under such circumstances the person, "in addition to any penalty which he may otherwise be liable to," shall forfeit his license, and be disqualified from holding another, this court, in Cassidy v. Howard, 140 Ga. 844, 80 S. E. 1, referred to the forfeiture and disqualification as something resulting, in addition to the imposition of the usual penalties, from a conviction. While the expression was used in the opinion that it was an additional penalty to be imposed upon such person if convicted, this did not mean that it must be imposed by the judge, but by the law. To hold otherwise would require this court to construct by implication a new and additional crime, or element of a crime, not contained in the penal statute, and to authorize the introduction, on the trial of one prosecuted under the Penal Code, of a new issue in addition to the one provided by the penal statute itself, and to do this by the construction of a distinct and separate civil statute. This court has no authority to do any such thing. The real point determined in the Cassidy Case was that the statutory provision in regard to abating or enjoining a "blind tiger" did not include the right to declare a forfeiture of the license or a disqualification to hold one.

Without undertaking to give an exact definition of the expression, "under color of the license herein required," it is plain that the conduct of the petitioner for the writ of mandamus, which brought about his conviction, was under color of his license within the meaning of the statute. It was admitted in the agreed statement of facts that the petitioner was, in 1911, engaged in the business of selling a beverage or drink in imitation of or intended as a substitute for beer, under a license granted by the state for that purpose, and that he was convicted in the city court of Macon of unlawfully keeping on hand at his place of business alcoholic, spirituous, malt, and intoxicating liquors; and it was further admitted that this unlawful keeping occurred at the place of business for the operation of which he held a license, and while he was conducting business under such license. His only authority or color of authority for conducting business at that place, so far as the record shows, was by virtue of his "near beer" licenses. While doing such under such license, he violated the statute by virtue of which the license was obtained, did an act which was prohibited by it, and was convicted for that act under a statute which made it penal. To hold that this was not within the terms of the act in regard to the forfeiture of the license and the disqualification to obtain another, on the theory that the act was not done under color of his license, would be simply juggling with words. The petitioner made an affidavit that, while the facts above mentioned were true, he did not keep the liquors at his place of business under color of his license, but in violation of the law. A witness may sometimes aid a court in ascertaining the facts, or may render their ascertainment difficult. But the law cannot be changed by affidavit.

If the law provides a disqualification for one applying for a license of this character, and its terms are applicable to the present plaintiff in error, it follows as a matter of course that he had no right to compel the ordinary to grant to him such a license, and that there was no error in refusing to grant a mandamus absolute to compel that officer to do so.

3. The provision of the act of 1908 (Acts Extra Sess. 1908, p. 1112) which is codified in the Civil Code 1910, § 1769, was attacked as unconstitutional. It was contended that it was violative of the 14th Amendment of the Constitution of the United States, "in that it deprived your relator of the right to earn a livelihood, which is contrary to the Constitution of the United States and the Amendments thereof;" and also that the refusal of the ordinary to issue the license was in violation of article 1, § 3, of the Constitution of the state, which likewise declares that no person shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property, except by due process of law, "in that it deprives your relator of the right to earn a livelihood in a legitimate occupation." The Supreme Court of the United States has expressly declared that the 14th Amendment—broad and comprehensive as it is—was not designed to interfere with the police powers of the states. Barbier v. Connelly, 113 U. S. 27, 28 L. ed. 923, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 357. And the same tribunal (referring to the powers possessed by the states, and those which had been delegated to the Federal government) has said that "all those powers which relate to merely municipal legislation, or what may, perhaps, more properly be called internal police, are not thus surrendered or restrained, and that consequently, in relation to these, the authority of the state is complete, unqualified, and exclusive." New York v. Miln, 11 Pet. 102, 139, 9 L. ed. 648, 662; Black, Intoxicating Liquors, § 27. In Stone v. Mississippi, 101 U. S. 814, 820, 25 L. ed. 1079, 1080, Mr. Chief Justice Waite said: "The contracts which the Constitution protects are those that relate to property rights, not governmental." If the license involved were one to sell spirituous or malt liquors, it would be settled by repeated adjudications that such a license would constitute neither a contract nor a property right in the licensee as against the licensor, but a mere permit to do what would otherwise be an offense against the general law, and that it might be revoked or denied without violating the above-mentioned provision of the Constitution of the United States or that of the state. Ison v. Griffin, 98 Ga. 623, 25 S. E. 611; Plumb v. Christie, 103 Ga. 686, 42 L.R.A. 181, 30 S. E. 759; Black, Intoxicating Liquors, § 34; 1 Woollen & T. Intoxicating Liquors, § 124.

It is contended, however, that the license to sell a beverage, drink, or liquor in imitation of or intended as a substitute for beer, ale, wine, whisky, or alcoholic, spirituous, or malt liquors, for which provision is made in the Civil Code 1910, § 1765, should not be analogized to a license to sell intoxicating liquors, and that traffic in such drinks should not be subject to police regulation like the sale of spirituous or malt liquors, but should rather be classified with the ordinary vocations of life which advance human happiness, or with trade and commerce which do not produce, or have a tendency to produce, immorality, suffering, or loss. But, if one desires to do the business of selling imitations of or substitutes for liquor, he must not be surprised if the law deems it necessary to cast certain safeguards around that business. These drinks have come to be designated by the colloquial term "near beer." In Campbell v. Thomasville, 6 Ga. App. 212, 64 S. E. 815, it was held that "the selling of 'near beer' is a business which, from its very nature, admits of strict regulation under the police power. It stands legitimately in a different class from the business of selling drugs, soda water, and similar liquids. Regulations may be upheld as applied to this occupation which would be arbitrary and unreasonable if there were an attempt to apply them to other businesses." In the opinion Powell, J., said (6 Ga. App. 228): "The very name 'near beer' is as suggestive to the guardian of the police power of a necessity for close oversight, regulation, and control as it is to the drinking classes of possibilities which they may hope to find in the beverage. Its very name, so to speak, is a transcript of its character. A liquor that is 'near beer,' looks like beer, smells like beer, tastes somewhat like beer, capable of cheering, though not of inebriating, well deserves the attention of those whose duty it is to protect the health, peace, and good order of the community. The argument that, since 'near beer' is not an intoxicating liquor, dealers in it should stand on the same footing as dealers in soda water and other similar beverages, well comports with the zeal and partizanship which is to be expected of counsel in the case; but we would stultify ourselves if we did not recognize an essential distinction and a well-marked difference between the two classes." In Cassidy v. Macon, 133 Ga. 689, 66 S. E. 941, this court recognized that the temptations to which persons engaged in selling "near beer" may be subjected to violate the prohibition law, and the peculiar facilities which such a business afforded to unscrupulous persons engaged therein for such violation, with injurious consequences to the peace, good order, and security of the community, furnished a proper basis for police regulation of the business. Mr. Justice Atkinson and the writer of the present opinion dissented in that case. They did not dissent to the view above expressed in regard to what is called "near beer," but to going further and holding that a separate license held by the same person for the sale of "soft drinks," such as soda water and the like, fell within the same category, and that such license could also be revoked, because under his "near beer" license the holder of both violated the law. There may also have been some doubt as to the extent of the charter power there involved. The right to exercise police control over the sale of what is commonly known as "near beer" was also recognized in Manor v. Bainbridge, 136 Ga. 777, 71 S. E. 1101.

While, at the time of the passage of the act of 1908, an extensive change was being made in the method of dealing with the penitentiary convicts, and the obtaining of revenue in connection therewith was an important consideration in the passage of that act, it cannot be denied that it recognized the nature of the business which was being licensed, and made police regulations and restrictions in regard to it. The act has since been codified in the Code of 1910 in §§ 1763 et seq., and that Code has been adopted by the legislature. In it the provision now under consideration appears in § 1769. If there was ever any question as to whether that section might have been objectionable as a part of the original act, 51 L.R.A. (N.S.)

It has now been adopted as a part of the Code. Central of Georgia R. Co. v. State, 104 Ga. 831, 42 L.R.A. 518, 31 S. E. 531. In Carswell v. Wright, 133 Ga. 714, 66 S. E. 905, the provision under consideration, which constituted the 8th section of the act, was not held to be unconstitutional; but it was merely said that, even if it were unconstitutional, that would not destroy the entire act.

It has been said that "the 14th Amendment forbids the states to make or enforce any law which shall 'abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States.' But the right to sell intoxicating liquors is not one of the privileges or immunities here contemplated." Black, Intoxicating Liquors, § 36. And likewise we do not think that the right to sell things in imitation of or intended as a substitute for spirituous or malt liquors, in a state which prohibits the sale of intoxicating liquors, is one of the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States which cannot be dealt with or abridged under the police power of the state.

LOUISIANA SUPREME COURT.

STATE OF LOUISIANA

v.

SAM GEORGE, Appt.

Indictment — sale of liquor — disjunctive — duplicity.

Where an indictment follows the words of a statute, and charges one with illegally selling "spirituous or intoxicating" liquors, the use of the disjunctive "or" does not make the indictment bad for duplicity, as the lawmaking power has the right to make the sale of "spirituous" and "intoxicating" drinks one crime, chargeable in one indictment.

Headnote by BREAUX, Ch. J.

Note. — Indictment: use of disjunctive "or" in charging kind or quality of liquor sold.

General rule.

"An indictment or information must not charge a party disjunctively or alternatively in such manner as to leave it uncertain what is relied on as the accusation against him." 22 Cyc. 296.

It is a general rule that where a statute makes it an offense to do this or that or the APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Judicial District Court for the Parish of Caddo convicting him of unlawfully retailing spirituous or intoxicating liquors without a license. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Stewart & Crane, for appellant:

An indictment or information must not charge a party, disjunctively or alternatively, in such manner as to leave it uncertain what is relied on as to the accusation against him, and it is fatally defective for uncertainty when it alleges an unlawful sale of "spirituous or intoxicating liquor."

State v. Sullivan, 125 La. 560, 51 So. 588; Thompson v. State, 37 Ark. 408; Grantham v. State, 89 Ga. 121, 14 S. E. 892; Smith v. State, 19 Conn. 493; Locke

v. Com. 23 Ky. L. Rep. 740, 63 S. W. 795; Raubold v. Com. 111 Ky. 433, 63 S. W. 781; 2 Bishop, New Crim. Proc. 2d ed. 1913, pp. 463, 464; 23 Cyc. 217, ¶ 93.

Mr. G. A. Gondran, with Messrs. R. G. Pleasant, Attorney General, and W. A. Mabry, for the State:

An indictment or information which charges that accused sold spirituous or intoxicating liquors is not defective for uncertainty by reason of the use of the word "or" instead of the word "and."

Cost v. State, 96 Ala. 60, 11 So. 435; Mitchell v. State, 141 Ala. 90, 37 So. 407; 2 McClain, Crim. Law, § 1273; Thomas v. Com. 90 Va. 92, 17 S. E. 789.

It is not error to charge the offense of selling spirituous liquors, wines, etc., in the other, mentioning several things disjunctively, the whole may be charged conjunctively in a single count, as constituting but a single offense; in which case there can be but one conviction and one punishment, as for one offense. See Clifford v. State; Thompson v. State; and Wong Sing v. Independence, —, infra.

It is not the purpose of this note to deal with the question of the use of the conjunctive form of allegation. Accordingly, cases like State v. Nations, 75 Mo. 53, holding it proper to use the conjunctive when the statute uses the disjunctive, are excluded, as such cases, it would seem, are not necessarily authority for the proposition that the use of the disjunctive would be improper, as a broad view of the cases cited in this note apparently leads to the conclusion that the court might logically hold either form of allegation proper.

As a general rule, the exceptions to which will be stated later, the use of the disjunctive "or" in charging kind or quality of liquor sold is not permissible. This is on the ground that its use renders the indictment uncertain; and on this point the court in Clifford v. State, 29 Wis. 327, said: "And the reason of the rule which condemns this uncertainty of pleading is obvious. The accused is entitled to know certainly with what offense he is charged, and especially is he entitled to have the offense so charged that upon acquittal or conviction he may plead the same in bar of a subsequent prosecution for the same offense, and establish his plea by production of the former record. Upon such rambling, disjunctive, and ambiguous statement, charging that the defendant committed one offense or another, but none with certainty, the record would establish nothing whatever in his favor. If separately so charged, at the choice of the prosecution, the statute under consideration creates several distinct offenses as the vending, dealing in, or giving away with unlawful intent, of any spirituous or ardent liquors or drinks, or the vending, dealing in, or giving away with like intent, of any intoxicating liquors or drinks; and should the defendant in a case like the present be subsequently complained against for the commission of any one of these six several offenses, stated by itself, or of all of them, each being separately stated in different courts or complaints, or the whole alleged conjunctively, and any one or all of them should be the identical offense or offenses of which he was formerly convicted, it would, nevertheless, be impossible for him to protect himself by pleading and producing the first record. It is not so, however, where the several acts specified in the statute are charged conjunctively, or the word 'and' instead of 'or' is used; for, in that case, all are regarded as constituting but one offense, and the conviction or acquittal is a complete bar to any subsequent prosecution for all or either, whether separately or otherwise pleaded and alleged."

So, a complaint or indictment alleging an unlawful sale of "spirituous or intoxicating liquor" was bad for uncertainty, even after a plea of nolo contendere. Com. v. Grey, 2 Gray, 501, 61 Am. Dec. 476.

And a complaint charging in the alternative that defendant sold "wines, spirituous liquor, or other intoxicating beverage," was bad for like reason, the terms "wines," "spirituous liquor," and "other intoxicating beverage," not being of the same import. Smith v. State, 19 Conn. 493. The court thought that rule followed by them in this case might savor of unnecessary exactness, and excite the regret of those laboring to suppress intemperance, but considered that if they should, "in this comparatively unimportant case," break in upon established principles, such innovation might carry them far afield in administering criminal law.

And the same was true of a complaint charging defendant with "selling, or suffering to be sold, ale, wine, rum, or other strong or malt liquors, or mixed liquors a part of which was ale, rum, wine, or other strong or malt liquor." State v. Colwell, 3 R. I. 284.

So, too, an information for selling "beer or ale" was bad. Rex v. North, 6 Dowl. & R. 143, 28 Revised Rep. 538.

And likewise with a charge that defend-disjunctive instead of the conjunctive, by using the word "or" in lieu of "and" in describing the various kinds of liquors and drinks charged to have been sold in the indictment.

Cunningham v. State, 5 W. Va. 508; Morgan v. Com. 7 Gratt. 592.

Breaux, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

An information was filed against the accused, in which he is charged with having unlawfully retailed spirituous or intoxicating liquors without previously obtaining a license. Defendant filed a motion to quash, in which he alleged that the information was defective for uncertainty and duplicity, as it contained an alternative ant sold "whisky or brandy." Thompson v. State, 37 Ark. 408.

And an indictment which charged disjunctively that the accused sold a quantity of "spirituous, malt, or intoxicating liquor" was bad on special demurrer. Grantham v. State, 89 Ga. 121, 14 S. E. 892.

But the use of the disjunctive "or" in charging the unlawful selling of different kinds of intoxicating liquors was held proper in Morgan v. Com. 7 Gratt. 592; Thomas v. Com. 90 Va. 92, 17 S. E. 788; Cunningham v. State, 5 W. Va. 508. In Morgan's Case, the indictment was for unlawfully selling "rum, wine, brandy, or other spirituous liquors," while in the Thomas Case, it was for a like selling of "intoxicating liquors, wine, ardent spirits, spirituous or malt liquors, or mixtures thereof." The latter case rests upon the former, which contains no opinion by the appellate court, so that it is difficult to say wherein these cases are distinguishable from other cases cited in this note to the contrary, if, indeed, they are distinguishable at all.

The Cunningham Case also follows Morgan's Case.

In Lewis v. Com. 90 Va. 843, 20 S. E. 777, the indictment charged defendant with selling "wine, ardent spirits, malt liquors, or a mixture thereof," but no objection was raised to the sufficiency of the charge, and the question was not discussed by the court. No attempt, however, has been made to gather all the cases of this kind, where the point is assumed without discussion.

A complaint charging a sale of beer, "a fermented or malt liquor," is not bad for duplicity. State v. Nerbovig, 33 Minn. 480, 24 N. W. 321.

And an indictment substantially in the language of a statute regulating the sale and giving away of spirituous, vinous, or malt liquors was sustained in Mays v. Com. 3 Ky. L. Rep. 250 (abstract).

—synonymous words.

An important exception to the general rule against the use of the disjunctive is where the word "or" in a statute is used description of liquor. The court overruled the motion for reasons averred in the bill of particulars. A bill of objection was taken to the court's ruling. The alternative description of liquor is the ground upon which defendant rests his defense. The failure to charge the acts cumulatively, the contention is, renders the indictment defective.

There are decisions in other jurisdictions pertinent to the question of an alternative description of liquor; they are cited and commented upon by learned counsel for the accused, and, in a measure, sustain the contention. Under different laws and precedents it may well be that the conclusion is entirely proper. Even with us, it mig^t be in the sense of "to wit," that is, explaining what precedes, and making it signify the same thing. When this is the case, an indictment or complaint adopting the language of the statute is well framed. So it may be stated as a well-established rule that the use of the disjunctive "or" to connect synonymous words relating to the kind or quality of liquor sold does not render an indictment defective. Com. v. Grey, supra; Clifford v. State, 29 Wis. 327; State v. Boncher, 59 Wis. 477, 18 N. W. 335; Wong Sing v. Independence, infra; Figueroa v. State, — Tex. Crim. Rep. —, 159 S. W. 1188.

So, "malt liquor" and "beer" being in effect synonymous under statute, a complaint averring that defendant sold "malt liquor or beer" was not bad. Figueroa v. State, supra.

And the use of "or" in an indictment charging the sale of "intoxicating or malt liquors," to explain the kind of intoxicating liquors sold, to wit, malt as distinguished from ardent or spirituous liquors, is permissible. State v. Boncher, 59 Wis. 477, 18 N. W. 335.

But "spirituous" and "intoxicating" are not synonymous, and a charge in the disjunctive, that defendant sold "spirituous or intoxicating liquors," is uncertain. Clifford v. State, 29 Wis. 327.

If, however, the words "intoxicating" and "spirituous" should be used synonymously, a charge in the disjunctive would be good. But in Com. v. Grey, supra, the court distinguished between the two terms, saying: "All spirituous liquor is intoxicating; yet all intoxicating liquor is not spirituous. In common parlance, spirituous liquor means distilled liquor. . . . Fermented liquor, though intoxicating, is not spirituous."

And an information charging an unlawful sale of "spirituous and malt liquors, or spirituous or malt liquors," is bad for uncertainty and duplicity. Wong Sing v. Independence, 47 Or. 231, 83 Pac. 387. The court said: "There is a marked distinction between spirituous and malt liquors. The former is obtained by distillation, the latter by fermenting an infusion of malt.

different if this were the first time that the question is before this court for decision.

At the outset, before taking up the view taken in our jurisprudence, we will state that, according to some of the lexicographers, the difference in meaning between intoxicating and spirituous is slight. The latter is defined as containing intoxicating beverage as well as the former. It may not be quite as expressive as "intoxicants;" it none the less indicates in one sense a drink which, by excessive use, will intoxicate.

We take up for discussion, first, the function of "or" between the alleged two alternatives of the charge. "Or," referring to the words following it, does not connect a substitute to the phrase preceding, requiring that the one or the other should be used, but not both parts of the sentence as used in this instance. It is here used as a conjunction; it makes two words co-ordinate one to the other as equivalents.

In the concrete, one is generally considered as effective as the other in the popular language of those who indulge in strong drinks. It is the popular sense of the words. Words of a law are generally to be understood in their general and popular sense. Civ. Code 14, "General and Popular Use." Civ. Code 1946.

In one of the notes to Sedgw. Stat. & Const. Law, 2d ed. p. 371, these words are convertible in meaning in a criminal statute. Others have taken a different view. The only purpose is to state that the interpretation is different in this state, and that the view is sustained by precedent. Thus, it has been held, where "or" is used as expressive of the whole meaning of the act charged, and not as expressive of an entirely different meaning, the information is not bad. Thus, charging that the defendant forged a check or bill of exchange, both meaning the same thing, and the latter intended as explaining, is not bad for duplicity. State v. Maas, 37 La. Ann. 292; Brown v. Com. 8 Mass. 59; 1 Bishop, Crim. Proc. old ed. § 590.

Bishop (1913 ed.) is cited by learned counsel as sustaining their view. In some respects it expresses a different view in the last edition of his work; it does not take from the force of the decisions and from the earlier decisions in which reference is made from the text of Bishop. The fore-

The qualifying words 'spirituous' and 'malt' are therefore not synonymous terms, and the employment of either cannot be understood as implying the use of the other, so as to permit the disjunctive 'or,' as used in the phrase 'spirituous or malt liquors' set out in the complaint, to be construed as 'to wit,' such as spirituous liquor or whisky, malt liquor or beer, vinous liquor or wine, etc. The specific charge that Wong Sing sold 'spirituous and malt liquors,' assuming that these kind of beverages were blended so as to be embraced in a single transaction, is rendered uncertain by the subsequent statement in the complaint that he sold either 'spirituous or malt liquors'. . . . The pleading in the case at bar violates the provisions of the statute, which requires that the accusation must be direct and certain as to the crime charged, . . . and that it must charge but one crime, and in one form only."

"Ale," "beer," and "wine" are not synonymous, and a charge in the disjunctive, of the selling of such liquors, is uncertain. Clifford v. State, supra.

State v. Wilson, — La. —, 63 So. 868, rests upon the opinion in STATE v. GEORGE.

—negative averments.

It would seem that in pleading a negative averment in a criminal complaint, the connective "or" is properly used. See State v. Carver, 12 R. I. 235, a case not otherwise in point in this note.

Unnecessary or immaterial averments.

It would seem that the use of the dis-

junctive "or" in an indictment, to connect superfluous matter as to the kind or quality of liquor sold with that which precedes, will not vitiate the indictment. That which is immaterial may be rejected as surplusage. No cases have been found on this phase of the question that are in point in this note, but see Joyce on Intoxicating Liquors, p. 693, and Joyce on Indictments, § 260. See also cases under "Synonymous words."

—effect of statute authorizing alternative averments.

Where statutes have been enacted, expressly or in effect, authorizing alternative or disjunctive allegations in certain cases, indictments in the statutory form are sufficient. So, in the following cases, indictments alleging that defendant sold "spirituous, vinous, or malt liquors" were good: Cost v. State, 96 Ala. 60, 11 So. 435; Mitchell v. State, 141 Ala. 90, 37 So. 407; Brantley v. State, 91 Ala. 47, 8 So. 816; Smith v. Warrior, 99 Ala. 481, 12 So. 418; Powell v. State, 69 Ala. 10.

It is the rule, however, in such cases, that each alternative must charge an indictable offense, or the indictment is bad in toto. Raisler v. State, 55 Ala. 64; Allred v. State, 89 Ala. 112, 8 So. 56; Couch v. State, 6 Ala. App. 43, 60 So. 530.

Thus, in Allred v. State, 89 Ala. 112, 8 So. 56, the indictment charged defendant with selling "spirituous, vinous, or malt liquors, or intoxicating bitters," where selling "intoxicating bitters" was not an offense against the law, so the indictment was bad as a whole under the above rule.

going is the contemporaneous and long-continued interpretation. It is almost trite to quote the Latin maxim, Contemporanea expositio est fortissima in lege.

In other jurisdictions it has been held directly that the word "or" for "and" is not fatal for uncertainty. Thomas v. Com. 90 Va. 92, 17 S. E. 789; Mitchell v. State, 141 Ala. 90, 37 So. 407; Cost v. State, 96 Ala. 60, 11 So. 435; 2 McClain, Crim. Law, § 1273. Again we quote: "It is not error to charge the offense of selling spirituous liquors in the disjunctive instead of the conjunctive, by using the word 'or' in lieu of 'and' in describing the various kinds of liquors and drinks charged to have been sold in the indictment." Cunningham v. State, 5 W. Va. 508. The defense was not embarrassed by uncertainty. Joyce, Indictments, § 259; State v. Van Doran, 109 N. C. 864, 14 S. E. 32. Moreover, the information is written in the words of the statute; it furnishes every information necessary for the defense. It is sufficient to follow the words of the statute. There are several decisions in which that view is expressed. State v. Benjamin, 7 La. Ann. 47.

In conclusion, the lawmaking power has the authority to make the sale of intoxicating and spirituous drinks one crime, chargeable in one count. This it has done, and it devolves upon us to interpret the statute as written.

For reasons stated, the sentence and judgment are affirmed.

HUGH R. SCOTT et al., Appts.

vertence and forgetfulness to pay the taxes on his property for the last half of the year 1901. The property was sold for this unpaid tax in 1903, the time for redemption expired, and in an action to determine adverse claims it was adjudged that the certificate holder was the owner of the land free from any claim of defendant, the present plaintiff. The county auditor did not, at any time after such tax sale, place on the tax list furnished the county treasurer the words "Sold for taxes" opposite the description of plaintiff's land, nor did the county treasurer write or stamp said words on the receipts for taxes paid by plaintiff after such sale and before the time to redeem expired. Had the words "Sold for taxes" been written or stamped on such receipts, plaintiff would have redeemed from such sale. Plaintiff had no notice of such sale, or of the action to determine adverse claims, until after the judgment therein was entered. The complaint alleges in substance the foregoing facts, and demands of defendants, the county auditor and treasurer, judgment for the value of the property. It is held:

The facts pleaded show a failure by the county auditor to perform a duty imposed upon him by Rev. Laws 1905, § 875.

Officer — neglect of duty — liability.

2. A public officer is liable for the failure or neglect to perform a duty imposed upon him by statute, when such a duty is a ministerial one, when the person injured is one to whom performance was due, and when the failure to perform is the proximate cause of the injury sustained. The duty imposed by Rev. Laws 1905, § 875, on the auditor, and the duty imposed by Rev. Laws 1905, § 881, on the treasurer, are ministerial duties, and plaintiff was one to whom performance of such duties was due.

Proximate cause — tax sale — officer's negligence.

3. Though plaintiff was negligent originally in failing to pay the tax, the failure of the auditor to place the words "Sold for taxes" on the list furnished the treasurer was the proximate cause of plaintiff's loss. Assuming that the treasurer failed to perform a duty imposed on him by statute, such failure was a proximate cause of plaintiff's loss.

write or stamp the words "Sold for taxes" on the tax receipts furnished plaintiff, failed to perform a statutory duty, if the lists furnished him by the auditor did not show the land had been "Sold for taxes," is not decided.

Pleading — sufficiency of complaint.

5. The complaint states a cause of action, at least as against the defendant auditor, and the joint demurrer of both defendants was properly overruled.

(October 10, 1913.)

APPEAL by defendants from an order of the District Court for Hennepin County overruling their joint demurrer to the complaint in an action brought to recover damages for loss of title to plaintiff's property, alleged to have been caused by defendants' negligent failure to notify plaintiff of the sale of the property for taxes. Affirmed. The facts are stated in the opinion. Mr. R. S. Wiggin, for appellants: Plaintiff himself was guilty of contributory negligence in failing to pay his taxes, knowing, as he did, that the second half had not been paid, and this contributory negligence was the proximate cause of his loss. Breisch v. Coxe, 81 Pa. 346; Mechem, Pub. Off. 680; Lick v. Madden, 36 Cal. 208, 95 Am. Dec. 175; Grove Dist. Twp. v. Bowman, 55 Iowa, 129, 7 N. W. 492; Boardman v. Hayne, 29 Iowa, 339; Easton v. officer's civil liability to an individual who has suffered either in person or property by reason of the officer's nonfeasance, misfeasance, or malfeasance, the courts have consistently endeavored to apply the general principles that have always been applied to public officers in general. In order to do so they have been obliged to consider the nature and character of the act or omission of which complaint is made, and determine whether the officer was obliged to act in a capacity judicial, quasi judicial, or merely ministerial. By reference to note to Austin v. Vrooman, 14 L.R.A. 138, and Thompson v. Jackson, 27 L.R.A. 92, it will be seen that, as to the liability of judicial officers performing duties of a judicial nature within the scope of their authority, the general rule of nonliability is clear and unquestioned, but that the question of jurisdiction is a troublesome one in applying the rule. The same difficulty appears in an aggravated form when the rule is to be applied to taxing officers, who are classed as quasi judicial, ministerial, executive, and in one or two cases as legislative officers. The liability of officers illustrative of these different classes has been considered in several notes. See Index to L.R.A. Notes, title, "Officers," §§ 38-42.

The question as to the right of the purchaser at an invalid tax sale, in the absence of statute, to be reimbursed by the taxing authority for the purchase price, or for taxes subsequently paid by him, was considered in the note to Lissou v. Natchitoches Parish, 31 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1141, and the same question with reference to the failure of the purchaser's title on account of irregularity in the procedure was considered in the note to Foster v. Malberg, 41 L.R.A.(N.S.) 967.

Cases in which the question raised by this note has been passed upon involve either assessing officers or collecting officers within the broad meaning of those terms. The assessing officers are usually classed as quasi judicial, and the collecting officers (sheriffs, treasurers, or other officers when acting as collectors of taxes are included) are usually treated the same as officers executing a mandate or process issued by a court. There are some cases like Howley v. Scott, where purely ministerial duties are involved, that might not be capable of classification either as assessing or collecting officers were those terms used in their strictest sense; hence, those terms are here used in the broader sense, so as to include such cases.

II. Assessing officers.

a. General rule.

Since the assessment of taxes is a quasi judicial act, those who are charged with the duty of making the assessment are not liable at common law for mere errors or mistakes of judgment to private persons injured, even though the assessment is excessive, if the assessment is within their jurisdiction. This rule has been applied:

—where the averment was that the assessor "wilfully and against law" assessed plaintiff's property at too large a sum, since such language does not imply that he acted maliciously, or with intent to wrong or injure the owner. Ballerino v. Mason, 83 Cal. 447, 23 Pac. 530.

—even though the taxpayer had furnished the assessor with a sworn statement of the amount of his taxable property, if the assessor, believing the statement to be erroneous, and that the taxpayer owned property not included therein, had assessed him with a higher valuation, or included more property in the assessment than was listed in the statement. Parkinson v. Parker, 48 Iowa, 667.

—where the county treasurer is by law charged with the duty of assessing omitted property, and he had assessed property after having decided that it was omitted, even though, as a matter of fact, the property assessed had not been omitted, and the owner thereof, after having paid the taxes, brought his action against the county treasurer, alleging that he acted in the matter unlawfully, wilfully, maliciously, oppressively, and tortiously. Stevens v. Carroll, 130 Iowa, 463, 104 N. W. 433. See cases cited 127, 138 Am. St. Rep. 779, 121 N. W. 616, 20 Ann. Cas. 424; Menasha Wooden Ware Co. v. Harmon, 128 Wis. 177, 107 N. W. 299; State v. Ruth, 9 S. D. 84, 68 N. W. 189.

Mr. John F. Byers, for respondent:

Failure to notify plaintiff of his danger of losing his land was the result of a failure of both defendants to perform a statutory duty. Scott's failure was not the sole, but was a strong, factor in the result.

Teal v. American Min. Co. 84 Minn. 320, 87 N. W. 837.

The liability of officers for violation of a statutory ministerial duty is beyond question.

Henly v. Lyme Regis, 5 Bing. 107, 6 L. J. C. P. 222, 30 Revised Rep. 542; Amy v.

infra, II. b, on question of corrupt or malicious motives.

—where there should have been an allowance of $1,500 in the valuation as property exempt under the statute, and the record did not disclose the fact that such an allowance had been made, it being alleged that the excessive valuation was made by the assessors wilfully, maliciously, and corruptly. Weaver v. Devendorf, 3 Denio, 117. See cases cited infra, II. b, as to effect of corrupt motive.

—even where the statute makes it the duty of the assessor to call upon each taxpayer in the county in person, or by deputy, and to obtain from him a correct list and valuation of all his taxable property, and the assessor had not done so. Daugherty v. Bazell, 123 Ky. 424, 96 S. W. 576, 13 Ann. Cas. 677.

—under a statute which makes it the duty of the selectmen to assess a poll tax upon each inhabitant of the district, and provides that the tax warrant issued upon such adjustment shall be valid unless the taxable shall appear before the selectmen and tender to them an oath in writing, sworn and subscribed before some magistrate, that he had taken up a residence elsewhere, even though it should appear later that they had assessed a nonresident of the district. Smith v. Bradley, 20 N. H. 117. As to jurisdiction to decide the question of residence, generally, see cases cited infra, II. c.

—where the land had been assessed to a nonresident owner instead of to the occupant, as the statute directed, but plaintiff by agent had encouraged the mistake, so as to be estopped from raising the point upon suit by him for trespass against the assessors. Hilton v. Fonda, 86 N. Y. 339.

—where it was alleged that the election of the collector to whom they gave the warrant was illegal; that the assessment was irregular, and that the invoice or tax duplicate furnished to the collector was not sworn to by the assessor. Odiorne v. Rand, 59 N. H. 504.

The Supervisors (Amy v. Barkholder) 11 Wall. 136, 20 L. ed. 101; State v. Ruth, 9 S. D. 84, 68 N. W. 189; Anderson v. Settergren, 100 Minn. 294, 111 N. W. 279.

The neglect of plaintiff to pay his taxes in 1902 was not concurrent with the negligence of defendants nor subsequent thereto, but was so long and so far antecedent as to be in any view of the case too remote to be considered as a contributing cause of the injury.

Shearm. & Redf. Neg. 6th ed. §§ 99, 100.

Bunn, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an appeal by defendants from an order overruling their joint demurrer to the complaint. The facts alleged in the irregularities, or illegalities in the assessment. Edes v. Boardman, 58 N. H. 580; Odiorne v. Rand, 59 N. H. 504; McDaniel v. Tebbetts, 60 N. H. 497; Barton v. Shaw, 63 N. H. 122.

—where the selectmen, acting as assessors, doomed to quadruple valuation the plaintiff's property upon her refusal to turn in a list of her taxable property, and it was alleged that they acted illegally. Fawcett v. Dole, 67 N. H. 168, 29 Atl. 693.

—where the taxpayer fails to return to the assessors a list of his taxable property, as he is required to do by statute, and they make the assessment, adding the penalty prescribed by statute, so long as they have any reliable information as to the amount of the property upon which they assess the taxpayer. Taylor v. Moore, 63 Vt. 60, 21 Atl. 919.

—where the assessors were compelled to decide whether or not the property was exempted from taxation by a statute. Barlyte v. Shepherd, 35 N. Y. 238. See cases cited infra as to conflict among the decisions as to whether or not the principle is applicable to the particular fact here stated.

—where the assessors had assessed bank accounts at par value instead of market value. Williams v. Weaver, 75 N. Y. 30.

—even though but two out of three members of the board signed the warrant. Thomas v. Clapp, 20 Barb. 165.

—even though the assessors illegally added 5 per cent additional to the entire amount of the list, to pay the tax collector, while he was entitled to only part thereof, and did not include all the taxable inhabitants upon the tax list. Easton v. Calendar, 11 Wend. 90.

—where plaintiff had some dogs in his possession which he had sold at the time of the assessment, of which fact he had informed the assessor, and later had notified the assessor that the dogs had been delivered to the purchaser, and were not in taxable's possession, but the assessor placed them upon the tax list as belonging to him. Hopkins v. Leach, 125 App. Div. 294, 109 N. Y. Supp. 713.

Defendant Scott was the auditor of Hennepin county from January 1, 1901, to December 31, 1910. Defendant Hanke was the treasurer of the county from December 20, 1904, to the time the action was commenced. Plaintiff, since 1889, has resided in the state of Washington, and has owned a lot in Minneapolis until divested of his title as hereinafter set forth. From 1893 to 1908 it was the custom of plaintiff to write to the treasurer of Hennepin county each year for a statement of the taxes on said lot for the preceding year, to receive such a statement, to forward the money to pay such taxes, and to receive a receipt for such payment. In the year 1902 plaintiff received from the treasurer a statement showing one half of the taxes for 1901, instead of the whole tax, as had heretofore been the custom. He paid this half tax, but "through mistake and oversight failed to pay the other half thereof, and thereafter wholly forgot about said tax." In May, 1903, the land was sold at a tax sale for the unpaid 1901 tax, and was "bid in by the state." There being no redemption from this sale, the land was sold in 1906 at the forfeited sale to Hicks & Company for the sum of $16.31. Thereafter Hicks & Company caused notice of expiration of redemption to be served by publication, and after the time for redemption expired brought an action against plaintiff. The summons was served by publication, and judgment by

—where plaintiff was assessed on the ground that he harbored a dog within the meaning of a statute making anyone who harbors a dog liable to taxation thereon, and it was alleged that the assessors erred in deciding that question. Robinson v. Rowland, 26 Hun, 501.

—where the selectmen, acting as assessors, had illegally refused to take the taxable's disclosure of the amount of his taxable property, and assessed him according to their own judgment, it appearing that he had later waived the right to make the disclosure by making an appointment with them as to time and place of making the same under oath, and had failed to keep his appointment. Cooley v. Aiken, 15 Vt. 322.

—where the listers of property for taxing purposes had made the assessment, and after hearing the taxable had refused to change the same, and filed the same with the clerk of the court, an appeal from their decision to the selectmen of the town had been taken by the taxable, and during the pendency of the appeal the majority of the listers had gone to the clerk's office and marked the particular assessments vacated, the selectmen were not liable to the taxable for treating the illegal vacation of the assessment as void, and restoring the assessment to its original form without notice to the taxable. Fuller v. Gould, 20 Vt. 643.

—where land was assessed that had been sold by the taxable and possession given to the purchaser, the assessor simply depending upon the last five-year assessment, supplemented by a list of transfers of real estate furnished by the county clerk. Wilson v. Marsh, 34 Vt. 352.

And in Macklot v. Davenport, 17 Iowa, 379, there are statements made by way of argument which support this proposition.

An assessor who omits taxable property from the assessment list, through mistake or error of judgment, is not liable in damages to a taxpayer who has been assessed at a higher rate because of such omission. Dillingham v. Snow, 5 Mass. 547.

An assessor who refuses to assess a small piece of swamp land to a nonresident of the 51 L.R.A. (N.S.)

township who claims to own the same under an unrecorded contract to buy, believing that the claim of ownership is not bona fide, is not liable to the alleged owner on the ground that the refusal prevented the owner from having the free use of a toll bridge, the taxpayers of the township in which the land was located being exempt from payment of tolls, since the act required the exercise of the quasi judicial function of the office. Meade v. Haines, 81 Mich. 261, 45 N. W. 836.

In Muscatine Western R. Co. v. Horton, 38 Iowa, 33, it was held that the trustees of a municipality, whose duty it was under the law to issue a tax certificate as evidence of a tax upon its inhabitants, to be given as a gratuity to a railroad company under a contract to build its road through agreed points, the tax having been voted by the electors, were not liable to the railroad company for damages arising out of their refusal to issue the certificate, where they, acting in good faith, had refused the certificate, believing the statute to be unconstitutional, and that the railroad company had not complied with its part of the contract, although they were mistaken on both points.

In Com. v. Kennedy, 118 Ky. 618, 82 S. W. 237, 4 Ann. Cas. 940, where the taxes were levied by a fiscal court composed of the magistrates of the county, it was held that the individual members of the court or board were not liable for an erroneous assessment which resulted in injury to the plaintiff, for the reason that the act of levying the assessment was a quasi legislative act, thus sustaining the principle above stated on a different ground. The court said: "The magistrates of a county, when assembled as a fiscal court, do not act as conservators of the peace, or in the performance of any judicial function appertaining to the office of justice of the peace. They are by statute ex officio members of the fiscal court, the duties there performed by them are statutory, extra duties, quasi legislative in character, and not such as are required of them as judicial officers; therefore, for error or mistake in the perform-default entered, adjudging that Hicks & Company was the owner in fee of the land as against any claim of plaintiff. This judgment was entered and docketed in December, 1907. The value of the land at this date was $500. Plaintiff never had any notice of the delinquency of the taxes, of either of the tax sales, of the action, or of the rendition of judgment therein, until October, 1908.

Defendant Scott, who had, as auditor, made the tax sales before mentioned, did not at any time during any of the years following place opposite the description of the property upon the tax lists he was required by law to make out and deliver to the treasurer the words "Sold for taxes," as he was required to do by Rev. Laws 1905, § 875.

ance of these legislative duties, they nor the sureties in their official bonds are liable in an action for damages."

In a proceeding to determine the constitutionality of a statute giving the right of appeal from the board of assessors as constituted by the statute direct to the supreme court of the state, it was held in State v. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. 6 Kan. 500, 7 Am. Rep. 575, that the power to assess property is a legislative power, and not in any sense judicial. This case is not within the scope of this note, but it gives some support to the theory of the court in Com. v. Kenneday, supra.

b. As affected by motive.

An exception to the above-stated rule is recognized and applied by the great weight of authority. The exception is that if the assessor, although performing a quasi judicial act within his authority, makes an unlawful or excessive assessment maliciously or corruptly, he is liable to the individual injured thereby. The exception has been supported:

—where the assessor unlawfully changed plaintiff's valuation by increasing it after the list of assessments had been filed in the county clerk's office. Bristol Mfg. Co. v. Gridley, 27 Conn. 221, 71 Am. Dec. 56. And it was here held that plaintiff need not show actual malice, but that legal malice would be inferred from the commission of the illegal act. Second appeal in 28 Conn. 201.

—even though the taxpayer had failed to appear before the board of equalization to have the valuation of his property reduced after it had been assessed excessively by the assessor. Parkinson v. Parker, 48 Iowa, 657.

—where they knowingly and maliciously increased the acreage assessed to the taxpayer over and above that which is contained in his sworn statement. Stearns v. Miller, 25 Vt. 20.

—where they wilfully and knowingly set in the taxable list land that had been sold 51 L.R.A. (N.S.)

The payments of taxes for the years 1904, 1905, 1906, and 1907 were made by plaintiff to defendant Hanke as treasurer upon statements of such taxes made by said defendant, and plaintiff received a number of receipts from said defendant. Said defendant did not place or cause to be placed upon said tax statements or upon any of said tax receipts so issued by him to plaintiff, the words "Sold for taxes," as by Rev. Laws 1905, § 881, he is required to do.

If defendants had not failed and neglected to do and perform their said statutory duties, and plaintiff had been informed by them in the manner required by said statutes or in any manner, plaintiff could and would have paid the said taxes for which said land was so sold, and could and would by the taxable and possession given to the purchaser. Wilson v. Marsh, 34 Vt. 352.

And see Ballerino v. Mason, 83 Cal. 447, 23 Pac. 530, where the holding implies that the assessor would be liable if he acted maliciously or with intent to injure the owner of the assessed property.

In Clinton School Dist.'s Appeal, 56 Pa. 316, which was a petition to enjoin the collection of a tax, the court said: "If, in the exercise of an honest judgment upon the claim, the exemption was refused, a court of equity could not revise the judgment of the board by injunction. If, on the other hand, exemption was wantonly and maliciously refused, they had their remedy against the directors personally."

But, contrary to this, a few courts have held that the motive of the assessor in making an excessive assessment is immaterial; that is, because of the quasi judicial nature of the duty, the assessor is protected against suit by individuals not only for errors and mistakes of judgment, but for excessive assessments made from wilful, malicious, and corrupt motives. Stewart v. Case, 53 Minn. 62, 39 Am. St. Rep. 575, 54 N. W. 938; Weaver v. Devendorf, 3 Denio, 117; Steele v. Dunham, 26 Wis. 393.

Since fixing valuations of property by assessors is a judicial act, a taxpayer who is injured by the undervaluation of the neighboring property, due to wilful, malicious, and corrupt motives of the assessors, cannot maintain an action of trespass against them. Youmans v. Simmons, 7 Hun, 466.

c. As dependent upon jurisdiction.

It is a general rule that an officer, not a judge of a higher court, is liable for acts in excess of his jurisdiction. 29 Cyc. 1441.

So, if the assessors of taxes have no jurisdiction to make the assessment of which complaint is made, they are personally liable to the party injured.

Conn.—Thames Mfg. Co. v. Lathrop, 7 Conn. 550.

have redeemed it at the aforesaid tax sale. By the neglect and failure of said defendants to perform their said official duties plaintiff has been damaged in the sum of $500. Judgment is asked for said sum, with interest from December 19, 1907.

1. The facts pleaded, if true, show that the auditor, if not the treasurer, failed to perform a duty imposed upon him by statute. Rev. Laws, 1905, § 875, provides that the auditor shall make out the tax lists to correspond with the assessment books in reference to ownership and description of property, and that "opposite each description which has been sold for taxes, and which is subject to redemption, and not redeemed, shall be placed the words 'Sold for taxes.'" By § 878, the auditor is required to deliver these lists to the county treasurer on or before the first Monday in January in each year. These lists constitute the authority for the treasurer to receive and collect the taxes therein levied.

By § 881, the treasurer, upon the payment of any tax, is required to give to the person paying a receipt therefor. It is provided that "if land has been sold for taxes either to a purchaser or to the state, and the time for redemption from such sale has not expired, the receipt for such taxes shall have written or stamped across the face, 'Sold for taxes.'"

These provisions can have no other object than to give the property owner, who had failed or neglected for any reason to pay his taxes for any year, notice, before the

Where property exempt.

There is some conflict among the New 51 L.R.A. (N.S.)

York decisions as to the applicability of this general principle to a case where the property assessed is by statute especially exempt from taxation. The following cases held that it applied in such cases; hence, that the assessors were personally liable for the result of an assessment of such property: Prosser v. Secor, 5 Barb. 607; Lapolt v. Maltby, 10 Misc. 330, 31 N. Y. Supp. 686. But these cases may be considered as overruled by a great number of later cases, among which are the following: Vail v. Owen, 19 Barb. 22; Bell v. Pierce, 48 Barb. 51, affirmed in 51 N. Y. 12; Foster v. VanWyck, 2 Abb. App. Dec. 167, 41 How. Pr. 493; Brown v. Smith, 24 Barb. 419; Barhyte v. Shepherd, 35 N. Y. 238; Dubois v. Parcels, 118 N. Y. Supp. 615, in all of which cases it was held that the assessing officers were not liable in such case, since the question decided was one within their jurisdiction.

Where the assessing officers have no jurisdiction of either the person or property of the one upon whom they make an assessment, that is, where he resides in another district, they are usually held liable for the result of the assessment, even though deciding the question of residence is a part of their duty, and appears to require the exercise of judgment. Mygatt v. Washburn, 15 N. Y. 316; Dorwin v. Strickland, 57 N. Y. 492; Bailey v. Buell, 59 Barb. 158; Hilton v. Fonda, 86 N. Y. 339; New York Milk Products v. Damon, 57 App. Div. 261, 68 N. Y. Supp. 183, affirmed without opinion in 172 N. Y. 661, 65 N. E. 1119; Wade v. Matheson, 4 Lans. 158; Dorn v. Backer, 61 N. Y. 261; Palmer v. Lawrence, 6 Lans. 282; Suydam v. Keys, 13 Johns. 444; Taylor v. Robertson, 16 Utah, 330, 52 Pac. 1; Henry v. Edson, 2 Vt. 499.

In Fairbanks v. Kittredge, 24 Vt. 9, it was held that listers, whose duty it was to list property for the assessment as well as to make assessments, in determining which of two districts had the right to assess plaintiff's personal property, were acting in right to redeem has been lost, that his property has been sold for such taxes. He may gain his information by an examination of the tax lists, but he is certain to acquire it from the receipt given for the payment of the taxes for any year subsequent to the sale and before the time to redeem expires. This is clearly an important notice to the landowner. He may, through illness, inadvertence, mistake, or even neglect, fail to pay all or some part of a certain year's taxes. As the complaint in the present case alleges, he may forget all about the fact that he had failed to pay. No notice of the delinquency or of the sale reaches him. Though he has not intended to let his property go, as evidenced by his regular payment of subsequent taxes, he loses it unless, before the time to redeem expires, his attention is called to the fact that it had been "Sold for taxes." These statutory provisions, if followed by the auditor and treasurer, tell the delinquent taxpayer that he must redeem from the sale or lose his property. It is highly probable in the case of a nonresident owner that it is the only notice he has.

2. The liability of a public officer for the failure or neglect to perform a duty imposed upon him by statute is clear (1) when such duty is a ministerial one, (2) when the person injured is one to whom performance was due, and (3) when the failure to perform is the proximate cause of the injury sustained. State v. Ruth, 9 S. D. 84, 68 N. W. 189; Amy v. The Super-

a ministerial capacity, and not judicially, hence they were liable to the plaintiff if they listed his property in the wrong district, provided, that he suffered damage from such mistake. In this particular case, however, it was shown that no damage had been suffered by the plaintiff; hence the judgment of the lower court, nonsuiting the plaintiff, was affirmed.

But where the taxpayer was once a resident of the district, and the question was whether or not he had moved out for the purpose of avoiding the payment of any tax in any place, the question is within the jurisdiction of the assessors, and they are protected by the judicial character of the acts they are called upon to perform. Davis v. Strong, 31 Vt. 332.

Where lands should have been assessed to a tenant, but were assessed to the non-resident owner at his own request, the owner is estopped from urging the illegality of the assessment in that particular in an action of trespass brought by him against the assessors to recover the amount of the tax in damages. Pease v. Whitney, 8 Mass. 93.

Lack of notice.

Likewise, there is some difference of opinion among the New York courts as to whether or not the assessing officers acquire jurisdiction so as to be protected where they act without notice to the person taxed, he being affected adversely by their actions, when a statute requires notice to him in such case. Jewell v. Van Steenburgh, 58 N. Y. 85, may be accepted as settling the dispute in favor of the theory that in such case they do not acquire jurisdiction, and are therefore liable in trespass. son injured, unless he has waived the right to notice by appearing before the assessing party and presenting his objection. The court reviews the early decisions in its opinion in the following language: "The court charged the jury that such omission rendered the tax void. The authorities are not entirely in harmony, and the precise question has not been definitely passed upon by this court. In Randall v. Smith, 51 L.R.A. (N.S.)

1 Denio, 214, the defect of notice with other irregularities were treated alike, and it was held that they did not render the trustees liable as trespassers. Jewett, J., in delivering the opinion, comments upon Alexander v. Hoyt, 7 Wend. 89, in which it was held that the trustees were trespassers, because they copied the valuations from an unfinished town roll, upon the ground that this was a ministerial, and not a judicial, act, and cites Easton v. Calendar, 11 Wend. 91, as decisive of the question in favor of the trustees. There the irregularity complained of was in omitting to insert certain persons who were taxable in the roll, and in including the fees of the collector in the warrant; and the court held that, in determining who were taxable inhabitants, the trustees acted judicially and were not liable for an error in the exercise of it. With great respect, I do not think the question in that case was analogous to this, as will be shown hereafter. The general rule applicable to such cases was correctly stated, that when the officer had jurisdiction and errs in the exercise of it, his acts are not void, but voidable. The only difficulty is in determining when jurisdiction has been acquired. I do not find that Randall v. Smith has been regarded as authority, and it is not referred to in the subsequent cases. In Wheeler v. Mills, 40 Barb. 644, it was expressly decided that the omission to give the prescribed notice by assessors invalidated the tax and rendered a title to real estate obtained upon a tax sale void, upon the ground that notice was one of the things to be done by the assessors to obtain jurisdiction over the subject. In Van Rensselaer v. Witbeck, 7 N. Y. 517, which was trespass against the collector, it was decided that a substantial compliance with the terms of the statute, as to making and signing the certificate required to be attached to the assessment roll, was necessary to give the supervisors jurisdiction to impose a tax and issue a warrant for its collection. Gardiner, J., in delivering the opinion, said: "Notice must be given; the taxpayers have a right to be heard and introduce evidence.

visors (Amy v. Barkholder) 11 Wall. 136. 20 L. ed. 101; Anderson v. Settergren, 100 Minn. 294, 111 N. W. 279.

The duties imposed by the statutes on the auditor and treasurer are plainly ministerial. It is equally clear that plaintiff is one to whom performance of the duty was due, as we have already stated. The only doubt is whether the failure to perform this duty was the proximate cause of plaintiff's loss of his land.

3. We must take as true the allegation of the complaint that plaintiff would have redeemed from the tax sale had he learned of it from a receipt stamped "Sold for taxes." After learning in October, 1908, of the sale and the judgment in the action to determine adverse claims, he might have applied successfully to open the judgment and defend; but there is nothing in the complaint to indicate that the tax sale or the notice of expiration was not valid, and we must assume, as against a demurrer, that he would not have succeeded in saving his land, even if he had defended the action. It is undoubtedly true that the neglect or failure of the officer must appear to be the proximate, and not the remote, cause of the loss. Of course, if plaintiff had not forgotten to pay the last half tax for 1901, or if he had remembered later that he had not paid it, the loss would not have occurred. But the statutes, in our opinion, were enacted for the very purpose of protecting taxpayers who forget, or by accident or even negligence fail, to pay their

When this has been done and all objections disposed of, the assessors, or a majority of them, shall sign the roll, and attach the certificate in the form prescribed by § 26. The record is then, and not until then, complete.' The general rule laid down in Westfall v. Preston, 49 N. Y. 349, is confirmatory of the doctrine of all the cases since Randall v. Smith, viz.: 'A substantial compliance with the statute in the measures preliminary to the taxation of persons and property, in all matters which are of the substance of the procedure and designed for the protection of the taxpayer and the preservation of his rights, is a condition precedent to the legality and validity of the tax.' Without further citation of cases, it is quite manifest that the weight of authority is, that the omission to give the notice is a jurisdictional defect. As an original question, it seems to me clear that this must be so. When persons are to be deprived of their property by statutory proceedings, the directions of the statute must be substantially pursued. Sharpe v. Speir, 4 Hill, 76. Trustees of school districts and assessors, in making assessments, must acquire jurisdiction of the person and subject-matter, or their proceedings are void. In performing duties of a judicial nature they are protected, but giving the notice to taxpayers is a ministerial, and not a judicial, act. They have no discretion or judgment to exercise. The mandate is positive, and must be obeyed. Is it jurisdictional in its character? It seems to me clear that it is. This is the only mode by which persons interested have an opportunity to be heard. It is in the nature of process to bring them into court, and it must precede the power of the trustees to act upon the subject. In the first instance, the assessors may exercise their own judgment as to who are taxable persons, and the kind and value of the property to be taxed; but this is preliminary to the final adjudication. Before that can be made, the persons proposed to be taxed are to have a hearing, and it cannot be made until an opportunity for such hearing is afforded. As well might a justice of the peace render judgment against a party, without the service of process. In the case of school trustees, so far as they make an original assessment or change an assessment, they must give the prescribed notice, and if they fail to do it they have no legal right and no jurisdiction to make it. The principle decided in Easton v. Calendar, supra, which was held decisive in Randall v. Smith, was correct. The irregularities in that case were held to relate to judicial acts. They were quite inferior to this defect, and it is unnecessary to criticize the application of the general rule to the facts of that case. Notice to the persons whose assessments were changed was necessary to confer jurisdiction. Without it the assessment against the plaintiff was void; and when there is a want of jurisdiction in imposing the tax, those directing its collection are liable as trespassers. National Bank v. Elmira, 53 N. Y. 49, and cases cited."

d. Statutory protection.

Under a statute which exempted assessors from all responsibility for the assessment of "any tax upon the inhabitants of any city, town, district, parish, or other religious society, when thereto required by the constituted authorities thereof, except only for their own integrity and fidelity," it has been held that assessors are nevertheless liable where they acted beyond their jurisdiction. Thus, the assessors of a religious society are not protected by the statute where their assessment was made upon one who was not at the time a member of the society. Gage v. Currier, 4 Pick. 399; Inglis v. Bosworth, 5 Pick. 498, 16 Am. Dec. 419. They are liable where they were not required by any "city, town, parish, or religious society," or district, within the meaning of the act, to make the assessment which proves to be illegal. They were directed by a school district to make the assessment, and the court held that a school district was not a district within the meaning of the statute. Little v. Merrill, 10 Pick. 543. And they were held liable where a person not a resident of the district was taxes. To hold, because plaintiff was careless in omitting to pay the tax, that his negligence, and not that of defendants, was the proximate cause, would be to defeat the very object of the statutes. The negligence of the defendants was after plaintiff's negligence. Had they performed the duties imposed on them by the statutes, the injury would not have happened. The complaint shows no want of care on the part of plaintiff that was concurrent with or subsequent to defendants' failure to perform their duties. On the plainest principles of the law of proximate cause, it cannot be said that plaintiff's failure to pay the tax, or to remember that he had failed to pay it, was legally the proximate cause of his loss, or a contributing cause. The case is analogous to one where plaintiff by his own negligence gets into a position of danger, and defendant, seeing his peril, fails to use ordinary care to avoid injuring him. The negligence of the defendant, in such a case, is the proximate cause, and plaintiff's negligence does not defeat a recovery. Had the auditor in this case stamped the words "Sold for taxes" on the list furnished the treasurer, and had the latter stamped the same words on the receipts furnished plaintiff, we must presume, taking as true the allegations of the complaint, that plaintiff would have redeemed from the sale. In other words, the loss would not have occurred, had the defendants performed their duty. It was a duty imposed by statute. We hold that the proximate cause of plain-assessed, and the tax collected by distress, even though the assessors acted with perfect good faith. Freeman v. Kenney, 15 Pick. 44.

But it does protect them against the consequences of illegal assessments even though the errors or mistakes were made by themselves, and not by others, so long as they acted in good faith. Ingraham v. Doggett, 5 Pick. 451; Little v. Greenleaf, 7 Mass. 236.

But by reason of this statute, as revised, it has been held that the assessor is protected from a suit for damages by one who had been illegally assessed, he not being an inhabitant of the district. Baker v. Allen, 21 Pick. 382. The court said: "This statute, as construed by the court in the above cases, did not include taxes on school districts, nor protect assessors from their mistakes in assessing individuals who, by their residence or otherwise, were not liable to be assessed, because they were not, within the meaning of the statute, 'required' to assess such persons. But the Revised Statutes, chap. 7, § 44, in the revision of the 5th section of Stat. 1823, chap. 138, have varied the phraseology, and adopted more comprehensive language, so as to include school districts, with other corporations, and so as to protect assessors from liability for accidental errors in taxing those who are not liable to be taxed. It makes them 'responsible only for the want of integrity and fidelity on their own part.' While acting within their appropriate sphere, they have the same protection and immunities which judicial officers have." And this case was cited and followed in Durant v. Eaton, 98 Mass. 469.

But neither the statute referred to, supra, nor the revision involved in Baker v. Allen, supra, will protect assessors where they have assessed property and issued a warrant for the collection of a school district tax, if the school district is not legally established, even though the fact that the tax had been voted by the district was legally certified to them by one as acting clerk for the district. Dickinson v. Billings, 4 Gray, 42; Blankinship v. Hadley, 11 Gray, 51 L.R.A. (N.S.)

431; Bassett v. Porter, 4 Cush. 487; Judd v. Thompson, 125 Mass. 553; Withington v. Eveleth, 7 Pick. 106.

And the assessors are not protected by either statute where they, contrary to statute, carry over from one year an assessment supposed to have remained unpaid to a subsequent assessment for another year, not immediately succeeding the year in which the assessment was made. Eames v. Johnson, 4 Allen, 382.

An early statute in Maine provided "that the assessors of towns, plantations, parishes, and religious societies shall not hereafter be made responsible for the assessment of any tax which they are by law required to assess, but the liability, if any, shall rest solely with said towns, plantations, parishes, and religious societies; and the assessors shall be responsible only for their own personal faithfulness and integrity." Quoted from the court's opinion in Trafton v. Alfred, 15 Me. 260, which was an action of trespass against the corporation. This statute is also referred to as exempting assessors from liability, in School Dist. v. Bailey, 12 Me. 258, which was also an action against the corporation. In the same way and in the same kind of case this statute has been referred to in Stickney v. Bangor, 30 Me. 404, and in Powers v. Sanford, 39 Me. 187. But it has been held that this statute does not protect the assessors from the result of an assessment in case the assessors had no jurisdiction to make the same. Mosher v. Robie, 11 Me. 137; Herriman v. Stowers, 43 Me. 497; Allen v. Archer, 49 Me. 346; Ware v. Percival, 61 Me. 391, 14 Am. Rep. 565. But if they have jurisdiction of the subject-matter, but, acting in good faith, exceed their authority to assess under a statute, they are protected by this statute, it appearing that they were required by law to assess the property. Patterson v. Creighton, 42 Me. 367; Rowe v. Friend, 90 Me. 241, 38 Atl. 95.

Under a statute which refers to executions against the state, or any county or other civil corporation, which provides that, "if no property is found on which to levy, tiff's loss was this failure of duty on the part of one or both of the defendants.

4. We have thus far assumed that the complaint alleges a failure of duty on the part of both the auditor and the treasurer. We do not, however, decide that it shows a failure of duty on the part of the treasurer. The difficulty here is as to the construction of § 881, which in terms makes it the absolute duty of the treasurer to write or stamp the words "Sold for taxes" on a tax receipt, while it does not seem that this ought to be his duty where the fact that the land had been "Sold for taxes" is not stated on the list furnished by the auditor, and is not ascertainable from the treasurer's books. This feature of the case received no attention in the briefs, and we feel that we ought not to determine the question without argument, especially as it is not necessary to do so. Of course, the question arises only in case, as alleged in the complaint, the words "Sold for taxes" were not placed opposite the description of plaintiff's property on the list furnished the treasurer by the auditor.

5. We hold that the complaint states a cause of action at least as against defendant Scott, the former auditor, and it follows that the joint demurrer of both defendants was properly overruled.

or if the judgment creditor elect not to issue execution against such corporation, he is entitled to the amount of his judgment and costs, in the ordinary evidences of indebtedness issued by that corporation. And, if the debtor corporation issues no scrip or evidences of debt, a tax must be levied as early as practicable sufficient to pay off the judgment with interest and cost," and in another section provides that "a failure on the part of the officers of the corporation to comply with the requirements of the last section renders them personally responsible for the debt," a judgment creditor of a municipal corporation is not obliged to accept scrip or other evidences of indebtedness for his judgment, nor is he required to demand the issue thereof, but may demand that the taxing officers levy a special tax to pay his judgment, and upon their failure to do so, there being no legal obstacle in their way, he may at once proceed with a civil action against the officers individually for the amount of his claim. Oswald v. Thedinga, 17 Iowa, 13; Porter v. Thomson, 22 Iowa, 391.

III. Collecting officers.

a. Protection by warrant.

1. In general.

A tax collector has no authority to alter or change in any way the amount of tax assessed against an individual, by increasing or diminishing it; it is his plain duty to accept the duplicate given to him as correct, and collect the taxes from each individual accordingly, and when he has done so he is not liable to an individual in case the assessment against the individual proves to be excessive or erroneous. He is protected by his warrant if it is fair and regular upon its face. It has been so held in:

Wis.—Sprague v. Birchard, 1 Wis. 457, 60 Am. Dec. 393; McLean v. Cook, 23 Wis. 364 (approved in Stahl v. O'Malley, 39 Wis. 333. Also in Power v. Kindschi, 58 Wis. 539, 46 Am. Rep. 652, 17 N. W. 689).

But it has been held that even though the warrant and tax lists are regular upon the face thereof, if the assessment is illegal, the collector is liable in damages. And it was further held that a tax collector could not justify the taking of property, merely by showing a regular tax bill and warrant, but must show all the previous proceedings to have been legal. Collamer v. Drury, 16 Vt. 574; Downing v. Roberts, 21 Vt. 441.

2. Illegality disclosed by warrant.

But where the illegality of the assessment is manifest upon the face of the warrant, the officer executing it is liable in trespass to the party injured thereby. Atwell v. Zeluff, 26 Mich. 118; Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. v. Shacklett, 30 Mo. 550; State use of Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. v. Shacklett, 37 Mo. 280 (his liability extends to the sureties upon his bond); State ex rel. Rice v. Powell, 44 Mo. 436; Warrensburg ex rel. Colbern v. Miller, 77 Mo. 56; Clark v. Bragdon, 37 N. H. 562; Bellinger v. Gray, 51 N. Y. 610; Van Rensselaer v. Witbeck, 7 N. Y. 517; Wetmore v. Campbell, 2 Sandf. 341; Sprague v. Birchard, 1 Wis. 457, 60 Am. Dec. 393.

3. Where assessors acted without jurisdiction.

It has been held that the collector's warrant is no protection to him if the assessors or other body, in making the assessment and issuing the warrant, did not have jurisdiction in the matter. Hays v. Pacific Mail S. S. Co. 17 How. 696, 15 L. ed. 254; Thurston v. Martin, 5 Mason, 497, Fed. Cas. No. 14,018 (a nonresident of the jurisdiction had been assessed, and the assessors therefore had no jurisdiction either of his person or his property); Eames v. Johnson, 4 Allen, 382 (where the lack of jurisdiction was disclosed upon the face of the warrant); Johnson v. Dole, 4 N. H. 478 (where the school district for which the assessment was made had no legal existence); Cloutman v. Pike, 7 N. H. 209; Cavis v. Robertson, 9 N. H. 524; Suydam v. Keys, 13 Johns. 444 (where it happened that the person taxed was a nonresident); Champaign County Bank v. Smith, 7 Ohio St. 42; Waters v. Daines, 4 Vt. 601; Bates v. Hazeltine, 1 Vt. 81; Blood v. Sayre, 17 Vt. 51 L.R.A.(N.S.)

609; Sprague v. Birchard, 1 Wis. 457, 60 Am. Dec. 393 (but this rule is limited to cases where the officer executing the warrant has knowledge, by reason of the warrant, or in some other way, that the taxing power had no jurisdiction in the matter).

Where the sheriff or his deputy had arrested a person under a warrant from a tax collector directing the arrest upon refusal or failure to pay the taxes with interest, the tax collector is liable in damages to the person so arrested if no interest was legally collectable on the taxes, even though the city council had voted to instruct the collector to add interest to the unpaid taxes after a certain date, it appearing that the council had no authority to add the interest. Snow v. Weeks, 77 Me. 429, 1 Atl. 243. The court held that this was not a case where the tax collector would be protected by his warrant, for his warrant from the assessors did not direct him to collect the interest, but merely the principal.

It was held in Leachman v. Dougherty, 81 Ill. 324, that if the tax collector had actual knowledge of the illegality of the assessment and the consequent invalidity of his warrant, he was not protected thereby, but was liable to the individual from whom he forced payment of the tax thus illegally assessed.

Where the assessment is void and the money still remains in the collector's hands, it may be recovered from him in an action direct by the taxpayer. Tuttle v. Everett, 51 Miss. 27, 24 Am. Rep. 622.

Where an assessment for street improvements had been made, void for the reason that the council had no authority to make it, and the treasurer refused to accept payment of the legal taxes unless these illegal taxes were also paid, the taxable, having paid it all under protest, in order to save his property from tax sale, may recover from the treasurer the amount of the illegal tax. Stephan v. Daniels, 27 Ohio St. 527.

Where property exempt.

And it has been held that the tax collector is liable to the individual paying the tax under protest, where the property upon which the tax was assessed is by law exempt from taxation: State Bank v. Brackenridge, 7 Blackf. 395; State use of Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. v. Shacklett, 37 Mo. 280; St. Louis Bldg. & Sav. Assn. v. Lightner, 47 Mo. 393; Contra: Van Kleeck v. Woodruff, 41 How. Pr. 493, 2 Abb. App. Dec. 167.

4. Assessment under unconstitutional statute.

It is said in Macklot v. Davenport, 17 Iowa, 379, that a tax collector is not protected by his warrant where the assessment is made under an unconstitutional statute.

And in Glasgow v. Rowse, 43 Mo. 479, there is a strong intimation, but not a holding, that if the statute under which the taxes were assessed is unconstitutional, the collector will not be exempt from suits by an individual after he has collected the tax by forcible means.

And in Smith v. First Nat. Bank, 17 Mich. 479, there is a holding, as regards the sheriff who collects a tax by virtue of a warrant issued to him by the auditor general of the state under a statute held to be unconstitutional, that the sheriff is liable to the person from whom he collected the tax. The holding in Smith v. First Nat. Bank is followed in First Nat. Bank v. Watkins, 21 Mich. 483; also followed as to a tax collector in Mogg v. Hall, 83 Mich. 576, 47 N. W. 553. In all three cases, however, a point is made of the fact that reference is made in the warrant to the statute so as to charge the officer with notice of the nature of the authority under which he was acting.

And in Loomis v. Spencer, 1 Ohio St. 153, the court said: "That a treasurer who seizes property to pay a tax assessed, without any color of law for its assessment, or under an unconstitutional law (which is the same as no law), is liable in trespass, seems to have been decided in McCoy v. Chilicothe, 3 Ohio, 370, 17 Am. Dec. 607, and impliedly admitted in Raguet v. Wade, 4 Ohio, 107, and we have no doubt that such is the law."

And in Higgins v. Ausmuss, 77 Mo. 351, it was held that a tax collector is not protected by his warrant in collecting a tax assessed for improvement, he having levied the same upon personal property, the statute under which he professed to act having been previously declared to be unconstitutional by the court of last resort of the state.

But in Walden v. Dudley, 49 Mo. 419, where the claim was made that the legislature had no power to include farming land within corporate limits so as to subject it to corporate taxation, the action being against the tax collector for collecting the tax assessed thereon, the court refused to pass upon the question, holding that even if the contention were correct, the collector could not be held liable. The court said: "It is true that executive officers are bound to know the law, and are bound in some cases to know the limits of legislative authority. Thus, it has been sometimes held that they are responsible for the forcible collection of taxes from those who by charter are exempt from taxation, notwithstanding a subsequent illegal attempt by the legislature, to violate the charter in that regard. But these cases are not like the present one. The legislature had parted with its right to assess the specific tax, and the attempted resumption of that right was held to be an act altogether void, the matter for the time being having passed out of its jurisdiction. But in the case at bar the general jurisdiction is admitted. The collector finds the property placed by the legislature within corporation bounds which it had a right to fix; he also finds the property assessed by competent authority; and what is he to do? Can he say that this legislative act was improper? that it was dictated by a wrong motive? that its object was to compel neighboring farmers to help pay corporation expenses? And coming to this conclusion, can he remit the tax? I think not. Before the property is exempt, several judicial questions must be decided; and it was the plaintiff's duty to object to the assessment, and, if the decision was against him, to review it by a direct proceeding in the city court of appeals. (Lee v. Thomas, 49 Mo. 112.) I do not intend to express any opinion upon the question sought to be raised, but only to say that it cannot come up in a suit against the collector."

b. Illegal or improper acts or omissions subsequent to warrant.

But where the tax collector seizes the property of the taxpayer illegally, or proceeds in an illegal manner, or not according to statute after seizure, he is liable as a trespasser. So collectors have been held liable:

—where a statute requires the collector, when he receives a surplus of money from a sale, to render to the owner an "account in writing" of the sale and charges, and he omits to do so, even though he offers to pay the owner the surplus. Blanchard v. Dow, 32 Me. 557; Williamson v. Dow, 32 Me. 559.

—where he sells upon his warrant a greater number of the chattels than is sufficient to pay the tax. Williamson v. Dow, supra.

—where he intentionally seizes and sells more goods than was necessary to pay the taxes, costs, and expenses. Cone v. Forest, 126 Mass. 97; Denton v. Carroll, 4 App. Div. 532, 40 N. Y. Supp. 19.

—where the tax collector, although furnishing to the owner of the property he has seized and sold, a statement according to the statute referred to in Blanchard v. Dow, supra, failed to turn over to the owner the surplus; that is, the statement was incorrect, in that it included illegal charges and charges of taxes that had already been paid, so that the balance offered by the collector was not as much as it should have been. Carter v. Allen, 59 Me. 296, 8 Am. Rep. 420.

—where the tax collector sells more of the chattels levied upon than is necessary to pay the delinquent tax and the cost and expenses. Seekins v. Goodale, 61 Me. 400, 14 Am. Rep. 568. But in such case the officer is a trespasser ab initio only as to the goods sold in excess of what should have been sold. The court referred to Williamson v. Dow, supra, and says that the holding in that case is not inconsistent with the one here under consideration.

—where he did not sell the distrained goods within the time for such sale, as required by statute. Pierce v. Benjamin, 14 Pick. 356, 25 Am. Dec. 396.

—where he seizes and sells the goods of one person for the tax of another; that is, where he sells the furniture of a room occupied by a boarder for a tax against the boarder, the furniture belonging to the owner of the house. Denton v. Carroll, supra.

—where the act of assembly provided for the collection of the tax by suit in the name of the corporation before any court of competent jurisdiction, and the collector summarily sold the real estate against which the taxes were levied, thus compelling the owner to purchase the property and pay under protest to prevent a cloud upon his title, it later appearing that the assessment was void. Hays v. Hogan, 5 Cal. 241.

—where he seizes and sells the property of a delinquent taxpayer after the time for doing so under the statute has expired. Ray v. Horton, 77 N. C. 334.

—where the collector took and sold the plaintiff's personal property in violation of a statute requiring such property to be advertised in the locality where it is sold. Prince v. Thomas, 11 Conn. 472.

—where he adjourns a sale scheduled at 10 o'clock A. M. indefinitely, and sells at 1 o'clock P. M. of the same day. Buzzell v. Johnson, 54 Vt. 90.

—where the tax collector had altered the tax bill after it came into his hands by inserting an item for street improvement, and levied the same against personal property, contrary to law. Higgins v. Ausmuss, 77 Mo. 351.

—where, by the charter of the corporation and the common law, it is necessary that the corporation proceed in the collection of delinquent taxes against each individual as if collecting a common debt, and that he recover the same in due course of law, but the collector proceeds summarily to levy upon the personal property of the delinquent taxpayer, even though an ordinance of the city, which it had no power to enact, directed such summary action. Bergen v. Clarkson, 6 N. J. L. 352.

A tax collector who demands excessive fees from one under arrest for nonpayment of taxes is liable in trespass at the suit of the party injured for this abuse of authority, even though the imprisonment was not prolonged a single instant by reason of the demand for illegal fees, and the prisoner did not resist or question the amount of the illegal charges. Robbins v. Swift, 86 Me. 197, 29 Atl. 981; Foss v. Whitehouse, 94 Me. 491, 48 Atl. 109.

In such case an action of assumpsit will also lie, but the plaintiff must choose between trespass and assumpsit, as he cannot maintain both actions. If the action is in assumpsit, the collector must refund not only the illegal part of the fees thus extorted, but he must refund all of the fees so collected. Foss v. Whitehouse, supra.

A tax collector who, knowing that there is personal property upon the land of the owner and mortgagor thereof out of which the land taxes could and should have been made, makes a false return of nulla bona, thus establishing a lien for the taxes upon the land, is liable to the mortgagee, who is compelled to redeem the land from a tax sale in order to protect his interest. Raynsford v. Phelps, 43 Mich. 342, 38 Am. Rep. 189, 5 N. W. 403.

But, upon second appeal in 49 Mich. 315, 13 N. W. 606, it was held that the tax so assessed was void, and that because of this there was no such wrong done to the plaintiff by the false return as would give him a right of action, and that the collector was not estopped by the return from showing that the assessment was void.

In Maguire v. State Sav. Asso. 62 Mo. 344, where interest upon delinquent taxes was collected under duress, and not paid over to the corporate authorities, it appearing that no interest was collectable under the statute, it was held that the tax collector was liable to the taxpayer for the amount of this interest in an action for money had and received.

A county auditor who makes a false entry on the record to the effect that land previously sold for taxes has been redeemed is liable to the purchaser of the land, whose agent, relying upon such false entry, purchased for his principal, for the amount the purchaser is compelled to pay in order to redeem the land, with interest from the date of its payment, although personally the principal knew nothing about the entry, the whole transaction being consummated by the agent. Perkins v. Evans, 61 Iowa, 35, 15 N. W. 584.

Where road commissioners had been deprived of all authority to act as such by the operation of a grand jury's recommendation placing the county under the alternative road law, they are liable in a civil action for false imprisonment, to one imprisoned by virtue of their warrant issued thereafter, charging him with being a defaulter in working out his road tax. Varner v. Thompson, 3 Ga. App. 415, 60 S. E. 216. The court, while approving the questionable rule that a de facto judicial officer is not liable for the exercise of judicial functions "even though his acts be corrupt," points out that the defendants were not even de facto officers.

Even though a treasurer's sale of real estate for taxes was based upon a return which should not have been made, there being sufficient personal property out of which the taxes should have been made, a succeeding treasurer is justified in refusing to permit a redemption almost two years after the sale except on condition that the owner pay all the taxes for which the property was sold, as well as subsequent taxes paid by the purchaser, plus 40 per cent interest thereon, which is the condition required by statute for redemption of land from valid tax sale, so that he is not liable to the owner for the excess paid as interest over and above the legal rate after the owner has redeemed, making the full payment under protest. Jones v. Duras, 14 Neb. 40, 14 N. W. 537. This decision is based upon two independent grounds; namely, that the defendant was not responsible for the acts of his predecessor in office, and that the payment was voluntary, inasmuch as the time for redemption could not expire until the purchaser had served the statutory notice upon the former owner, and in this case no such notice had been served.

Where interest coupons were made, upon their face and by the statute authorizing their issue, legal tender for taxes of all kinds, a collector cannot justify a seizure of property for delinquent taxes after tender of payment in coupons, under a later statute attempting to rescind or repeal the legal-tender provisions of the earlier statute, since such later statute is unconstitutional as impairing the obligation of contracts within the meaning of the restriction placed upon states by the Federal Constitution. Poindexter v. Greenhow, 114 U. S. 270, 27 L. ed. 185, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 903, 962 (an action in detinue for specific property seized by a collector); Barry v. Edmunds, 116 U. S. 550, 29 L. ed. 729, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 501 (action of trespass against collector. Case turned upon the question of jurisdiction, defendant's liability being unquestioned); Chaffin v. Taylor, 114 U. S. 309, 29 L. ed. 108, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 924, 962, second writ of error dismissed in 116 U. S. 567, 29 L. ed. 727, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 618 (trespass de bonis asportatis); White v. Greenhow, 114 U. S. 307, 29 L. ed. 199, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 923, 962 (decided upon authority of Poindexter v. Greenhow); Willis v. Miller, 29 Fed. 238 (trespass against the collector).

A tax collector who returns as unpaid taxes that were paid to him (the payment having been made by check which was accepted but not presented for payment, the bank becoming insolvent one month later), so that the taxpayer was compelled to pay the tax to the defendant's successor in office, is liable to the taxpayer for the amount of the tax. Chouteau v. Rowse, 56 Mo. 65.

The act of assembly of June 2, 1881, P. L. 45, gives to a lien creditor an action against the collector for making a wilful return of taxes without any necessity therefor; that is, if there is personal property upon the real estate sufficient to satisfy the tax, the collector is obliged to make the taxes out of such personal property; and in case there is no such personal property, and only in such case, is he to make a return so that the taxes become a lien upon the real estate. Dowlin v. Harley, 2 Pa. Co. Ct. 194.

But in Ordway v. Ferrin, 3 N. H. 69. it was held that, since "a mere nonfeasance cannot make a man a trespasser ab initio," a tax collector who seized personal property under his warrant for delinquent taxes was not liable in trespass to the owner by reason of the fact that he held the property a longer time than was allowed by the statute, he not having sold the property. The court refused to decide whether or not he would have been liable had he sold the property.

And Ordway v. Ferrin was cited and followed in Souhegan Nail, Cotton, & Woollen Factory v. McConihe, 7 N. H. 309, where the collector failed to sell on the day appointed, but readvertised and sold on a subsequent date.

Souhegan Nail, Cotton, & Woollen Factory v. McConihe, supra, was cited and followed in Cavis v. Robertson, 9 N. H. 524.

A tax collector who arrests a delinquent taxpayer on election day is not liable in trespass therefor, even though by statute the party arrested is privileged from arrest upon election day. Woods v. Davis, 34 N. H. 328.

A tax collector is not liable, either on the ground of fraud or negligence, for giving a receipt in full for the taxes against land upon receipt of a check therefor from the owner, to a purchaser of the land who purchased under the belief that the taxes were paid, induced by the receipt being exhibited to him, and who was compelled to pay the taxes, the check having proved worthless, and the taxes having been returned and made a lien upon the property. Kahl v. Love, 37 N. J. L. 5.

Where a tax collector, using his best judgment, guessed at the distance traveled in making a collection, and charged the same as mileage against the taxpayer from whom the collection had been made, it was held in Weightman v. Jones, 73 Vt. 353, 50 Atl. 1101, that, although 1 mile in excess of the actual mileage traveled was thus charged up against the taxpayer, the collector was not liable in an action under the statute for charging excessive fees.

Where land was properly assessed in the owner's name, the taxes paid by him to the collector, and a tax sale of the land resulted from the collector's failure to credit the payment upon the record, it was held in Coleman v. Lytle, 49 Tex. Civ. App. 42, 107 S. W. 562, that the owner could not recover from the collector for the expense of having the judgment set aside and the sale declared void, for the reason that this neglect was not the proximate cause of the injury.

The neglect was the direct cause of the "sale," but it was not the direct or proximate cause of the "injury." The city's act in bringing nonmaintainable suits was an intervening cause, hence the neglect was only the remote or indirect cause of the "injury."

c. Statutory protection.

Under a statute which provides that "no suit shall be maintained against any collector of taxes, elected by any town in this state, or appointed by the selectmen of any such town to that office, who shall have taken the oath of office prescribed by law, and given bond according to law, on the ground, or by reason, of any irregularity or illegality of the proceedings of the town, or of the selectmen, in his election or appointment, nor for any cause whatsoever, except such collector's own wrong or illegal conduct," it has been held that:

—this statute protects the collector against suit for damages because of any irregularity in the assessment. Gordon v. Clifford, 28 N. H. 402.

—if the collector has neglected or failed to take the oath of office, he is not protected by the statute; but one whose property was seized and sold for delinquent taxes can recover only nominal damages on this account if the taxes were legally assessed, unless he shows special damages caused by such neglect or failure on the part of the collector. Cavis v. Robertson, 9 N. H. 524.

—evidence of the fact that plaintiff, at the time the tax was levied, was a non-resident, is immaterial, since that fact would not make the collector liable. Kinsley v. Hall, 9 N. H. 190.

—this statute does not protect a tax collector from liability to the taxpayer in a suit for libel for an illegal, malicious, and unwarranted advertisement of the fact of delinquency. Hutchins v. Page, 75 N. H. 216, 31 L.R.A.(N.S.) 132, 72 Atl. 689.

MISSISSIPPI SUPREME COURT.

CENTRAL TRUST COMPANY et al.,
Appts.,
v.

MERIDIAN LIGHT & RAILWAY COMPANY et al.

(— Miss. —, 63 So. 575.)

Mortgage — limitation of action — effect of provision accelerating time for payment of principal.

1. A provision in a bond that if any instalment of interest shall remain unpaid

Note. — Effect of acceleration provision in mortgage or note to start statute of limitations running.

The question here considered is covered in the notes accompanying Hall v. Jameson, 12 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1190, and Lovell v. Goss, 22 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1110, and the present note is only supplementary to those.

As stated in the first note referred to, where a provision in a mortgage or note is merely optional, giving the mortgagee the option to treat a default as maturing the whole indebtedness, it is generally held that the statute does not commence running until the date of the maturity of the note, unless the option has been exercised.

And in a subsequent case, where a mortgage drawn for a term of ten years provided that in case default should be made in the payment of the principal sum intended to be secured, or in the payment of the interest or any part of the principal and interest, the mortgagee should have the right at any time thereafter to sell the premises in the manner prescribed by law, it was held that this merely gave the mort-for ninety days after demand, the principal shall at once become due and payable, has the effect to set the statute of limitations running against the right to enforce the security from the time when a demand for the payment of interest due was refused, notwithstanding no request has been made by the bondholders for the foreclosure of the deed of trust, which contains a provision that, should a default continue for three months, the trustee, upon being requested to do so by a majority of the bondholders, shall proceed to sell.

Same — right of barred junior mortgagee to redeem.

2. A junior mortgagee has no right to redeem the property from a sale under a prior mortgage, when the debt secured by his mortgage is barred by the statute of limitations.

On Suggestion of Error.

Bond — secured by mortgage — conflict in provisions.

3. There is no conflict between a provision in a bond that if default is made in payment of interest, the bond shall at once become due and payable, and in the mortgage securing that and other bonds that, should default occur in payment of interest, taxes, or the amount due the sinking fund, and continue ninety days, the principal of the bonds shall, at the option of the trustee, to be expressed by written notice, become due and payable.

Pleading — demurrer — statute of limitations.

4. To raise the defense of the statute of limitations by demurrer, it must be specifically set up.

gagee the option to foreclose, and that limitations did not begin to run against the principal from the date of the first default in the payment of interest, where the option was not exercised by the mortgagee. Heburn v. Reynolds, 73 Misc. 73, 132 N. Y. Supp. 460.

And on the theory that the right given on default was optional with the mortgagee, in the following cases, in which the mortgagees did not elect to declare the whole debt due, the statute of limitations was held not to start running from the date of default:

—where the mortgage and bond secured by it provided that in case of default in payment of interest, the principal should, after thirty days, become due and payable at the option of the mortgagee. Quackenbush v. Mapes, 123 App. Div. 242, 107 N. Y. Supp. 1047;

—where the mortgage securing notes empowered the mortgagee to declare the whole sum due on default. Insurance Co. of N. A. v. Martin, 151 Ind. 209, 51 N. E. 361; Clause v. Columbia Sav. & L. Asso. 16 Wyo. 450, 95 Pac. 54;

APPEAL by plaintiffs from a judgment of the Chancery Court for Lauderdale County in defendants' favor in a proceeding for the foreclosure of a deed of trust, and to redeem the property from sale under a prior one. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Eli H. Chandler, Hirsh, Dent, & Landau, and G. Q. Hall, Hall & Jacobson, for appellants:

The statute of limitations cannot be interposed as a defense to this suit.

The entire debt will not become due, unless the mortgagee elects in some way to treat the debt as due.

When the bonds, and the mortgage securing the same, are executed at the same time, and make reference to each other,

—where a trust deed given to secure several notes falling due at different times provided that, on failure to pay the notes as they become due, the principal sum secured might be declared due. Sherwood v. Wilkins, 65 Ark. 312, 45 S. W. 989;

—where a trust deed securing two notes provided that, upon failure to pay either note at maturity, they should both become due, "and at any time afterwards, or after both shall become due and remain unpaid, the said George Walter (the trustee) will sell said land," etc. Batey v. Walter, — Tenn. —, 46 S. W. 1024.

And where a note provided that, in case of default in the payment of interest "when due, and for sixty days thereafter, the principal sum . . . shall at once become absolutely due," and a trust deed securing the note stipulated that, in case of default in the payment of interest, the payee might declare the whole due, it was held that the statute of limitations did not start running from a default in the payment of interest, where the payee failed to exercise his option. Blakeslee v. Hoit, 116 Ill. App. 83.

And where a note provided that, on failure to pay instalments of interest, the holder might collect the principal and interest at once, and a trust deed securing it stipulated that, in case of failure to pay the interest, the whole of the principal "shall and may at once become due and payable," it was held that limitations did not begin to run against the note from the date of a default in the payment of interest, where the payee did not exercise his option. First Nat. Bank v. Park, 37 Colo. 303, 86 Pac. 106.

And in Weinberg v. Naher, 51 Wash. 591, 22 L.R.A. (N.S.) 956, 99 Pac. 736, where a note provided that upon default in the payment of interest, the whole debt should become due at the option of the holder of the note, and the mortgage securing the note empowered the mortgagee to sell the property on default, there is a dictum that the whole debt does not become due on default in the payment of interest, in the absence of an exercise of the option by the mortgagee.

In Fisher v. Spillman, 85 Kan. 552, 118 Pac. 65, where a note provided that, in case of default in the payment of interest, the whole indebtedness should become due if the holder so elected, and the mortgage securing it provided that upon default the whole debt should immediately become due, the stipulation in the note was held to govern, and in the absence of an exercise of the option it was held that limitations would not begin to run from a default in the payment of interest, but from the maturity of the note. And to the same effect is Kennedy v. Gibson, 68 Kan. 612, 75 Pac. 1044.

Where the provision in question is absolute, as distinguished from optional, as stated in the note to Hall v. Jameson, it is held by some courts that the statute commences running from the happening of default.

And in Green v. Frick, 25 S. D. 342, 126 N. W. 579, it was held that a provision in a mortgage securing notes that, upon default in the payment of principal or interest, "then the whole sum, both principal and interest, shall at once become due and collectable," had the effect, upon default, of they must be construed, as far as possible, as one instrument.

making the entire indebtedness due and collectable, and of starting limitations running from the date of default. The court said: "The decisions of the courts upon this question in the different states are somewhat in conflict, and the question is now presented for the first time in this court. Some courts have construed such clauses in a mortgage or contract as in the nature of a penalty inserted for the benefit of the creditor, giving him an option to declare the whole sum due, and holding that the statute does not commence to run against his debt until he has exercised the option, or elected to declare the whole indebtedness due upon default. Other courts have construed such a provision in a bond or mortgage as fixing a contingency upon the happening of which the whole debt should mature at a date earlier than that fixed in the note evidencing the indebtedness. We are inclined to the view that when the contract does not in terms make the maturing of the entire indebtedness optional with the payee, but does expressly provide that upon a default the entire sum should at once become due and collectable, such words should be given effect according to their plain import and the intent of the parties as expressed thereby. The decided cases which hold this view, it seems to us, are supported by the better reasoning. No doubt exists where the contract is clearly optional on the part of the creditor. But to hold that a contract is optional which, by its express terms, is plainly absolute, is unwarranted by any known rule governing the construction of contracts."

Martin, 81 Kan. 499, 106 Pac. 42, that a provision in a mortgage that the entire amount of the note secured shall at once become due in case of default in the payment of interest or taxes, though primarily for the benefit of the mortgagee, can be turned to the benefit of the mortgagor, and will start the statute of limitations running in his favor upon default.

And there is a dictum to the same effect in First Nat. Bank v. Peck, 8 Kan. 660, where a mortgage securing notes provided that upon default the whole sum should immediately become due and payable.

It has been held that a provision in a deed of trust securing notes payable on specified dates, that upon default in the payment of the debt or any part thereof, the whole should become due and payable, merely gives the mortgagee the right to foreclose and sell the property upon a default in payment, and to apply the amount realized to the payment of all the secured notes, and does not have the effect upon default of starting limitations running against the notes not then due. Capehart v. Whiteside, 63 Kan. 49, 64 Pac. 1032, where a mortgage securing bonds provided that upon default in the payment of interest or taxes, the whole sum secured by the mortgage should, at the option of the holder, at once become due, it was held that limitations began to run from the time it was declared to have become due by the holder in his petition in a former action to foreclose, and not from the date that action was commenced. Smith, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

On the 17th day of May, 1890, the Meridian Gaslight Company conveyed to the St. Louis Trust Company the property here in controversy, in trust to secure the payment of sixty first mortgage bonds executed by it. In 1901, default having been made in the payment of these bonds, this deed of trust was foreclosed by a bill in equity, and the property sold, at which sale A. C. Howze, trustee, became the purchaser, and the present owners of the property claim title through him by means conveyances. In 1893, the Meridian Gaslight Company executed a second deed of trust to the Central Trust Company, to secure the payment of a second series of bonds, each for the sum of $1,000, payable ten years after date, with interest at the rate of 6 per cent per annum, payable quarterly "upon presentation and surrender of the interest coupons attached to said bonds, as they severally become due." These bonds contained the following provision: "If default shall be made in the payment of any quarterly annual instalment of interest on this bond, and be demanded, and shall remain unpaid for ninety days after such demand, the principal of this bond shall at once become due and payable." The mortgage stipulated, quoting from the brief of counsel for appellants, that "should the Meridian Gaslight Company 'make default in the principal or interest of said bond, and should such default continue for three months,' then said Central Trust Company, upon being requested to do so by the holder or holders of a majority of said bonds outstanding, 'shall proceed to sell,' etc." These bonds and the interest coupons attached thereto are payable at the office of the Central Trust Company in New York city. On the 1st day of June, 1899, appellant Loper, the owner of the bonds here sued on, presented to the Central Trust Company coupons numbered 24 attached thereto, and requested payment thereof, which request was refused, and thereafter, in the language of appellants' bill, "the said Richard F. Loper has frequently demanded of said trustee the payment of the accrued interest evidenced by the successively maturing coupons on said bonds, and the payment of the principal sum evidenced by said bonds, the payment of which has always been similarly refused when so demanded, and that no part of said interest or said principal sum, so demanded, has been paid either by the said company or anyone else in its behalf, and that the same is now due, owing, and unpaid." On the 26th day of June, 1906, Loper, together with the Central Trust Company, instituted this proceeding in the court below, praying that the deed of trust securing his bonds be foreclosed, and that he be permitted to redeem the property from the sale under the deed of trust executed to the St. Louis Trust Company. Neither Loper, the Central Trust Company, nor any holder of the bonds secured by the deed of trust to the Central Trust Company, were made parties to the suit by which the St. Louis Trust Company mortgage was foreclosed. From a decree dismissing appellants' bill, this appeal is taken.

had been made in proper form to the introduction of the bonds sued on, and excluded them from the evidence on the ground that their execution had not been proven. It is unnecessary for us to decide whether or not the chancellor erred in so doing, for the reason that this evidence was not excluded until complainants had rested their case, and on the pleading and evidence then presented, appellants were not entitled, as will presently appear, to the relief prayed for, even had the bonds not been excluded from the evidence.

One of the defenses relied upon by appellee is that the bonds sued on are barred by our six-year statute of limitations.

"The statute of limitations begins to run whenever the cause of action accrues. In other words, the time limited is to be computed from the day upon which the plaintiff might have commenced an action for the recovery of his demand." Johnson v. Pyles, 11 Smedes & M. 189.

When the demand for the payment of the interest due on these bonds, made on the 1st day of June, 1899, was refused, the principal of the bonds, by reason of the provision hereof hereinbefore set out, became at once due and payable, and the owner had the right then, and always thereafter, to collect them, if necessary, by suit at law. The time within which a suit on the bonds can be commenced must therefore be computed from that date, and, since this suit was instituted more than six years after that date, the bar of the statute is complete. Hemp v. Garland, 4 Q. B. 519, 7 Jur. 302, 3 Gale & D. 402, 12 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 134; Reeves v. Butcher, [1891] 2 Q. B. 509, 60 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 619, 65 L. T. N. S. 329, 39 Week. Rep. 626; First Nat. Bank v. Peck, 8 Kan. 660; Wheeler & W. Mfg. Co. v. Howard (C. C.) 28 Fed. 741; Snyder v. Miller, 71 Kan. 410, 69 L.R.A. 250, 114 Am. St. Rep. 489, 80 Pac. 970; Pierce v. Shaw, 51 Wis. 316, 8 N. W. 207; Ryan v. Caldwell, 106 Ky. 543, 50 S. W. 966; Harrison Mach. Works v. Reigor, 64 Tex. 89; San Antonio Real Estate, Bldg. & L. Asso. v. Stewart, 94 Tex. 441, 86 Am. St. Rep. 864, 61 S. W. 386.

We have examined, but must decline to follow, the authorities to the contrary cited by counsel for appellants. It may be, and probably is, true, as stated in some of these cases, that this provision is primarily for the benefit of the bondholders, and is inserted in order to make the bonds more attractive to investors; but when the bonds contain no language which either expressly or by necessary implication so limits its benefits, it necessarily follows that it can be invoked by the maker as well as the holder. To hold otherwise would be to make a contract for the parties different from the one they themselves have made.

There is no force in the argument, also advanced in some of these cases, that it would be inequitable to permit the maker of a bond containing such a provision to put the statute in operation by his own wrongful act,—i. e., by the breach of his contract to pay the interest at stated intervals,—for the reason that statutes of limitation are always put in operation by the wrongful acts of the parties invoking them. San Antonio Real Estate, Bldg. & L. Asso. v. Stewart, 94 Tex. 441, 86 Am. St. Rep. 864, 61 S. W. 386.

We do not understand counsel for appellants to deny, which of course they could not successfully do, that a junior mortgagee has no right to redeem the property covered by his mortgage from a sale under a prior mortgage when the debt secured by his mortgage is barred by the statute of limitations.

We have not overlooked the provision in appellants' deed of trust that it should be foreclosed by the trustee upon its being requested so to do, and that no such request was made of the trustee prior to the institution of this suit. That fact is wholly immaterial for the reason that the statute of limitations begins to run, not from the time a request of the trustee to foreclose a deed of trust is made, but from the time the debt secured thereby becomes due and payable.

Affirmed.

A suggestion of error having been filed, Smith, Ch. J., on February 9, 1914, handed down the following response (— Miss. —, 64 So. 216):

We have re-examined, and must adhere to the views expressed in, our former opinion.

Appellants suggest, however, that we have failed to give effect to the following clause of the mortgage securing these bonds: "Should the party of the first part make default in the payment of any instalment of interest, as herein provided, or fail to pay into the hands of the trustee the annual sinking fund of $3,000, or fail to pay the taxes on said real estate and other property annually when due, and should such default continue for ninety days, then the whole of the principal of the bonds hereby secured and outstanding, together with all interest thereon accrued, shall, at the option of the trustee, to be expressed by written notice and declaration to the party of the first part (which notice and declaration may be given, if requested, by the holder or holders of a majority of the outstanding bonds), become due and payable, anything herein or in the said bonds contained to the contrary notwithstanding."

Their contention is that there is a conflict between this and the clause contained in the notes, set out in our former opinion, providing that they shall become due and payable upon default in payment of interest, and that when such a conflict occurs, the clause in the deed of trust controls; that, since the trustee never exercised the option therein given him of declaring the bonds due, their maturity was not accelerated by the failure to pay the interest. It is unnecessary for us to decide whether or not appellants' contention is founded upon a correct conception of the law, for the reason that there is no conflict between the two clauses. The clause in the bonds affects only the particular bond in which it is written, and the failure to pay interest on one bond has no effect on the maturity of another bond; while the clause in the deed of trust affects all of the bonds, and confers power upon the trustee to declare all of them due upon the failure to pay the interest due on any one of them. Without this clause in the deed of trust, difficulties might have arisen in enforcing the security when default had been made in the payments of a part of the bonds only, thereby maturing those on which the default was made.

When the bill was filed in the court below it was demurred to by appellee. The demurrer was overruled, and on appeal to this court the decree of the court below was affirmed and the cause remanded. 46 So. 415. One of the grounds of this demurrer was "no equity on the face of the bill," which, according to appellants' contention, was sufficient to raise the defense of the statute of limitations, and therefore, by overruling the demurrer, the court decided that the bonds were not barred by a limitation, and consequently that defense was eliminated when the case was tried again after it was remanded. It is true that in equity the defense of the statute of limitations can be raised by demurrer when the facts establishing it appear on the face of the bill, but it cannot be done by a general demurrer; in order to be so availed of, the demurrer must specifically set up the statute as one of the grounds thereof. 6 Standard Enc. Proc. 931, and authorities there cited in note 80.

The general demurrer is good only when the pleading to which it is interposed "is so defective that judgment according to the law and the right of the case cannot be rendered on it." In other words, it reaches only such defects in pleading as are never waived, and which can be availed of at any time and in any place. Hawkins v. Mississippi & T. R. Co. 35 Miss. 688; Southern R. Co. v. Grace, 95 Miss. 616, 49 So. 835.

Overruled.

Commerce — transportation of woman for immoral purposes — power of state.

A state cannot forbid the importation, or aiding in the transportation, of a woman into the state for immoral purposes, since Congress has undertaken to legislate upon that subject.

Sanner, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

By an information filed in the district court of Park county, the respondent, one Peter Harper, was accused of aiding a woman in obtaining transportation from Woodlake, Minnesota, to Livingston, Montana, for the purpose of concubinage, contrary to the provisions of § 1, chap. 1, Laws of the Twelfth Legislative Assembly (Laws 1911, p. 3). To this information the respondent demurred, principally upon the ground that the court was without jurisdiction. The demurrer was allowed, and, because the objection could not be avoided by another or amended information, the respondent was discharged. From the judgment thus entered, the state has appealed.

In ruling upon the demurrer the learned judge of the district court filed a memorandum which, omitting the formal parts, is as follows:

"The law under which this information is drawn was passed by the twelfth legislative assembly, and was approved by the governor on January 28, 1911, and, it will be observed, in § 1, assumes to prohibit the transportation of women and girls into this state from another state for immoral purposes, and to punish as a felony those who shall aid any such girl or woman in obtaining such transportation. Prior to the passage of this law the Congress of the United States had, on June 25, 1910, passed what is known as the Mann act (Fed. Stat. Anno.

Note. — State legislation for prevention of immorality as interference with interstate commerce.

STATE v. HARPER appears to be the only case directly passing upon the question whether a state statute enacted for the prevention of immorality is unconstitutional as an interference with interstate commerce. In Chy Lung v. Freeman, 92 U. S. 275, 23 L. ed. 550, a statute which required the owner or master of a vessel to give a bond of indemnity against liability for support of certain specified classes of passengers, among which were "lewd and debauched women," was held unconstitutional, partly on the ground that it was an unlawful interference with commerce with other nations. A woman who was held in custody on failure to give bond, as belonging to the class named, was ordered discharged. It appears, however, that the statute went much beyond that necessary or appropriate as a police regulation, giving to the commissioner of immigration arbitrary powers, permitting extortion, and rewarding the commissioner by a per cent of the money collected. The court stated that it did not decide the constitutionality, in the absence of legislation by Congress, of a statute limited to provisions necessary and appropriate for the protection of the state.

R. E. H.

1912 Supp. 419), in the 2d section of which it is provided that any person who shall aid or assist in procuring any ticket or any form of transportation to be used by any girl or woman in interstate commerce, in going to any place for the purpose of prostitution or debauchery or for any immoral purpose, shall be deemed guilty of a felony.

"The contention of counsel for the defendant is that the transportation of persons from one state to another, whatever the purpose, is interstate commerce; that the provisions of § 8, clauses 3 and 18, of the Federal Constitution, which confer upon Congress the power to 'regulate commerce among the several states,' and 'to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper' for that purpose, are exclusive, at least when Congress has assumed to exercise its delegated powers; that, Congress having manifested its purpose in the Mann act to take possession of the subject of the transportation of girls and women from one state to another for immoral purposes, and to punish those who might engage in such traffic or seek to aid in the same, the entire matter must be left under Federal control, and that the act under which the information against the defendant was drawn is the result of an unwarranted assumption of power by the legislature; that the legislature having no legal right to legislate upon the matter, its attempted act could not confer upon the state courts any jurisdiction to punish an offender against the act. The state law and the Federal act embody substantially the same provisions, and it is clear that it was the intention of Congress to assume control of the subject so far as its power extends.

"The transportation of freight or passengers from one state to another, or through more than one state, is interstate commerce; and the regulation thereof by the states is forbidden by the Federal Constitution. Such commerce, whether carried on by individuals or corporations, is under the exclusive jurisdiction of Congress. Indiana ex rel. Wolf v. Pullman Palace Car Co. (C. C.) 11 Biss. 561, 16 Fed. 193.

"In Second Employers' Liability Cases (Mondou v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co.) 223 U. S. 1, 56 L. ed. 327, 38 L.R.A.(N.S.) 44, 32 Sup. Ct. Rep. 169, 1 N. C. C. A. 875, the Supreme Court of the United States, referring to commerce clauses of the Constitution, says: They 'have been considered by this court so often and in such varied connections that some propositions bearing upon the extent and nature of this power have come to be so firmly settled as no longer to be open to dispute, among them being' (1) that 'the term "commerce" comprehends more than the mere exchange of goods. It embraces commercial intercourse in all its branches, including transportation of passengers and property by common carriers, whether carried on by water or by land.' It is therefore not open to argument but that the transportation of passengers from one state to another is embraced within the meaning of the words 'interstate commerce,' and that Congress has the authority to regulate such transportation.

"In the case of Hoke v. United States, 227 U. S. 308, 57 L. ed. 523, 43 L.R.A.(N.S.) 906, 33 Sup. Ct. Rep. 281, Ann. Cas. 1913E, 905, it is held: 'Congress, in the exercise of its power to regulate commerce, could lawfully enact the provisions of the white slave act of June 25, 1910 (36 Stat. at L. 825, chap. 395, U. S. Comp. Stat. Supp. 1911, p. 1343), making criminal the transportation of women or girls in interstate commerce for the purpose of prostitution or debauchery, or other immoral purposes, or the obtaining, aiding, or inducing of such transportation.'

"That the state law under consideration attempts to control a certain phase of interstate commerce is disclosed in the first three lines of the act in question, which declare: 'The importation of women and girls into this state, or the exportation of women and girls from this state for immoral purposes, is hereby prohibited.' We then have a state law and a Federal law, each dealing with the same subject, and are to inquire what effect one has upon the other. Are they of equal potency and effect; are they concurrent, or must one give way to the other?

"Chief Justice Marshall in M'Culloch v. Maryland, 4 Wheat. 316, 4 L. ed. 579, says: 'If any one proposition could command the universal assent of mankind, we might expect it would be this,—that the government of the Union, though limited in its powers, is supreme within its sphere of action. This would seem to result necessarily from its nature. It is the government of all; its powers are delegated by all; it represents all, and acts for all. Though any one state may be willing to control its operations, no state is willing to allow others to control them. The nation, on those subjects on which it can act, must necessarily bind its component parts. But this question is not left to mere reason; the people have, in express terms, decided it by saying: "This Constitution, and the laws of the United States which shall be made in pursuance thereof," "shall be the supreme law of the land," and by requiring that the members of the state legislatures, and the officers of the executive and judicial departments of the states, shall take the oath of fidelity to it. The government of the United States, then, though limited in its powers, is supreme; and its laws, when made in pursuance of the Constitution, form the supreme law of the land, "anything in the Constitution or laws of any state to the contrary notwithstanding." Further on in the same opinion, the court uses this language: "This great principle is that the Constitution and the laws made in pursuance thereof are supreme; that they control the Constitution and laws of the respective states, and can not be controlled by them."

"In Smith v. Alabama, 124 U. S. 465, 31 L. ed. 508, 1 Inters. Com. Rep. 804, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 504, the Supreme Court of the United States says: 'The grant of power to Congress in the Constitution to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several states, it is conceded, is paramount over all legislative powers which, in consequence of not having been granted to Congress, are reserved to the states. It follows that any legislation of a state, although in pursuance of an acknowledged power reserved to it, which conflicts with the actual exercise of the power of Congress over the subject of Commerce, must give way before the supremacy of the national authority.'

"In Covington & C. Bridge Co. v. Kentucky, 154 U. S. 204, 38 L. ed. 962, 4 Inters. Com. Rep. 649, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1087, the Supreme Court of the United States says: 'The adjudications of this court with respect to the power of the states over the general subject of commerce are divisible into three classes: First, those in which the power of the state is exclusive; second, those in which the states may act in the absence of legislation by Congress; third, those in which the action of Congress is exclusive, and the states cannot interfere at all.'

"It will be admitted without argument that the statute in question does not fall within the third class of cases above mentioned, and that the state under its reserved police power has the right, at least in the absence of congressional legislation, to control the matter of bringing persons into the state, there to engage in immoral practices. In the case of Hoke v. United States, supra, the Supreme Court of the United States says: 'There is unquestionably a control in the states over the morals of their citizens, and, it may be admitted, it extends to making prostitution a crime. It is a control, however, which can be exercised only within the jurisdiction of the states, but there is a domain which the states cannot reach, and over which Congress alone has power; and if such power be exerted to control what the states cannot, it is an argument for, not against, its legality.' It must likewise now be conceded that the statute does not fall within the first class of cases above mentioned, for the reason that in Hoke v. United States, supra, the Supreme Court has held that the Mann act is a valid exercise of the power of Congress under the commerce clause of the Federal Constitution.

"Having, by the process of elimination, removed the act in question from the first and third classifications made by the Supreme Court in the Covington & C. Bridge Co. Case, it follows, of necessity, that it must come under the second class,—that is, that the power attempted to be exercised is one of those instances in which the state may act in the absence of legislation by Congress,—and it remains only to determine what effect the congressional act has upon the state act. This subject has been passed upon in a number of recent cases, all holding that in those instances in which the state has power to act in the absence of legislation by Congress, when Congress does, by its act, manifest a purpose to take possession of a subject within its power under the commerce clauses of the Constitution, all state policies, regulations, and laws upon the subject are superseded by the congressional act. Adams Exp. Co. v. Croninger, 226 U. S. 491, 57 L. ed. 314, 44 L.R.A.(N.S.) 257, 33 Sup. Ct. Rep. 148; Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Miller, 226 U. S. 513, 57 L. ed. 323, 33 Sup. Ct. Rep. 155; Northern P. R. Co. v. Washington, 222 U. S. 370, 56 L. ed. 237, 32 Sup. Ct. Rep. 160. The same holding has been made by the supreme court of Montana in the recent case of Melzner v. Northern P. R. Co. 46 Mont. 277, 127 Pac. 1003.

"Counsel for the state, however, insists that both of these acts remain in effect, and the jurisdiction over the offense named is concurrent in the Federal and state courts; that the United States and the state being different sovereignties, the same act may be an offense against both. This might be true in some instances, but here we are confronted with the fact that, so far as the regulation of interstate commerce is concerned, the states have expressly surrendered the entire subject to the general government, and that, when the general government sees fit to exercise the powers delegated and surrendered to it by the states, the state is precluded from saying that the subject, or any matter connected therewith, is under the concurrent control of the two sovereignties. The case of State v. Northern P. R. Co. 30 Mont. 582, 15 L.R.A.(N.S.) 134, 93 Pac. 945, 13 Ann. Cas. 144, appears to be an answer to these contentions of counsel. In that case the state sought to punish as a crime the violation of what is known as the sixteen hour law, and, while a conviction was sustained on the ground that the Federal law covering the same matter had not become effective at the time of this prosecution, the court, in effect, holds that, as soon as the Federal law should become effective, prosecutions under the state law could no longer be maintained, thus applying to criminal prosecutions the same rules which have been announced in the civil cases above cited."

This disposition of the matter as presented to the district court is complete. The attorney general, however, contends before us that the position of the district court is untenable, because the state statute in question is not an attempt to directly regulate interstate commerce, since it does not impose any restriction, tax, burden, condition, or prohibition upon the carriers, or upon the freedom of individuals moving from state to state; and therefore, being a reasonable exercise of the reserved police power, it is not open to attack as an interference with interstate commerce. In other words, the statute addresses itself only to citizens of this state upon a matter within the range of its police powers. The argument has some plausibility and might command respect, were it not for the direct answer to be found in Hoke v. United States, cited above. The Mann act also addresses itself to the citizens of this state in common with the citizens of all the other states, and it is leveled not merely at the person who transports, but also at the person "who shall cause to be transported or aid or assist in obtaining" interstate transportation for, "any woman or girl for the purpose of prostitution or debauchery, or for any other immoral purpose." The state statute provides that "whoever shall . . . aid any such woman or girl in obtaining transportation to . . . this state for the purpose of prostitution or concubinage, or for any other immoral purpose, shall be deemed guilty of a felony," etc. The only difference in these provisions is that, where the Mann act uses the word "debauchery," the state statute says "concubinage;" but this difference is not essential. Athanasaw et al. v. United States, 227 U. S. 326, 57 L. ed. 528, 33 Sup. Ct. Rep. 285, Ann. Cas. 1913E, 911. Now, if, as is the case, the very provision of the Mann act above referred to has been authoritatively construed to be a direct regulation of interstate commerce, how can it be said that the like provision of the state statute is not of the same character?

The assertion that the state statute imposes no restriction, condition, or prohibition upon the freedom of individuals in moving from state to state would seem to carry its own answer. When the statute says that importation into or exportation from this state, of women and girls for immoral purposes, is unlawful, it characterizes not merely the act of the person who furthers the importation or exportation, but also the act of the person imported or exported; and the unlawful character of the act of the person imported or exported is not affected by the circumstance that the penalties of the law are not visited upon her. A person is not at liberty to do an unlawful thing. In the absence of both the Federal and state statutes, persons would be at liberty to come into and go out of this state without regard to sex or purpose. Freedom of movement implies the right to receive assistance when such assistance may be had. To deny to A the right to assist B is to deny to B the right to be assisted, and so restrict the movements of B. In the case of women and girls who come and go for immoral purposes, this is the laudable purpose of both the state and Federal enactments. "If the facility of interstate transportation can be taken away from the demoralization of lotteries, the debasement of obscene literature, the contagion of diseased cattle or persons, the impurity of food and drugs, the like facility can be taken away from the systematic enticement to, and the enslavement in prostitution and debauchery of, women, and, more insistently, of girls." Hoke v. United States, 227 U. S. 308, 57 L. ed. 523, 43 L.R.A.(N.S.) 906, 33 Sup. Ct. Rep. 281, Ann. Cas. 1913E, 905. While the transportation of persons is a branch of legitimate commerce, to knowingly transport or aid in the transportation of women and girls for immoral purposes is a proceeding which the best sense of all the world will condemn, and which, as a menace to its own welfare, any state may prohibit under its police power. Such legislation is doubtless effective so long as Congress remains silent on the subject. Morgan's L. & T. R. & S. S. Co. v. Board of Health, 118 U. S. 455, 30 L. ed. 237, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1114; Cooley v. Post Wardens, 12 How. 299, 318, 13 L. ed. 996, 1004; Covington & C. Bridge Co. v. Kentucky, 154 U. S. 204, 38 L. ed. 962, 4 Inters. Com. Rep. 649, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1087.

The fallacy of appellant's position here is that, if a state statute is an exercise of the police power, it may be enforced, although it be a direct regulation of interstate commerce in a respect covered by Federal legislation. "The line of distinction between that which constitutes an interference with commerce, and that which is a mere police regulation, is sometimes exceedingly dim and shadowy, and it is not to be wondered at that learned jurists differ when endeavoring to classify the cases which arise. It is not doubted that Congress has the power to go beyond the general regulations of commerce which it is accustomed to establish, and to descend to the most minute directions, if it should be deemed advisable; and that to whatever extent the ground shall be covered by those directions, the exercise of state power is excluded." Cooley, Const. Lim. 7th ed. 856.

Of certain quarantine regulations of the state of Louisiana it was remarked by the Supreme Court of the United States: "While it may be a police power in the sense that all provisions for the health, comfort, and security of the citizens are police regulations, and an exercise of the police power, it has been said more than once in this court that, even where such powers are so exercised as to come within the domain of Federal authority as defined by the Constitution, the latter must prevail." Morgan's L. & T. R. & S. S. Co. v. Board of Health, supra.

The provision before us declares that, under certain circumstances, women and girls are not legitimate subjects of commerce. No one will dispute it, but the controlling power to make that declaration rests with Congress; otherwise the power vested in Congress to regulate interstate commerce may be circumscribed by the ability of the state to determine what shall or what shall not be regulated. "The police power would not only be a formidable rival, but, in a struggle, must necessarily triumph over the commercial power, as the power to regulate is dependent upon the power to fix and determine upon the subjects to be regulated." License Cases; Peirce v. New Hampshire, 5 How. 597, 600, 12 L. ed. 298, 299.

The foregoing is, of course, intended to apply only to those portions of the first section of chapter 1, Laws of 1911, which relate to transportation into this state from without, and must not be taken as an intimation against the validity of any other provision of that section, or of any other section of that act.

The judgment is affirmed.

NEBRASKA SUPREME COURT.

H. W. HORTON, Doing Business as Western Supply Company, et al.,

v.

TABITHA HOME et al., Impleaded, etc.,
Appts.

(— Neb. —, 145 N. W. 1023.)

Mechanics' lien — trust property.

1. A trust for the benefit of the public attaches to property secured by a corporation organized for charitable and religious purposes, to furnish a home for the aged and infirm, and a home for indigent orphans to be given a common school education to fit them to become nurses and attendants on orphan homes and similar institutions, and property so secured and used is not subject to mechanics' liens without an order of the district court of the proper county authorizing the same, nor can the property of such a corporation be sold on execution where such sale would defeat the trust and destroy the public purpose for which the property was donated or secured.

Same — contract by trustees.

2. The trustees elected to manage the affairs of such a corporation cannot enter into a valid contract by which its property may become subject to mechanics' liens, without first having obtained an order of the district court for that purpose.

Charity — dealing with trustees — notice of powers.

3. All persons dealing with the trustees of such a corporation must, at their peril, take notice of the powers granted by its articles of incorporation.

Mechanics' lien — charity — permitting use of material.

4. The failure of the trustees to object to the use of material furnished at the order of other persons, in remodeling the building situated upon such property, will not have the effect of creating a mechanics' lien thereon.

HORTON v. TABITHA HOME finds no support in the few cases found to discuss this question.

The view is taken in Oregon and Pennsylvania, that, there being no reason, religious, moral, or civil, why a church should not be subject to a mechanics' lien, a church edifice is a "building" within the meaning of the mechanics' lien law. Harrisburg Lumber Co. v. Washburn, 29 Or. 150, 44 Pac. 390; Presbyterian Church v. Allison, 10 Pa. 413.

APPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the District Court for Lancaster County in favor of plaintiff and cross petitioners in an action brought to foreclose a mechanics' lien. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. F. A. Boehmer and H. C. Bittenbender, for appellants:

A mechanics' lien cannot be obtained against the property of any person, unless the improvements were made or material furnished under a contract with the owner, either expressed or implied.

It was recently held in Arkansas that an orphanage erected under a contract with the Catholic bishop, who held the title to the property in his individual name, was not exempt from a mechanics' lien as a public charity, although the bishop was morally and ecclesiastically bound to use the same for religious and charitable purposes. Morris v. Nowlin Lumber Co. 100 Ark. 253, 140 S. W. 1. This decision was rendered per curiam by a majority of the court on rehearing after a contrary opinion had been rendered. In the rehearing one judge adhered to the original opinion, and two judges distinguished, and two favored overruling, the earlier cases of Eureka Stone Co. v. First Christian Church, 86 Ark. 212, 126 Am. St. Rep. 1088, 110 S. W. 1042, holding without discussion that a church is a public charity, and that the church building is not subject to a mechanics' lien; and Grissom v. Hill, 17 Ark. 483, holding that where a deed of land for a church provides that the lot "is never to be sold, or to be used in any other way, only for a church," the trustees cannot, by a contract for the erection of a structure thereon, render the land subject to a mechanics' lien; and that where the land is sold under a lien, the grantor may sue in equity to set aside the sale, there being no forfeiture clause in the deed.

Trustees of church property have such a title as authorizes them to contract a debt for which the property may be subjected to a mechanics' lien without making the grantor a party defendant, where the deed conveyed the land to them and their successors in trust for the ministry and membership of the church subject to its discipline, and provided that if the property be sold, the proceeds are to be disposed of according to 51 L.R.A.(N.S.)

A college building erected and maintained by a religious society is not a school building erected in accordance with public law, and, not being exempt, upon the ground of public necessity, from seizure or sale under execution, is subject to mechanics' lien. Ray County Sav. Bank v. Cramer, 54 Mo. App. 587.

A university established by subscription under statutory authority is not rendered immune to the remedies given by the mechanics' lien law, by a provision in the act establishing it, that the trustee shall not encumber the property by mortgage or otherwise, and shall not involve the institution in any debt which it has not the means of paying. University of Lewisburg v. Reber, 43 Pa. 305.

Attention is also directed to McLeod v. Central Normal School Asso. 152 Pa. 575, 25 Atl. 1109, holding that a normal school receiving recognition and aid from the state is not to be regarded as a quasi public corporation so as to relieve its property from mechanics' liens.

In each of the following cases involving mechanics' liens against church property, it appears not to have been contended that church property is not subject to liens, and the opinions proceed upon the assumption that it is: North Presby. Church v. Jevne, 32 Ill. 214, 83 Am. Dec. 261; Gortemiller v. Rosengarn, 103 Ind. 414, 2 N. E. 829; Keller v. Tracy, 11 Iowa, 530; Jones v. Mt. Zion, 30 La. Ann. 711; Hoekstra v. Messrs. E. C. Strode, M. V. Beghtol, and Jesse L. Root for appellee Horton.

Messrs. Field, Ricketts, & Ricketts, Mockett & Peterson, C. S. Polk, C. S. Allen, and Talbot & Allen for other appellees.

Barnes, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This action was commenced by H. W. Horton in the district court for Lancaster county, for the foreclosure of a mechanics' lien against an incorporated charitable institution known as "Tabitha Home," situated near the city of Lincoln. The petition was in the usual form, for materials furnished Tabitha Home under an alleged contract. Certain other persons claiming mechanics' judgment, and mortgage liens were made parties defendant, and filed answers and cross petitions setting up their claims, aggregating $22,280.32, exclusive of interest and costs. To the petition and cross petitions the Home answered, admitting that it is a corporation, that it is the owner of the property in controversy, and denying the unadmitted allegations of the petition and cross petitions. The minor children, inmates of the orphans' department of the Home, applied for and were given leave to file an answer and cross petition, which consisted of a general denial of the averments of the petition and all cross petitions. The names of said minors and orphans, some thirteen in number, are given with the averment that they are minors and orphans, inmates of and confined in said Tabitha Home, a charitable institution, and have an interest therein; "that the Home is a corporation under the laws of this state, existing as a charitable institution, the object and purpose of which is to maintain a home for orphans and aged people; that it became incorporated many years ago, and ever since said date has and is now maintained as an orphans' home;

. . . that its property and funds be handled by a board of trustees whose duty it is to use said funds and property for the purposes and objects for which the Home was incorporated, and that such board of trustees has no other interest or rights in the property of this Home. The title to the property is held in trust by this corporation and its officers for the use and benefit of the inmates, in furtherance of the object for which the Home was created; that these answering minors have been inmates of the Home and were inmates thereof at the time when the alleged improvements were made, and that they are still inmates of the Home, and being cared for in said institution; that no part of the material or labor described in these petitions and answers of the lien holders was necessary for the completion, maintenance, or furtherance of the trust for which the Home was incorporated, but if said material was in reality furnished, it was for a different purpose; that these orphans have a right and lien on all the funds and property of said institution until they arrive of age; and that the board of trustees could not use the funds or property of the Home for any other purpose. The minors pray that their interest may be protected and the property preserved for the original trust for which it was intended."

By leave of court an answer and cross petition were also filed by the aged inmates of the Home, in which it is alleged: "That Tabitha Home is a charitable institution duly incorporated, as appears from a copy of the articles attached to this cross petition as exhibit A; that the Home was organized and maintained as a charitable institution, . . . and . . . not . . . for profit; that the corporation has no capital and has no funds or income outside of the few contributions, and that it has no property except that in controversy; that all of these inmates who had any funds made a contract with said Home for their support, board, and lodging for the remainder of their lives, and that they paid their money to said Home for that purpose, . . . and before any of the alleged material was furnished or labor done, they entered said institution in pursuance of their contract and payment of their money, and that they were in said Home long before and at the time when it is claimed that these materials were furnished and this labor was done; that the alleged material was not furnished at the request of these inmates, nor for their use and benefit, nor was it necessary to maintain the institution for its original charitable purpose." Then follows a list of the aged inmates, nineteen in number, with the dates of their several entries, extending from November 21, 1887, to June 25, 1913, with the allegation "that they have each contributed all they had to the Home for their support, and that said sums of money so paid were accepted and are being retained by the Home under said contract for maintenance of these inmates; that they paid their money in good faith, and relied upon the charitable purposes of said Home and the articles of incorporation, believing the same to be true; that the Home was incorporated so that no one person might hold, own, or control its property or funds, and that the board of trustees and the officers have no right or interest in this property or funds as individuals, and have no authority to use the funds for other purposes than to support the inmates, and that they have no right or interest as individuals in the property of this institution; that the corporation has elected these officers in order that someone might transact its business in a proper manner, and for no other purpose: that neither the officers nor trustees receive any compensation, and that the corporation has no capital, and is dependent for its support upon free contributions, and that it has no real estate except that in controversy; that the material described in the petition and cross petition herein was not furnished . . . under the direction or request of the board of trustees of said Home, nor was it necessary for the continuance of the trust for which the Home was incorporated and continued; that these inmates, by reason of these facts, have a lien upon the property of the Home for the fulfilment of their said contract, and that the board of trustees or officers could not make any contract to divest these inmates of their said right." The answer concluded with a "prayer for protection of their rights, preservation of the property, and, in the event that the real estate be sold, the money paid in by these inmates may be refunded to them." The articles of incorporation of Tabitha Home are attached to the cross petition, and show that they were filed for record April 4, 1890, and duly recorded in the proper records of Lancaster county; that the objects and business of the corporation are: "First. To erect and maintain an orphans' home for the benefit of the orphans of our land. Second. To erect and maintain a place where the sick and needy and feeble may be cared for. Third. To educate and train parties for the purpose of becoming deaconesses, nurses, and attendants on hospitals, orphan homes, or similar institutions. (4) The transaction of the business of the corporation shall be vested in five trustees to be elected by the members of the corporation, and who shall hold their office during the term of their natural life, except they may be removed for cause or by resignation. (5) The indebtedness of the corporation shall at no time exceed one half of the value of such property as may at the time be owned by it."

The answer of J. H. Humpe, trustee, and a mortgagee, consists of a general denial of the averments of the answers and cross petitions of the alleged mechanics' lien holders, admits that the defendant Tabitha Home is, and for many years has been, duly incorporated as a charitable institution under the laws of this state; that it is the owner of the land described in the petition and cross petitions. It is alleged that for the purpose of securing the payment of certain described notes, amounting in all to the sum of $10,250, issued by the corporation of Tabitha Home, said notes drawing interest as therein provided, and in pursuance of a resolution therefor duly adopted, directing the trustees so to do, they, on the 22d day of September, 1908, duly executed and delivered to said Humpe a trust deed upon the said real estate; that the notes are outstanding and unpaid, though some are not yet due, but that the said trustee has a lien on said property for the security of said notes, which he asks to have protected by the decree of the court.

The Woodmen Accident Association filed an answer and cross petition, setting up the execution of two promissory notes amounting to $8,000, with 6 per cent annual interest, secured by mortgages on the premises involved, which were duly executed by leave of the district court, and the mortgages, duly recorded, constitute prior liens; that the debt was not yet due, and there was no default in the payment of interest. The decree found the mortgages to be the first and prior liens, but not subject to foreclosure. No objections having been made thereto, the mortgages need not be further noticed. Replies were filed to all the cross petitions and the issues fully formed.

A trial was had, which resulted in findings and a decree in favor of plaintiff and all the cross petitioners claiming mechanics' liens, and ordering a foreclosure thereof; that the liens of the several mechanics' lien holders constitute a second lien; that J. H. Humpe, trustee, has a third lien, and is not entitled to a foreclosure thereof; that H. Herpolsheimer Company has a fourth lien. A sale was ordered, and Tabitha Home, the aged inmates, and one Martin, as next friend in behalf of the orphan inmates, have appealed.

At the beginning of the trial it was stipulated that the material and labor furnished by the parties claiming the liens were as stated in the accounts attached to plaintiff's petition and the several cross petitions of the lien holders, and that the statements were filed and recorded as alleged, and the materials were furnished and used on the premises described, but that such stipulation would not be construed to mean that they were furnished by order of Tabitha Home or any of its officers. The stipulation is of considerable length, referring to each cross petition, and stating "that the balance due on the above amounts and items is the amount specified in the petition and in the answers and cross petitions of the respective parties, subject to the defenses tendered here by Tabitha Home as to the legal rights of the parties incurring these expenses to obligate the Tabitha Home to pay for them."

The fact that the material and labor were furnished to remodel one of the buildings is not disputed, but it is contended that it was not furnished for the Home, nor under any contract with the corporation therefor. We find no cross appeal as against the Woodmen Accident Association, nor in favor of J. H. Humpe, trustee. This leaves for our consideration the contention against the mechanics' lien claims, and the Herpolsheimer Company judgment.

It is shown by the record that Tabitha Home is a charitable institution; that the title is in the corporation, with a board of trustees to manage its affairs, who are not vested with the title; that it has no fixed income, and is instituted, supported, and maintained alone by voluntary contributions and donations by the charitably inclined, and by contributions made by the church organization of the denomination in whose interest the Home was created, and by which it is managed, assisted by contributions from others, and is in no sense an organization created and maintained for profit. It has no capital stock, and it is shown that, in carrying out the corporate design, over 2,000 orphans and inmates have been taken care of since its organization; that the aged and infirm have contributed large sums of money, under a stipulation that they should be provided with care and a home during the remainder of their lives, their contributions ranging from $50 to $1,000, according to their ability to pay. It is clear that those inmates, should the decree of the district court be affirmed, will be deprived of the care and support toward which they have contributed, and will be thrown upon the charity of the public for their maintenance and support. There seems to be little, if any, doubt that, should the liens be enforced, the total indebtedness would swallow up the property, and the object of its creation and maintenance would be completely destroyed. On the other hand, should the decree be reversed, and the existence of the liens be denied, plaintiff and cross petitioners would probably lose what they have furnished for the improvement of the property. The importance of the case will therefore be well understood and appreciated.

It appears that Tabitha Home is an institution of charity. The real estate and funds provided for the building were contributed by generous people for the good of human beings who were not able to take care of themselves. It is a general charity. Its benefits are not limited to any class of people, and it appears that its doors are open to all alike. It further appears that certain doctors practising their profession in the city of Lincoln thought it would be a good thing to have a hospital at this institution; that it would help them in their business, and would be of benefit generally. They proposed to the trustees of Tabitha Home to make a hospital there. The trustees of the Home appear to have been cautious and discreet persons, and made a plain arrangement with the doctors that if the hospital was established there, it should be done without expense to the Home. The doctors had an estimate made, and claimed that the improvement could be completed for $6,000. The trustees then authorized them to go ahead and establish a hospital at their own expense and without charge to the Home. Thereupon, the doctors went ahead in a careless sort of way, and incurred an expense of over $20,000, and now these claims are asserted as liens upon the property of the Home. The board of trustees of the Home, and especially the many old people who have put all of their worldly goods and money into the Home on the understanding that they were to have a place of refuge as long as they lived, and the many orphan children who are kept there, some of whom are being kept for a consideration paid by their friends, are all perfectly innocent in this matter; and if the liens in question are established, the inmates will lose everything they have in connection with the Home.

The first question presented and discussed is whether the contractors and materialmen have placed themselves in a position to have a lien upon this property, even if it is ordinary property, and is not protected by the statute. It is by all parties considered that they did not make their contracts with the owners of the property; and if they are held to have had a contract with the owners or trustees, it must be one implied from the conditions and circumstances under which they acted. The title of the property was in the Tabitha Home. The trustees of the Home had made their record plainly show that the property was not to be chargeable with these expenses. On a former occasion when the trustees desired to charge the property with an indebtedness, they applied to the courts for permission to do so, and this was a matter of public record. That this was a charitable institution was also a matter of public record and notoriety. This court has many times held that "a person furnishing material for an improvement on real estate must take notice of the interest and title in the premises of the person with whom he contracted as shown by the public record, as his lien for labor and material, aside from the improvement itself, attaches only to such interest." Waterman v. Stout, 38 Neb. 396, 56 N. W. 987. The question then is whether the parties who furnished the materials, if they intended to charge the accounts against the Tabitha Home and establish a lien thereon, should not have taken notice from the public records showing that the title was in the Home, which was controlled by a board of trustees, and that the trustees, when they made certain improvements on the Home, had themselves applied to the courts for permission to do so. The records of the corporation showed as explicitly as it could be shown that the Tabitha Home was not undertaking to make this improvement, and was not chargeable with the bills. Therefore it cannot be said that the parties had the right to go ahead and assume that the property of this charity was to become chargeable with the bills for material and labor, without making more inquiry than the evidence shows they made. The trustees as a body, or individually, took no action in ordering the material which was used in making the improvement; and no separate or independent action of any one or more of the trustees could create an indebtedness which would eventually ripen into a lien upon the property held in trust by them. Trustees have no power beyond that created by the trust, and any person dealing with them in matters beyond their power does so at his peril. Stark v. Olsen, 44 Neb. 646, 659, 63 N. W. 37; Livermore v. Maxwell, 87 Iowa, 705, 55 N. W. 37; Byron Reed Co. v. Klabunde, 76 Neb. 801, 108 N. W. 133; French v. Griswold College, 60 Iowa, 482, 15 N. W. 273.

In Fordyce v. Woman's Christian Nat. Library Assn. 79 Ark. 561, 7 L.R.A.(N.S.) 490, 96 S. W. 159, it was said: "The immunity of the property of a charity from sale under execution rests on special grounds. The property of a corporation organized solely for charitable purposes is exclusively dedicated to public uses, as much so as the streets and alleys of a town or city; for this purpose the corporation is a mere trustee. Benton v. City Hospital, 140 Mass. 13, 18, 54 Am. Rep. 436, 1 N. E. 836. It is of primary importance to the public that the trust shall be perpetuated. The trustees of the corporation are usually unsalaried agents, devoting their time and labor to the use and benefit of the public. For their own wrongs and misdeeds they are personally answerable, just as are the physician and the attendants in a hospital. If the doctrine of respondeat superior is applied to them, it follows that, along with their other powers, they possess an implied power to destroy, by a wilful violation of their duties, by collusion, or by negligence, the public interests that they are selected to preserve." Further it was said: "A valid vested estate in trust (for charitable purposes) can never lapse or become forfeited by any misconduct in the trustee, or inability in the corporation to execute it, if such existed. Charity never fails; and it is the right, as well as the duty, of the sovereign, by its courts and public officers, as also by the legislature (if needed), to have the charities properly administered." Girard v. Philadelphia, 7 Wall. 15, 19 L. ed. 56. "With regard to the liability of charitable corporations or their trustees for the negligence of their agents or employees, there is some difference of opinion, but the decided weight of authority denies such liability; this on two grounds: First, that if this liability were admitted, the trust fund might be wholly destroyed and diverted from the purpose for which it was given, thus thwarting the donor's intent, as the result of negligence for which he was in no wise responsible; second, that since the trustees cannot divert the funds by their direct act from the purposes for which they were donated, such funds cannot be indirectly diverted by the tortious or negligent acts of the managers of the funds or their agents or employees."

It follows that in this case the board of trustees could not do by indirection what they could not do directly. Avery v. Baker, 27 Neb. 388, 20 Am. St. Rep. 672, 43 N. W. 174; Grisson v. Hill, 17 Ark. 483; Fordyce v. Woman's Christian Nat. Library Asso. supra; Zion Church v. Parker, 114 Iowa, 1, 86 N. W. 60.

Another question of importance is whether the property of the Home could be encumbered with a mortgage or otherwise, except under the direction of the court providing what the money realized on the encumbrance should be used for. At the common law no lien was allowed upon church property. The revenue of a religious corporation and any profits realized from this property could be appropriated by the creditors, but not the property itself. Phillips, Mechanics' Liens, 3d ed. § 185, after reciting this condition of the common law, says: "It is well worthy of consideration whether all who deal with it do not contract upon the credit of these resources [the revenues and profits derived therefrom] alone."

It appears that many cases have arisen in this country in which, in the absence of any statute on the subject, the courts have been divided upon the proposition as to whether any mechanics' lien could be established upon church property.

The property in question in the case at bar was owned by the Tabitha Home, a corporation organized for the purpose of holding the title thereof. This corporation is not a religious society. A religious society, however, concluded to build a home. They solicited funds from the charitably inclined with which to construct it, and, of course, the religious society itself contributed towards the construction of the building. If we look to the form of the matter only, this was not the property of a religious society; if we look to the substance, however, it was the property of such society. If it can be held to be the property of a religious society, it comes directly within § 651 of the Revised Statutes of 1913, and if it does, then, in case it is desired to sell or exchange the property or encumber it by a mortgage or otherwise, the district court, upon petition and good cause shown, might authorize it to be done; and if that authority was granted, there would be included in the order a direction as to how the proceeds of the encumbrance should be appropriated or invested. Such order would require that the proceeds be appropriated and invested in accordance with the original terms upon which the real estate became invested or intrusted to such religious society. The lien holders, however, have cited some sections of the statute, which is a general one, and intended to cover other cases of organized societies besides religious societies, and which, of course, would not have any application to the case at bar. Their attempted application of those sections of the statute does not appear to be warranted by the Revised Statutes of 1913, where the various sections of the statute are arranged. Section 651, Rev. Stat. 1913, provides: "When any real estate shall have been or may hereafter be bequeathed, aliened, donated, or otherwise intrusted to any religious society in this state, or to any of the trustees or officers of any such society, and such society shall be desirous to sell, exchange, or encumber by mortgage or otherwise, any such real estate, it shall be lawful for the district court of the proper county, upon good cause shown upon petition of any such society, or some person authorized by them, to make an order authorizing the sale or encumbrance of any such real estate, and said court may include in such order directions how the proceeds of such sale, or encumbrance shall be appropriated or invested: Provided, such order shall in no case be inconsistent with the original terms upon which such real estate became invested in or intrusted to such religious society." It appears beyond all question that the organization was for charitable purposes, and was under the jurisdiction and control of the Evangelical Lutheran church, and it is our view that it was within the provisions of the statute above quoted. If this be true, no action was had of any kind, as directed by the statute, conferring authority upon the board of trustees, which could result in the creation of a lien or an encumbrance upon the property; and, as we view the record, no liens were created, for it was beyond the power of the board to do by indirection what they could not do directly.

While there is some conflict in the authorities, the great weight of the adjudicated cases favors the conclusions above expressed. It is to be regretted that the claimants, seeking to establish their liens, are denied that remedy; but, on the other hand, a decree establishing such liens, and an order of foreclosure, would divert the property from the charitable purposes to which it has been dedicated, and would completely destroy its object, with the result that the orphans and the aged and infirm inmates of the Home would be left without any means of support, and would be thrown upon the general public for suitable care and maintenance. As we view the authorities, this should not be done.

The judgment of the District Court, establishing the claimants' liens, and ordering a foreclosure and sale to satisfy the same, is reversed, and the cause is remanded to the District Court for such other and further proceedings in harmony with this opinion as may be desired.

Letton, J., dissenting:

I am unable to agree with the conclusion of fact announced in the opinion, and also with the legal principles stated as applying to the facts in evidence in the case. I therefore dissent.

Rose, J., dissents upon the same ground.

Hamer, J., concurring:

The corporation seems to have been organized as a charitable institution to maintain a home for orphans and aged people,—persons who are unable to provide for themselves. The purpose of the existence of the institution is not for profit. It has no property except that in controversy. The aged persons, for the benefit of whom the Home in part exists, appeared to have contributed all their means to establish and maintain it. This was done under a contract, so that the inmates should have a home that would shield them in their old age, infirmity, and feebleness.

It is provided in its articles of incorporation that the transaction of the business of the Home "shall be vested in five trustees, to be elected by the members of the corporation." These trustees have no authority to bind the corporation and create a debt against it, unless they act within the purposes of the corporation as set forth in its articles. The thing proposed to be built, and for which it is claimed the indebtedness on mechanics' liens was incurred, was a hospital. I am unable to see how these people needed a hospital. Suppose that the trustees had undertaken to construct a flour mill, would they have had authority to do it? Could they engage in any sort of commercial venture? Could they do anything outside of that which the articles of incorporation would naturally include? The character of the occupation of the trustees was such that it demanded of the one who would do business with them a critical inspection of their powers.

The hospital was to be built without expense to the Home. The doctors who were going to build it so represented to the trustees. Therefore the mechanics' lien people can only look to the doctors. They certainly cannot look to the trustees, who never intended to incur an obligation against this charitable institution. If there is to be a loss, let those whose vigilance in getting business made the loss possible suffer for it. The helpless orphans and the feeble old people should not be turned out of their refuge because the doctors overestimated what they could do, or because they conceived the idea of building a hospital for a charitable institution which did not need it, and whose articles of incorporation did not contemplate it.

Section 153, chap. 16, Comp. Stat. 1911, contains a provision that all funds received by any such corporation (charity society) shall be used in the first instance, or shall be vested and the income thereof used (after paying the necessary expenses), "for the exclusive purpose set forth in the articles of association, and no portion thereof shall be used for any such purpose except within this state, and no portion of the funds of any such corporation shall be used or contributed towards the erection, completion, or furnishing of any building not owned or used by such corporation."

Section 154c of the same chapter provides that "the books, records, and files pertaining to any such home shall be subject to the inspection of the auditor of public accounts of this state, or any deputy or clerk authorized by him to inspect the same." It is further provided in the same section that, "in case of any diversion of the funds or other property acquired by any organization under this act, from the object and purposes of such home or homes, or funds therefor, the attorney general is hereby authorized to bring suit in any court having general jurisdiction in equity matters in the state, to restrain and prevent any diversion of such funds or property, and to adjust any and all wrongs concerning the same."

It will be seen that the spirit of this legislation tends to prevent any diversion of the property from the charitable purpose intended. It seems to the writer that, if the trustees undertook to endanger the safety of the property by engaging in a contract which might encumber it with mechanics' liens in carrying out a purpose not contemplated by the articles of incorporation, such effort of the trustees would be beyond their jurisdiction, and forbidden by the general spirit of our laws towards charitable institutions.

I. Introductory.

Interlineations or changes by a testator after signing his will are sometimes made during its execution (as in RE BULLIVANT); sometimes, when made thereafter, there is a formal attempt to publish them, but most often they are made after the execution and without any formal publication. In this last most numerous class, the questions arise (1) whether the change amounts to an intent to revoke the will in whole or in part, and if so, what effect can be given to it; or (2) whether the change is simply of new matters. Theoretically any change an interlineation to effectuate that intent was made, the will was then published, and the signature acknowledged in the presence of the witnesses, who thereupon subscribed their names as witnesses in the presence of the testator. Held, that the will with the interlineation was signed by the testator. Same — signature — adoption of sign.

2. A testator may adopt as his sign his own sign manual made at the foot of his will before its completion. His acknowledgment makes it his signature to the will as it stands.

It is not intended to discuss in this note the question of dependent relative revocation, which is considered generally in the note to Strong's Appeal, 6 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1107, and also in the note in 38 L.R.A.(N.S.) 802, in relation to attempt to revoke part of will.

For burden of explaining erasures or alterations appearing upon face of will, see the note to Scott v. Thrall, 17 L.R.A.(N.S.) 184.

For admissibility of declarations of testator on issue of his intention in destroying his will, see the note to Managle v. Parker, 24 L.R.A.(N.S.) 180.

For the question whether the testator may sign the will after the witnesses have signed, see the notes to Brooks v. Woodson, 14 L.R.A. 160, and Re Horn, 26 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1126.

It is not intended to go into the question of interlineations in holographic wills, where, under the statute, such wills do not require to be witnessed. For the subject of necessity of witnesses to holographic wills, see the note to LaRue v. Lee, 14 L.R.A.(N.S.) 968.

This note does not discuss the cases where the question is whether an addition below the testator's signature was made before or after the execution of the will, upon the theory that if the addition is a part of the original will, then the document was not signed at the end, but that if it was made after the execution of the will, it should be excluded from probate. See Teed's Estate, 225 Pa. 633, 133 Am. St. Rep. 896, 74 Atl. 51 L.R.A.(N.S.)

Swayze, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

We agree with the judge of the orphans' court that the evidence shows a publication of the will. The only legal question involved in the case is whether the will was signed by the testator as the statute requires. What happened was that the testator, after he had subscribed his name, desired to insert a bequest of an automobile. An interlineation to effectuate that intent was made, the will was then published, and the signature acknowledged in the presence of the witnesses, who thereupon subscribed their names as witnesses in the presence of the testator. The point made is that the testator never subscribed his name to the will as completed, and the question is

II. Changes during execution or upon the same occasion.

In RE BULLIVANT the change was made after the testator had signed his will, but before he published it to the witnesses, and it was held that this was a sufficient signing under the statute.

In Bateman v. Mariner, 5 N. C. (1 Murph.) 176, where a will was signed and attested by one witness, and after immaterial changes, it was attested by another witness, and later published in the presence of both witnesses, it was held that the will was sufficiently attested, both as to real and personal estate. But this seems to have been on the ground that the changes were immaterial.

In Grigg v. Williams, 51 N. C. (6 Jones, L.) 518, it was held that the will was not invalidated where, after it had been signed and attested, the two witnesses still being present, the testator asked one of them to be an executor, whereupon the other witness inserted the name of such executor; thereafter, such executor, a third person, and the testator being present, the third person subscribed the will as a witness and the executor then erased his signature as witness, the other original witness not then being present. While it does not appear that any effect was given to the change, the court said: "The witness and the testator were both present, and the execution of the paper was in fieri, when the name of the additional executor was inserted at the instance of the testator, and with the knowledge and concurrence of the witness."

But in Crane v. Marshal, 1 Mart. N. S. 577, it was held that the will was void where a testator made alterations in it after it had been witnessed by some of the witnesses, and before it was witnessed by other witnesses.

whether his acknowledgment of his own sign manual amounts to a signing. The statute makes a distinction between the act of the testator and the act of the subscribing witnesses. Comp. Stat. 5867, pl. 24. He must sign; they must subscribe their names. Under the English statute before 1837, there had been several decisions as to the meaning of the word "sign." A mark, initials, a wrong or assumed name, an engraved die, were all held to suffice. 1 Jarman, Wills, Randolph & T's ed. 201 ff.; 1 Williams, Exrs. 6th Am. ed. 103. In short the construction put upon the word "signed" by the courts is the original meaning of a signum or sign, rather than the derivative meaning of a sign manual or handwriting. This construction harmonizes with the change in the language of the statute when it came to the subscribing witnesses, who are required to subscribe their names. This signum must be the sign of the testator, as Chancellor Zabriskie held. Re McElwaine, 18 N. J. Eq. 499. The question, therefore, comes to this, Can a testator adopt as his sign his own sign manual made at the foot of the will before its completion? We see no reason why he may not do so as well as adopt a mark, an engraved signature, or a false name, as held in the cases cited by Jarman. The important thing is that the will should be complete at the time of publication and attestation. As Justice Gray said in Chase v. Kittredge, 11 Allen, 49, 64, 87 Am. Dec. 687: "A testator may alter his will as he pleases at any time before

English statute.

It was held in Hindmarsh v. Charlton, 8 H. L. Cas. 160, that the will was not sufficiently executed where it was signed in the presence of one witness, who then subscribed it, and on a later occasion, the same witness being present, the will was acknowledged to him and a second witness, the second witness then subscribing it, after which the first witness inserted the date in the will and completed his signature, which had been incomplete as to the form of one of the letters. The ground of the decision was that the completion by the first witness of his former signature was not a new subscription, and did not satisfy the statute (1 Vict. chap. 26, § 9), which required that a will to be valid "shall be signed at the foot, or end thereof, by the testator, or by some other person in his presence and by his direction; and such signature shall be made or acknowledged by the testator in the presence of two or more witnesses present at the same time; and such witnesses shall attest and shall subscribe the will in the presence of the testator."

The initials of the testator and the witnesses in the margin are sufficient signatures to an alteration under the English statute. Re Blewitt, L. R. 5 Prob. Div. 116, where, after a will had been duly attested, and apparently at the same time, two interlineations were made, and the testatrix then, in the presence of the subscribing witnesses, signed her initials in the margin of the will opposite the interlineations, and the witnesses added their initials. The statute (1 Vict. chap. 26, § 21) provided: "No obliteration, interlineation or other alteration made in any will after the execution thereof shall be valid . . . unless such alteration shall be executed in like manner as hereinbefore is required for the execution of the will, but the will with such alteration as part thereof shall be deemed to be duly executed if the signature of the testator and the subscription of the witnesses be made in the margin, or on some other part of the will opposite or near to such alteration or at the foot or end of or opposite to a memorandum referring to such alteration, and written at the end or some other part of the will."

But the initials of the witnesses alone are not sufficient. Shearn's Goods, 43 L. T. N. S. 736, 29 Week. Rep. 445, 50 L. J. Prob. N. S. 15, 45 J. P. 308, where, immediately after the execution of the will, an interlineation was made and the witnesses put their initials opposite it, and it was held that the will must be admitted as originally written. Compare Dewell's Goods, 17 Jur. 1130, infra, III.

III. Changes after execution attempted to be published.

The attempts at publication are of such variety as to make any arrangement of the cases arbitrary.

Without new signatures.

Generally speaking, a republication of a will without any new signatures, after changes, is insufficient to give effect to the new matter, but the contrary was held in Wright v. Wright, 5 Ind. 389, where, at a later time than the execution of the will, the testator sent for the witnesses and in their presence an additional clause was interlined without any reattestation or signing, and it was held that the new clause was properly executed and attested.

And in 2 Eq. Cas. Abr. 770, the judges discussed, but did not, it seems, decide, the question whether the statute of frauds requiring written alterations of devises to be signed in the presence of witnesses had been obeyed where a testator, after his will had been made before four witnesses, had an interlineation made in it of a certain devise for life, and put his seal to it, and published it before three of the same witnesses.

But in Hesterberg v. Clark, 166 Ill. 241, 57 Am. St. Rep. 135, 46 N. E. 734, where, two days after the execution of the will, the testator sent for the witnesses and in their presence had interlined a legacy, there being no new signatures or re-signing, it it is formally attested. He may write it out in full, and sign it, and it has no effect as a will until duly attested. It is unimportant whether it is or is not signed by the testator until it is produced to the witnesses. It is only important that it should be his will in writing and signed when they attest and subscribe it, and it is equally his will in writing whether signed in their presence or at some previous time." This opinion was cited by us on another point in Lacey v. Dobbs, 63 N. J. Eq. 325, 55 L.R.A. 580, 92 Am. St. Rep. 667, 50 Atl. 497, without any suggestion of disapproval. It may be conceded that under the circumstances of this case the will offered for probate was not signed by the testator within the meaning of the statute until he adopted his own handwriting as his signature to the will by acknowledging it to be such in the presence of the witnesses. That acknowledgment made it his signature to the will as it stands. As we said in Ludlow v. Ludlow, 36 N. J. Eq. 597, at page 600, the statute of 1851 made the acknowledgment of the signature proof of signing. The opinion of Chancellor Zabriskie in the McElwaine Case is not to the contrary. There the signature had been made by another, the testatrix "did not, after her name was signed, touch the paper, or say that it was her signature, and there is no proof that, after her name was signed, she acknowledged or declared that it was her will." The ordinary in that case was dealing with a signature made by another, and he prop-was held that the will must be admitted to probate as originally written, and the interlineation was of no effect. The court disapproved the case of Wright v. Wright, supra.

So, also, it was held that the changes were not properly executed, and that the will as originally executed was not invalidated, where—

—by the testator's direction certain legacies were reduced, the date changed, and the paper reacknowledged to the subscribing witnesses, but no new signatures were put upon it, the court observing that he did not see how a careful interlineation could be an obliteration within the statute. Dixon's Appeal, 55 Pa. 424;

—the testator took out some of the sheets of the will, tore them up, or they were destroyed, acknowledged new sheets to the witnesses, and they reacknowledged their signatures, touching them. O'Neill v. Owen, 17 Ont. Rep. 525 (where the contents of the original sheets were proven);

—an interlineation was made by a scrivener at the direction of the testator, and declared simply in the presence of one of the witnesses to the will, and the scrivener, but they did not attest it. Wheeler v. Bent, 7 Pick. 61.

The will was refused probate where the witnesses to it were father and son, and at the time of probate the son was dead, and it appeared upon the testimony of the father that subsequently to the execution of the will two erasures in it were made by him at the testator's instruction, and further that, after the erasures were made, the testator reacknowledged his will in the presence of the witness and of his deceased son, who was the other witness. The court considered that the presumptive proof of execution by the subscribing witness was destroyed by the further proof of the alterations by the subscribing witness, so that the witness had proved only the altered will, and that therefore there was only one witness to the will as originally executed. Charles v. Huber, 78 Pa. 448.

In Derr v. Greenawalt, 76 Pa. 239, where a will was executed with a blank for the name of the residuary legatee, and this was afterward filled in at the testator's direction, and one of the subscribing witnesses testified to its being done, but the person who filled in the name was not able to remember the circumstances, and to say that he did it at the request of the testator, it was held that the residuary bequest must be stricken out of the will. It would seem that the statute did not require that the proof should be made by subscribing witnesses.

It may be noted that the will was admitted to probate as originally written in Simrell's Estate, 154 Pa. 604, 35 Am. St. Rep. 864, 26 Atl. 599, where a witness testified that after the execution of the will she had, at the testatrix' direction, made interlineations and erasures in it.

Marginal signatures—English statute.

Under § 21 of 1 Vict., quoted supra II., changes have been held properly executed where——there were interlineations, against each of which, on the margin, was the signature of the testator and of the witnesses. Wingrove's Goods, 15 Jur. 91;

—a testator, after the execution of his will, made an alteration therein, called in the witnesses who had attested the will, and put his initials opposite the change, and had them put their initials there also. Hinds's Goods, 16 Jur. 1161 (where later unattested erasures were disregarded);

—the testator made a change in the clause appointing his executors, which began near the foot of the second page, striking out the name of an executor which appeared on that page, and interlined the name of an additional executor on the top of the third page, and then on the second page in the margin opposite the beginning of the clause, he wrote his signature, which was followed by the word "witnesses" and by the signatures of the attesting witnesses all on that page. Wilkinson's Goods, L. R. 6 Prob. Div. 100, 29 Week. Rep. 896, 45 J. P. 716.

erly dwelt on the danger involved, and intimated that even that would suffice if done in the testator's presence and by his express direction. The danger dwelt upon by the ordinary in that case is, however, no greater than the danger of opening the door to parol testimony to prove that the sign manual of the testator duly acknowledged as his signature was not signed by him to the completed paper on which it is written. What Chancellor Zabriskie feared was the lack of any act by the testator; but in this case we have such an act. It would have been mere idle form for him to write his name again. He must, indeed, adopt by his acknowledgment the name already written as his sign to the then completed will; but that, also, he did. Later

Chancellor McGill in Fritz v. Turner, 46 N. J. Eq. 515, 22 Atl. 125, held that the signature was good, although the testator's hand was guided by the draughtsman, and it was a disputed question whether the testator could write at all. "The important question," he said, "is whether the testator had the purpose to write his name or make his mark upon the will as his signature to it, and whether, in fact, he did make such a physical effort to sign as resulted in a mark upon the paper by which the paper could be identified." While the decree was reversed (49 N. J. Eq. 343, 25 Atl. 963), it does not seem to have been on any ground that affected the chancellor's view on this point, for, if that had been the case, it would have been quite unnecessary for the

It was held that the execution of the changes was sufficient where, after a will had been attested by two witnesses, A and B, the testator made changes in it, and had it attested again by two witnesses, B and C, C being a legatee whose legacy had not been changed. Malloy v. McNair, 49 N. C. (4 Jones, L.) 297.

In Dewell's Goods, 17 Jur. 1130, it was held that the alterations were sufficiently made where a testator, after having made his will, made two interlineations, and the subscribing witnesses put their initials in the margin opposite thereto, and below the old attestation the testator had written an attestation clause of republication, etc., stating the changes and the date, which was signed by the witnesses, but not by the testator. The court does not refer to the fact that the testator thereafter executed a codicil.

The changes were held to be of no effect, and the will was admitted to probate as originally written——where the name of the sister of the testatrix had been written with an error as to her Christian name several times in the will, and this was changed to the correct name, and the testatrix summoned the witnesses and traced her signature with a dry pen, and the witnesses put their initials opposite the changes. Martin's Goods, 1 Rob. Eccl. Rep. 712;

—where the testator interlined words so as to include in a devise lands purchased since the making of the will, and indorsed on the will an instrument as to the alteration, and attested it in the presence of two witnesses, the law requiring three. Jackson ex dem. Howard v. Holloway, 7 Johns. 394;

—where the testator, a day or two after executing the will, told one of the witnesses that his signature and address were badly written, and the testator thereupon erased part of the signature of that witness, and had him rewrite part of it, with his address. Coleman's Goods, 2 Swabey & T. 314, 30 L. J. Prob. N. S. 170, 5 L. T. N. S. 119; 51 L.R.A.(N.S.)

—where a witness, by the direction of the testator, erased his own signature in order that he might not lose a legacy in the will, and later the testator had the other original witness trace his signature with a dry pen in the presence of an additional witness, who then signed his name as a witness. Playne v. Scriven, 7 Notes of Cases, 122.

The will was admitted to probate as originally written in Re Penniman, 20 Minn. 245, Gil. 220, 18 Am. Rep. 368, where Wm. A. Penniman sometime after the execution of his will made in it certain erasures and interlineations in his own handwriting, and then had two new witnesses sign a memorandum below the will stating that the erasures and interlineations were made by Wm. A. Penniman such a day, and were witnessed by them, it appearing that the number and character of the interlineations and erasures were not pointed out to the witnesses at the time of the attestation. The court considered that the witnessing was of the changes only; that there had been no sufficient attestation under the statute; that the will had not been properly re-executed, and that the erasures could not take effect, as they constituted dependent relative revocation.

In Kirke v. Kirke, 4 Russ. Ch. 435, 6 L. J. Ch. 143 (1828) where alterations reducing legacies charged on real estate were followed by a codicil not properly attested, embracing such changes, it was held that the will must stand as originally written.

For other cases of alterations embraced in subsequent invalid testamentary instruments, see the note to Strong's Appeal, 6 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1107.

IV. Changes after execution not published.

a. In general.

Most cases of changes and interlineations by testators occur after execution, without any attempt at republication of the changed will before witnesses. In jurisdictions where attestation by subscribing witnesses court of errors and appeals to send the case back for further testimony; the undisputed facts would have been fatal to the validity of the will.

If we look to the analogies of the law, we are sustained in our view. A promissory note must be signed, and a deed must be sealed. If it could be said that these requirements were not complied with in cases where the instruments were altered, all the discussion in the books as to the distinction between material and immaterial alterations, and between alterations by a party and alterations by a stranger, would have been idle, since it would have sufficed to say that the document produced has never been signed or sealed. Has it ever been suggested that a promissory note ceased to be such because altered by the maker after he had put his name thereto, or that a deed was not sealed because after the seal was affixed an alteration was made by the grantor? In these cases the instrument speaks from the time of delivery; a will becomes effective by acknowledgment of the signature and publication.

For these reasons, we think the will offered for probate was signed by the testator as the statute requires, and the decree is affirmed. The case, however, is a proper one for allowance of costs out of the estate.

Gummere, Ch. J., dissents.

Garrison, J., dissenting:

I think that the signing of his will by a is requisite to a will, an unattested change by way of addition to the will cannot be made. But there are many cases which discuss the questions whether an unattested change may take effect (1) as a revocation of the entire will, or (2) as a partial revocation. In fact, there are few cases in the jurisdictions referred to upon the effect of unattested changes, which are not decided upon the basis of whether there has or has not been at least a partial revocation under the statute in force. These cases it seems all proceed on the principle that an unattested addition is without effect, and that the only way in which any effect can be given to the change is by way of revocation at least of part of the will, and if it cannot be given effect as a partial or total revocation, the will must stand as originally executed, if the original words can be recovered. There is in the note to Hartz v. Sobel, 38 L.R.A.(N.S.) 797, a full discussion of the cases upon attempt to revoke portions of a will by burning, tearing, canceling, obliterating, or destroying, and the reader will see that most of the cases involve additions as well as omissions, and substitutions as well as mere reductions.

Speaking, then, of wills which require attesting witnesses, unattested changes or interlineations in them amounting to substitutions or new matter cannot be given effect as new dispositions. *Wolf v. Where, after the execution of a will in which a blank had been left for the name of the executor, the name of such executor was inserted, and a clause of no effect was erased from the will, it was held that the will would be admitted to probate as originally written. Southworth v. Southworth, 173 Mo. 59, 73 S. W. 129.

In Watson v. Hinson, 162 N. C. 72, 77 S. E. 1089, where the case went back for a new trial, the court said that where the name of an executor who had died was erased, and another substituted at the testator's direction, this had no effect on the will, although if the executor had been alive when the change was made, it would have had the effect of striking his name out of the will, but not of substituting the person written in in his place.

In Greer v. McCrackin, Peck. (Tenn.) 301, 14 Am. Dec. 755, it was held that an unattested change as to a devise was ineffectual, but that one as to a legacy was valid, the statute of Tennessee then in force not having changed the effect of the statute of frauds or of wills of personality.

In Ravenscroft v. Hunter, 2 Hagg. Eccl. Rep. 65 (1828) alterations subsequent to execution, it seems, relating to personal estate, were admitted to probate.

Under the statute, unattested additions will be disregarded, and the will admitted as originally written if the original words can be recovered.

Locke v. James, 11 Mees. & W. 901 (change in annuity charged on real estate); testator must, under our statute, be the signing of his written will. The statute calls it the "signature" of the testator, and, whether it be his sign, mark, signum, or sign manual, such testamentary act must take place in the order named in the statute,—be after the writing of the will. It is this "signature" that the testator may acknowledge to the witnesses in case it was not made in their presence; such acknowledgment is therefore a substitute in the alternative for the visual act of the witnessing of the making of the signature. If the witnesses have witnessed the signing by the testator, an acknowledgment is not authorized by the statute, and, if it were, would not advance the transaction beyond what such witnesses had in fact witnessed.

In fine the acknowledgment merely identifies the testator's signature as of the time when, had the witnesses seen him make it, they would have witnessed the act that is thus acknowledged solely because they did not so witness it. Whether witnessed or acknowledged, the testamentary act in question remains identically the same. The present case, therefore, by force of the testator's acknowledgment of his signature, stands precisely as if the witnesses had seen him make it, in which case they would have seen him sign his name to a paper that was not his will. Such a signing, whether it be witnessed or acknowledged, is not the statutory signing by the testator of his written will, for a will is not written until it is completed any more than it is before

S. 808; McCabe's Goods, L. R. 3 Prob. & Div. 94 (substitution of one residuary legatee for another); Greenwood's Goods [1892] P. 7, 61 L. J. Prob. N. S. 56, 66 L. T. N. S. 61 (substitution of one person as executor for another); Simmons v. Rudall, 15 Jur. 162, 1 Sim. N. S. 115 (substitutions of devisees, etc.); Brooke v. Kent, 3 Moore, P. C. C. 334 (reducing amounts of jointures chargeable by tenants for life); Brasier's Goods [1899] P. 36, 68 L. J. Prob. N. S. 6, 47 Week. Rep. 272, 79 L. T. N. S. 472 (additional devisees).

Reduction of gifts, etc.

So, the will has been admitted to probate as originally written where the change consisted in a reduction of the amount of a legacy. Re Lang, 9 Misc. 521, 30 N. Y. Supp. 388; Wetmore v. Carryl, 5 Redf. 544; Jeffery v. Cancer Hospital, 57 L. T. N. S. 600, 51 J. P. 503; Rippin's Goods, 3 Curt. Eccl. Rep. 121.

Prior to the statute 1 Vict. chap. 26, unattested alterations reducing certain legacies charged on real estate were disregarded as ineffectual attempts at substitutions. Kirke v. Kirke, 4 Russ. Ch. 435, 6 L. J. Ch. 143.

So, the change has been disregarded under the statute of frauds, where it consisted in striking out or reducing devisees. Winsor v. Pratt, 3 Brod. & B. 650 (prior to statute 1 Vict.).

But it may be noted here that in Swinton v. Bailey, L. R. 4 App. Cas. 70, 48 L. J. Exch. N. S. 57, 39 L. T. N. S. 581, 27 Week. Rep. 293, it was held, as to a will executed and altered before the statute 1 Vict., that erasing from a clause of a devise in fee the words, "her heirs and assigns forever" was a valid revocation of 51 L.R.A. (N.S.)

all except the life estate, under the statute of frauds.

See also for other cases of alteration disregarded under the English statute, Burgoyne v. Showler, 1 Rob. Eccl. Rep. 5, 8 Jur. 814; Williams v. Ashton, 1 Johns. & H. 115, 3 L. T. N. S. 177.

It is usual in New York to meet with the general statement that unattested alterations will be disregarded. Re Twombly, 4 Month. L. Bull. (N. Y.) 24; Dyer v. Erving, 2 Dem. 160; Re Wilcox, 46 N. Y. S. R. 877, 20 N. Y. Supp. 131.

b. As revocation of the whole will.

(1) In general.

As appears from the note to Hartz v. Sobel, 38 L.R.A. (N.S.) 805, in case of a partial revocation the rest of the instrument will be admitted to probate, and where a pro tanto revocation is not allowable, the will as originally written will be probated.

The reader will notice in subdivision III. supra, that in a number of the cases it is held that the attempted change did not avoid the will.

"It is the general rule that alterations made after its execution upon the face of a will, for the purpose of amending its provisions, will not revoke the will as a whole." Jersey v. Jersey, 146 Mich. 660, 110 N. W. 54 (obiter).

So, reducing a legacy, if permissible, will not revoke the will (Tudor v. Tudor, 17 B. Mon. 383); nor an ineffectual interlineation of a legacy (Doane v. Hadlock, 42 Me. 72); nor immaterial interlineations made after execution (Rowan's Estate, 234 Pa. 584, 83 Atl. 429); nor a change in the date of the will made by the testator with no intention of revocation, but rather of sustaining the will (Overall v. Overall, Litt. Sel. Cas. (Ky.) 501); nor the addition of an unsigned memorandum at the foot of it (Heise v. Heise, 31 Pa. 246).

In Wells v. Wells, 4 T. B. Mon. 152, 16 Am. Dec. 150, it was held that striking out the name of one executor and inserting the name of another person as executor, in the

it is commenced. A will thus executed in the inverse order of the statute, i. e., first signed, then reduced to writing, and such previous signature then acknowledged, is no more a compliance with the statute than if the witnesses had witnessed the testator write his name on a piece of blank paper, on which, over his name, his will was afterwards written. In fine, if a testator has not in fact signed his written will, no acknowledgment he can make can alter that fact or supply that deficiency, for it is only his signature he can acknowledge,—not his will,—and in the last analysis the fundamental error is that of construing the statute as if it authorized the testator to acknowledge his will, i. e., to adopt as his will a writing that had not been signed by him. The proper construction of the statute stated in a single sentence is that the acknowledgment is a substitute for the circumstantial act of the witnesses, i. e., their actual witnessing of the writing of his signature by the testator in case they have omitted so to do; but that it is not a substitute for the essential act of the testator, i. e., the signing of his written will, which in no case can he omit to do. Being unable to adopt a construction of the statute that varies its plain terms, and which, by dispensing with the signing by the testator of his written will, dispenses with all of the safeguards thus thrown around this essential testamentary act, no course is open to me but to deny that the will in the present case was properly admitted to probate.

presence of one of the witnesses, but with no formal republication, does not vacate the will; but it does not appear whether any effect was given to the change.

In Re Knapen, 75 Vt. 146, 98 Am. St. Rep. 808, 53 Atl. 1003, it was held that "the interlineations of new and independent bequests are, of course, ineffectual. Neither do they invalidate the will."

Where the greater part of a will had been canceled and altered, it was admitted to probate as originally written. Re Crawford, 80 Misc. 615, 142 N. Y. Supp. 1032.

There are, however, a few cases in which it has been held that partial erasures, etc., effected a revocation of an entire will.

Thus, in Bohanon v. Walcot, 1 How. (Miss.) 336, 20 Am. Dec. 631, where the testator, wishing another person to write a new will for him, handed him his will of 1831, with changes and interlineations in it, and told him of other changes he desired, saying that he had done away with that will, and that if such person did not write a new will for him, he wished his older will of 1829 to stand, and no new will was made, it was held that he died intestate.

In Law v. Law, 83 Ala. 432, 3 So. 752, it was held error to exclude evidence tending to show that the testator, at the time of erasing the name of a legatee and afterward, declared his intention to be thereby to revoke the entire will.

In Dammann v. Dammann, — Md. —, 28 Atl. 408, it was held that the whole will must fail where the testator had, by erasures and marginal notes, removed a considerable portion of his will to such an extent that the remaining clauses, if standing alone, would be uncertain, unintelligible, and repugnant to the entire scheme of the will; and that the intent of the testator was to revoke the whole will and make a new one.

It may be noted that in Home of the Aged v. Bantz, 107 Md. 543, 60 Atl. 376, it was held where the testator struck out part of a clause disposing of a remainder after a life estate in the earlier part of the clause, that this did not render the entire will void, but that the part stricken out would be eliminated from probate.

(2) Cancellation of signatures.

It is in general not intended to include cases where there has been a tearing, cutting, or burning of the will, though two or three cases of this kind are referred to.

The cases of canceled signatures, under the "canceling" and "obliterating" clause of the statutes, are often complicated by the circumstances in which the will was kept or found. This note presupposes that the cancellation has been made by the testator. Some of the cases on canceled signatures will be found infra, under "Words of Cancellation."

Cancellation of the testator's signature has been held to effect revocation of the will—

—where there was "a strong black line" drawn through the testator's signature. Baptist Church v. Robbarts, 2 Pa. St. 110;

—where there were three lines drawn through the signature in black ink. Re Philip, 46 N. Y. S. R. 356, 19 N. Y. Supp. 13;

—where the signature of the testator was crossed out by two lines and the name of the residuary legatee crossed out. Clark's Will, 1 Tucker, 445;

—where the testatrix, calling on persons present to witness that she destroyed her will, drew one line across her signature, and then a line through each of the two words thereof at an obtuse angle, the words of the statute being "burning, tearing, or obliterating." Glass v. Scott, 14 Colo. App. 377, 60 Pac. 186;

—where the testator's signature and his name in the attestation clause were each blackened by a considerable number of parallel and circular lines and cross marks in lead pencil, there being convincing evidence of his intent to revoke, and the words of the statute being "shall destroy or mutilate the same." Woodfill v. Patton, 76 Ind. 575, 40 Am. Rep. 269.

In Doe ex dem. Crooks v. Cummings, 6 U. C. Q. B. 305, where the testator's signature and the seal had been struck across with a pen and a new will drafted, it was found by the jury that the testator meant to die intestate, and it was held accordingly.

"The tearing out of the seal and of part of the signature of the testatrix, and the obliteration of the names signed to the will, are a cancellation of the will." Re White, 25 N. J. Eq. 502.

In England, where the words of the statute (1 Vict.) are limited to "burning, tearing, or otherwise destroying," the will has been admitted to probate where there are lines drawn through the testator's signature. Benson v. Benson, L. R. 2 Prob. & Div. 172, 40 L. J. Prob. N. S. 1, 23 L. T. N. S. 709, 19 Week. Rep. 190.

But probate was denied where it could not be told whether the paper had ever been witnessed. Thus, in James's Goods, 7 Jur. N. S. 52, the will only was admitted to probate where, besides the will, there was a paper purporting to be a codicil signed by the testator, but there was an obliteration in the place where the signatures of the witnesses would properly have appeared, and nothing could be read, or no information obtained as to signatures of witnesses.

And it was on account of the "tearing" that probate was refused in Williams v. Tyley, 5 Jur. N. S. 35, Johns. V. C. (Eng.) 536, 7 Week. Rep. 116, where the will consisted of five sheets, and the testator had signed each sheet and in the testimonium clause had stated that he had signed the other sheets, and thereafter he tore off his signature from the first four sheets and drew his pen through the signature on the fifth sheet at the end of the will, and there was other evidence of an intent to revoke.

It was held in Gay v. Gay, 60 Iowa, 415, 46 Am. Rep. 78, 14 N. W. 238, where a testator had drawn two scrolls lengthwise with a pen along the signature, but not in such a manner as to obliterate it or render it illegible, that the will was not revoked under the Iowa statute providing: "Section 1288. Wills can be revoked, in whole or in part, only by being canceled or destroyed by the act or direction of the testator, with the intention of so revoking them, or by the execution of subsequent wills. Section 1289. When done by cancellation, the revocation must be witnessed in the same manner as the making of a new will."

The will has been admitted on the ground of dependent relative revocation—

—where the testator's signatures to the will and three codicils were all struck through with pen and ink, on the theory that these acts were preliminary to the making of a new will, which he had not carried out. De Bode's Goods, 5 Notes of Cases, 189;

—where the testator's signature was struck through with pencil, and there were pencil changes made and new papers drafted, but not executed. Applebee's Goods, 1 Hagg. Eccl. Rep. 143; 51 L.R.A. (N.S.)

—where pencil lines were drawn through the signatures of the testator and the witnesses, and various pencil changes made, these being considered as a guide for a new will. Re Raisbeck, 52 Misc. 279, 102 N. Y. Supp. 967.

For the general subject of dependent relative revocation, see the note to Strong's Appeal, 6 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1107.

—signatures canceled and restored.

Where the signature of the testator has been canceled or erased and later restored or rewritten, the courts in general admit the will to probate.

This has been done where——the signature had been erased and a new one written below it. King's Goods, 2 Rob. Eccl. Rep. 403;

—the signature has been erased and a new one written over it. Re Wood, 2 Connolly, 144, 32 N. Y. S. R. 286, 11 N. Y. Supp. 157;

—the testator, when executing the will, signed at the foot of the attestation clause, but not above it, and the will had this signature partially erased with a knife and a new signature in pencil written above the attestation clause. Sellards v. Kirby, 82 Kan. 291, 28 L.R.A. (N.S.) 270, 136 Am. St. Rep. 110, 108 Pac. 73, 20 Ann. Cas. 214.

The same was done where the will was found with the signature of the testatrix erased first by drawing diagonal lines over it, and then by nearly erasing such lines and the name itself, and the signature was written again with different ink in the handwriting of the testatrix, the court considering that it did not appear that there was intent to revoke, and that the new signature indicated that there was not such intent. Re Wood, supra.

In this connection reference may be made to Gale v. Freeman, 153 Wis. 337, 141 N. W. 226, where part of the attestation clause was carried over the page and at the end of it was the signature of the testator properly attested, and this was the signature the witnesses witnessed, and it was held to be immaterial that on the first sheet, above the attestation clause in the ordinary place of signing, there was another signature partially obliterated, as to which the witnesses knew nothing, not having seen the first page.

In Bethell v. Moore, 19 N. C. (2 Dev. & B. L.) 311, a will properly executed with witnesses was found with perpendicular lines drawn through the original signature, and the signature then written over again with another seal. With the will were found three holographic codicils, which were good unattested under the law. The court held that while, if the will had been once revoked, not being in the testator's handwriting, it would not be reinstated by the codicils, although they evinced an intent to be codicils, upon the proof the testator had evidently intended to revoke his will entirely, and to make a new one in its place, and, not having carried out that intention, the will must stand as originally executed. The court observed that the statute did not define what is such a cancelation or obliteration as shall amount conclusively to a revocation of a will.

(3) Words of cancelation.

Where the will requires attestation, an unattested memorandum of revocation upon the will without any acts of cancelation is nugatory. Ladd's Will, 60 Wis. 187, 50 Am. Rep. 355, 18 N. W. 734 (where the testatrix had indorsed on her will, "I revoke this will," and signed and dated it); Howard v. Hunter, 115 Ga. 357, 90 Am. St. Rep. 121, 41 S. E. 638 (where the testator had indorsed on his will, "This will is made void by one of more recent date," signing his name); Gugel v. Vollmer, 1 Dem. 484 (where the will consisted of six pages, four of which were marked across, as having been stricken out at some time after its execution, with a marginal note on each of the four pages, in the handwriting of the testator, "I pronounce this void," with the date).

In Lewis v. Lewis, 2 Watts & S. 455, it was held that the word "obsolete" written on the margin of the will in the testator's handwriting cannot be considered as a burning, canceling, obliterating, or destroying of the will.

In Re Akers, 74 App. Div. 461, 77 N. Y. Supp. 643, 11 N. Y. Anno. Cas. 242, the will was admitted to probate where (1) on the margin of the first page, the testator had written, "This will and codicil is revoked," with the date; (2) on the margin of the second page of the codicil (which had never been properly executed), the testator had written, "This codicil and will is revoked," dating and signing it, and (3) on the back of the first page of the codicil, the testator had written the word "revoked," with the date, and had signed it.

There is a contrary decision in Warner v. Warner, 37 Vt. 356, where, at the foot of a will dated in August, 1857, the testator had written, "This will is hereby canceled and annulled. In full this 15th day of March in the year 1859," and upon the outside of the will, had written, "Canceled, and is null and void. I. Warner," and it was held that this was a cancelation within the statute.

And where the statute had no requirement as to revocations of wills of personal estate, it was held that such a will was presently revoked by the following writing signed by the testator under the attestation: "Boston, Mass. June 25, 1829. It is my intention at some future time to alter the tenor of the above will; or rather to make another will; therefore be it known, if I should die before another will is made, I desire that the foregoing be considered as revoked and of no effect. C. Thorndike." Brown v. Thorndike, 15 Pick. 388. 51 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Explanatory words with cancelation of signature.

The will was held revoked where a testator had drawn a pen several times in different directions across his signature and those of the subscribing witnesses, and had written below: "In consequence of the death of my wife, it is become necessary to make another will." Semmes v. Semmes, 7 Harr. & J. 388.

In Evans's Appeal, 58 Pa. 238, it was held that a will and codicil were "destroyed" within the statute under the following circumstances: The testator had signed it twice, the second time after a memorandum at the end of it, and it was attested by witnesses; thereafter he made a codicil attested by witnesses; after his death the will was found with the second signature to the will crossed out, and the signature to the codicil crossed out, and the word "cancel" written below it in the testator's handwriting; the indorsement on the will of the word "will" was crossed out, and the word "cancel" was written under it in the testator's handwriting; and there were several tears in the paper as if it had been torn as folded.

In Re Alger, 38 Misc. 143, 77 N. Y. Supp. 166, it was held that two codicils were revoked where upon the first codicil the testator had drawn across all the provisions thereof, including the signature and the attestation clause, numerous cross marks in lead pencil, and had also written in two places in the attestation clause the words "canceled," and in another place the words "Aprii 19, 1895," and the second codicil to the will contained several cross marks in lead pencil, which were only upon the first clause of the same, and below was a memorandum signed twice by the testator stating the cancelation of the codicil and the date and the reason for it. The court distinguished Lovell v. Quitman, 88 N. Y. 380, 42 Am. Rep. 254, as there the partial cancelation was unaccompanied by any memorandum of intention to revoke the entire instrument.

Where a codicil began on the same sheet of paper upon which the will ended, the instruments being tied together in one cover, and the signature to the codicil was crossed out in ink, with a memorandum alongside the canceled signature, "May 20, '92. void U. V. D.," in the testator's handwriting, it was held that the codicil was revoked, and the will also was held revoked, the codicil modifying the will only slightly, and the testator having shortly before the date of the memorandum conveyed real estate which would have caused his will practically to effect the disinheritance of a child. Re Brookman, 11 Misc. 675, 33 N. Y. Supp. 575.

English statute.

The words of the English statute are "burning, tearing, or otherwise destroying;" it does not contain the word "canceling."

Under this statute partial or total cancellations have been held nugatory where——the testatrix had drawn a line through a legacy, and had written on the margin, "Erased by me," with her signature. Lushington v. Onslow, 12 Jur. 465; —passages were stricken through with a pen, and in the margin the word "canceled" written with the initials of the testator. Adamson's Goods, L. R. 3 Prob. & Div. 253;

—a testator drew a pen through the lines of part of his will, leaving the words legible, and wrote on the back of it, "All these are revoked." Cheese v. Lovejoy, L. R. 2 Prob. Div. 251, 46 L. J. Prob. N. S. 66, 37 L. T. N. S. 294, 25 Week. Rep. 853;

—the attestation clause and the signatures of the witnesses were struck through with a pen, and the testator's signature partially scratched with a knife, and on the back the word "will" was partially erased, and there were words indicating an intention to revoke. Godfrey's Goods, 69 L. T. N. S. 22, 1 Reports, 484 (upon consent of the heir and next of kin).

In Brewster's Goods, 6 Jur. N. S. 56, 29 L. J. Prob. N. S. 69, it was held that the will must be admitted to probate where it was found after the death of the testator, with the words, "Canceled Wm. B.," written across each of his signatures, which had originally been on each page and also at the end, and below the signatures of the attesting witnesses he had written and signed a memorandum stating that the will was revoked and canceled, as the bequest had been made nugatory by certain matters which he stated, and further that he intended to make a new will and destroy this.

But in Harris's Goods, 3 Swabey & T. 455, 33 L. J. Prob. N. S. 181, 10 Jur. N. S. 684, 11 L. T. N. S. 276, it was held that the will was revoked, but not the codicil, where the will was written on six sheets and the codicil on the back of the last sheet, and the signature of the testator was cut off the first five sheets and a pen drawn through the signature on the last sheet at the end, and opposite there was written the word "canceled," with the initials of the testator and the date; there was evidence of an intent to revoke the will, but to preserve the codicil.

In Re Gosling, L. R. 11 Prob. Div. 79, 55 L. J. Prob. N. S. 27, 34 Week. Rep. 492, 50 J. P. 263, a codicil was held revoked where, with its signatures, it was obliterated with black lines, and there were at the foot the words: "We are witnesses to the erasure of the above," dated and duly signed and executed by the testator and two witnesses under the wills act.

It may be noted that in Morton's Goods, L. R. 12 Prob. Div. 141, 56 L. J. Prob. N. S. 96, 57 L. T. N. S. 501, 35 Week. Rep. 735, 51 J. P. 680, a will was held revoked on the ground that there had been "a lateral cutting out," where the signatures of the testatrix and the witnesses were scratched out as with a penknife, and there was a dated but unsigned memorandum at the foot in 51 L.R.A. (N.S.)

the testatrix' handwriting, declaring the will canceled for reasons stated.

c. Substitution of sheets.

Where the testator, after the execution of his will, took out several sheets and substituted others which he signed, but did not attest, and the old sheets could not be found, the whole will was denied probate. Treloar v. Lean, L. R. 14 Prob. Div. 49, 58 L. J. Prob. N. S. 39, 60 L. T. N. S. 512, 37 Week. Rep. 560.

So, the whole will was denied probate where, on its execution, the testator and the witnesses had signed all the five pages, and later he substituted new pages for the first and second pages, which he had destroyed, he and the witnesses signing each of the two new pages. The court considered that the new pages were so signed and substituted as to be of effect, if the rest of the will was of effect, but that the last three sheets had no effect by themselves, and were not able to render the two new sheets valid. Leonard v. Leonard [1902] P. 243, 71 L. J. Prob. N. S. 117, 87 L. T. N. S. 145, 18 Times L. R. 747.

In Varnon v. Varnon, 67 Mo. App. 534, the will was admitted to probate as originally written, where, under the testator's direction, one of the sheets of his will was taken out and another sheet substituted, and this was proved by the testimony of a single witness. The court stated that, under its statute, partial revocations were proper, but that when there is revocation made with reference to an alteration, then it depended upon the validity of the alteration.

See also O'Neill v. Owen, 17 Ont. Rep. 525, supra, III.

V. Miscellaneous.

In Holman v. Riddle, 8 Ohio St. 384, where, before the execution of a will, an erasure was made in it and a note of the erasure placed at the end of the attestation clause, and before the will was executed the erasure was canceled, so as to leave the words in the will as they had been originally written, it was held that the will would be properly admitted to probate as executed, although the note at the end of the attestation clause had been stricken out by someone after the execution of the will, as this was an immaterial change.

In Safe Deposit & T. Co. v. Thom, 117 Md. 154, 83 Atl. 45, where it appeared from the will that certain names and words had been somewhat rubbed, and that some of the letters making up these names had been relined or retraced with a lead pencil, the will was admitted to probate, the court considering that at most it was a case of indications for the drawing of a new will, and so of no effect under the doctrine of dependent relative revocation.

In Stevens v. Stevens, 6 Dem. 262, the will as originally executed was admitted to probate where, after the execution of her will, the testatrix told the scrivener she wished to bequeath certain furniture, etc., in a certain manner, and he thereupon wrote the directions on a separate piece of paper, read it to the testatrix, and said he would paste it on the will when he reached home, which he did, cutting into the will for that purpose.

Where a will required no witnesses when written by the testator, it was held where a testator had made a holographic will with witnesses, and thereafter had made in his own handwriting changes, interlineations, and corrections, in the presence of a single witness, that the will as changed was properly admitted to probate. Re Fuquet, 11 Phila. 75.

In Ex parte Ilchester, 7 Ves. Jr. 348, 6 Revised Rep. 138, where a testator, after making his will, had added several unattested papers indicating or making a different appointment of guardianship of his children from that contained in the will, it was held that the will appointment would stand, and that it was not revoked by these other papers not executed in testamentary form or with testamentary requirements, the court referring to the statute of Charles II., as to testamentary guardians.

It may be noted that in Re Stickney, 41 Misc. 70, 83 N. Y. Supp. 650, the court, in stating that the will should be admitted to probate "with an express declaration enumerating each provision which is annulled by reason of a change made subsequent to its execution," no doubt, means that the will should be admitted to probate as originally written. TENNESSEE SUPREME COURT.

JAMES W. DURHAM, Plff. in Err.,
v.
STATE OF TENNESSEE.

(— Tenn. —, 163 S. W. 447.)

Evidence — character — effect of presumption.

1. The offering by accused of evidence as to his good character for truth and veracity does not deprive him of the presumption that his character for peace and quietness is good.

Same — presumption of good character — effect as evidence.

2. The presumption of the good character for peace and quietness of one accused of murder cannot be considered as evidence in his favor, in addition to the presumption of innocence, to raise a reasonable doubt of guilt in the minds of the jury.

(November 29, 1913.)

Note. — For presumption as to good character of defendant in criminal case, see note to People v. Lingley, 46 L.R.A. (N.S.) 342. 51 L.R.A. (N.S.)

ERROR to the Circuit for Sumner County to review a judgment convicting defendant of murder in the second degree. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Ed T. Seay, Baskerville & Collier, and J. T. Durham for plaintiff in error.

Mr. William H. Swiggart, Jr., Assistant Attorney General, for the State.

Williams, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Plaintiff in error, Durham, was tried and convicted of murder in the second degree. His defense was self-defense; and he has appealed and assigned numerous errors, one only of which will be treated and disposed of in this opinion.

The trial judge in his charge to the jury said: "Every defendant is entitled to the benefit of his good character when it is shown in proof. If the good character of the defendant, considered in connection with the other proof, creates a reasonable doubt of his guilt, you should acquit."

The defendant submitted the following request to charge, which was refused, and therefor error is assigned: "I further charge that the defendant is presumed to have a good character until the contrary is shown by competent evidence; and this good character stands as a witness for him and in his favor upon every issue in the case. The defendant is always entitled to the benefit of his good character, and the jury may look to this, with the other evidence, to see whether there is a reasonable doubt as to his guilt."

The defendant had offered no testimony to show his good character for peace and quietness; but he did testify in his own behalf, and offered evidence in support of himself as a witness to the effect that his character for truth and veracity was good.

It is insisted for the state that defendant thus put his character in evidence, and is not, on that account, entitled to the law's presumption of a good character, since a presumption is operative only in the absence of proof. In this there is a failure to distinguish between the good character of an accused (for peace and quietness) and the good character of an accused as a witness (for truth and veracity). Powers v. State, 117 Tenn. 363, 97 S. W. 815. The putting by a defendant of the latter to proof cannot have the effect of putting with it the former, against his intent and interest.

So that we are of opinion that there is nothing in this counter insistence of the state that embarrasses the defendant in his reliance upon the error assigned, the purport of which is that there is a presumption of a good character in favor of an accused which, as would a fact, stands as a witness for him, to be looked to by the jury as having effect upon reasonable doubt of his guilt, even where he does not offer to set up a good character for peace and quietness.

The contention does not lack support of authority that is entitled to great consideration. The circuit court of appeals of the sixth circuit, in Mullen v. United States, 46 C. C. A. 22, 106 Fed. 892, in an opinion by Mr. Justice Day, then circuit judge, dealt with a like contention. There the trial judge refused a request to charge as follows: "You are charged that the law presumes the good character of the accused, and such presumption is to be considered as evidence in favor of the accused in considering the question of the guilt or innocence."

The court held that it was error to refuse this request, and said: "The comment of the judge in his charge and the several refusals to charge in the exceptions noted raise the question whether, in a criminal trial, in a court of the United States, where no testimony has been offered as to the previous good character of the accused, a presumption of such good character exists in favor of the accused, of which, upon a request to that effect, the jury should be instructed. The Supreme Court of the United States, dealing with the presumption of innocence in criminal trials, in the case of Coffin v. United States, 156 U. S. 432, 460, 39 L. ed. 481, 493, 15 Sup. Ct. Rep. 394, 405 (opinion by Mr. Justice White), said:

"The fact that the presumption of innocence is recognized as a presumption of law, and is characterized by the civilians as a presumptio juris, demonstrates that it is evidence in favor of the accused; for in all systems of law legal presumptions are treated as evidence giving rise to resulting proof to the full extent of their legal efficacy."

"This reasoning applies to the presumption, if such exists, of good character of the accused, and should be given in the charge to the jury, where a specific request on that subject is made at the trial. Does such presumption exist? We fail to find any difference of opinion in the well-recognized text writers upon this subject. All assert that a presumption exists in favor of the accused, in the absence of testimony, that he had a good character previous to the time of the alleged commission of the offense in question. It is true that the government may not attack the character of the accused until he puts it in issue by affirmative testimony on his part. He is not 51 L.R.A. (N.S.)

obliged to do this, but may, if he sees fit, rest upon the presumption raised by the law. . . .

"It is true that there are cases which hold that, where there is no testimony upon the subject, the court is not obliged to say anything to the jury, either one way or the other. But, if the presumption exists in favor of the accused, it cannot be available to him unless he can have an instruction advising the jury of this proposition of law. This presumption, to the extent to which it exists, though less important, is as much his right in a criminal trial as the presumption in favor of his innocence. It is in consonance with the general principle of law that a man is presumed to stand ordinarily well, and to have at least the average qualities of morality and good conduct."

In a learned opinion, Mr. Justice White, in Coffin v. United States, supra, as noted, undertook to demonstrate that the presumption of innocence is tantamount to evidence in favor of the accused, but further said: "The evolution of the principle of the presumption of innocence, and its resultant, the doctrine of reasonable doubt, . . . indicates the necessity of enforcing the one in order that the other may continue to exist. Whilst Rome and the Mediaevalists taught that, wherever doubt existed in a criminal case, acquittal must follow, the expounders of the common law, in their devotion to human liberty and individual rights, traced this doctrine of doubt to its true origin,—the presumption of innocence,—and rested it upon this enduring basis."

The argument of appellant is that the presumption of a good character should, treated as a law-assumed fact, strengthen the presumption of innocence, and thereby strengthen that which is thus declared to be the result of the presumption of innocence,—the reasonable doubt.

We deem the error in this contention and in the authority relied on in its support to be in assuming that the presumption of good character may be conceived of as not incorporated in and as a part of the presumption of innocence, and that it may be resorted to as an independent probative element to reinforce the presumption of innocence, with like effect upon its resultant,—the doubt. When the law affords to an accused the presumption of innocence, that, in its inclusive nature, tends to produce the resultant doubt. Neither that presumption nor its resultant is to be strengthened by the other or included presumption, as such; but the production by defendant of proof of the fact of good character, in lieu of the presumption, may operate to increase the weight of the presumption of innocence, and, therefore, the doubt. Phelan v. State, 114 Tenn. 483, 507, 88 S. W. 1040, and cases in accord.

But, when so produced, the proof is perforce in lieu of the presumption. If each be truly probative in nature, would this be the case?

At least two learned authors, in their treatises on the law of evidence, deny that the presumption of innocence (and, of course, the presumption of good character) is of probative force or is to be weighed as evidence, and criticize the opinion delivered by Mr. Justice White as follows: "The presumption . . . may, in a sense be called 'an instrument of proof' or something 'in the nature of evidence,' in that it determines from whom evidence shall come; or it may be called a substitute for evidence, in the sense that it counts at the outset for evidence enough to make a prima facie case; but it is not evidence in the true sense. It is not probative matter, which may be a basis of inference and weighed and compared with other matter of a probative nature." 1 Elliott, Ev. § 93; Thayer, Ev. 575; 3 Harvard L. Rev. 148-166.

We think it clear, under either view, if, indeed, the views are divergent and may not, on a true analysis of the opinion of Mr. Justice White, be harmonized, that the presumption of a good character may not be a basis of inference for the purpose of adding weight to the presumption of innocence or its logical resultant. One presumption may not supplement or augment another, where one is but a part of the other.

Several courts have had the point urged on us for error under review, and their opinions demonstrate the unsoundness of the decision in Mullen v. United States, supra, and the unfairness of its rule in application.

McKinstry, J., in People v. Johnson, 61 Cal. 142, said: "If, in the absence of evidence on the subject, the presumption of good character is to weigh as much in his [accused's] favor as affirmative proof of it, the necessity of proving good character would never arise; and the prosecution would frequently be in a worse case than if evidence of good character had been given—since the prosecution would be debarred from introducing evidence to overcome the presumption. When it is said that good character is to be presumed, it is only said that, in the absence of evidence, the jury should not attribute to defendant a general bad character with respect to the qualities involved in the alleged offense, nor give weight to his assumed bad character in determining the question whether the evidence established his guilt." 51 L.R.A. (N.S.)

In Addison v. People, 193 Ill. 405, 419, 62 N. E. 235, 239, in reference to a request to charge, submitted by defendant, "that the law not only presumes that the defendant is innocent until he is proven guilty beyond any reasonable doubt, but the law also presumes that the defendant has a good character . . . as a law-abiding, peaceable citizen until the contrary is shown by the evidence, and it is not necessary for the defendant to prove his reputation in that respect, . . . and that, without any proof on the subject, . . . [the jury] should take the good character of defendant into consideration in making up their verdict," the court, after reasoning as did the California court, further said: "Defendant did not choose to put his reputation in issue or prove that it was good, but sought by the instruction all the benefit of an affirmative finding of such fact without proof or an opportunity to combat the claim or prove the negative. If the instruction were the law, a defendant need never prove good reputation, but could take the benefit of proof which . . . he could not make." See also People v. Bodine, 1 Denio, 281, 315; Danner v. State, 54 Ala. 127, 25 Am. Rep. 662.

We therefore rule that the accused was not entitled to have the request charged.

By this it is not to be understood that there is no presumption of good character in favor of a defendant in a criminal prosecution as above outlined, and also in the sense that, in the absence of proof on the subject, the jury is not warranted in assuming that he is of bad character in respect of the particular trait or quality involved in the alleged crime, which, as seen above, is peace and quietness, in a prosecution for homicide. Powers v. State, 117 Tenn. 363, 97 S. W. 815; People v. Bonier, 103 Am. St. Rep. 897, annotation.

Other assignments of errors are disposed of in the judgment entered. Affirmed.

TEXAS SUPREME COURT.

MARY BERGER, Plff. in Err.,
v.

M. D. KIRBY, Admr., etc., of M. W. Kirby,
Deceased, et al.

(105 Tex. 611, 153 S. W. 1130.)

Evidence — common-law marriage — character of community and woman.

1. Upon the question of the existence vel non of a common-law marriage between a decedent and a woman claiming his property, evidence is admissible of the character of the community in which she lived and her own character for virtue, to interpret the association of decedent with her.

Same — testimony as to marriage.

2. One claiming to be the common-law wife of a decedent cannot testify that she married him, as it is a mere conclusion, and has no tendency to prove a common-law marriage.

Witness — marriage — transaction with decedent.

3. One claiming the property of a decedent as his common-law wife is not competent to testify to the making of a contract of marriage with him.

Estoppel — recital in deed — buying pence.

4. A recital in a deed sought from one claiming as the widow of the deceased owner, to prevent litigation, that she was the surviving wife of decedent, does not estop adverse claimants from contesting that fact.

(February 26, 1913.)

ERROR to the Court of Civil Appeals for the Fifth Supreme Judicial District to review a judgment in defendants' favor in an action to establish title to certain property which plaintiff claimed as widow of the deceased owner. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Parks, Patton, & Plowman, Etheridge & McCormick, and Thomas & Rhea, for plaintiff in error:

It was only necessary that the parties presently agreed to become then and thenceforth husband and wife.

Note. — Applicability of disqualification statute to testimony of alleged spouse to establish marriage in order to succeed to share of the decedent's property.

For cases upon the general question as to whether or not disqualification statutes apply to proceedings involving the succession or distribution of estates of decedents, see note appended to Whitehead v. Kirk, post, 187.

By the great weight of authority a person claiming to succeed to a share of a deceased person's estate on the ground that he or she is the surviving spouse is incompetent as a witness to establish the fact of marriage, where the marriage is disputed by those who would otherwise succeed to the estate.

The doctrine holding to be disqualified as a witness in her own favor a person seeking to succeed to the estate of a deceased person, on the claim of marriage, where the fact of marriage is in dispute, is asserted although the statutes of the different states vary more or less in their disqualifying provisions, and although there is a conflict among the states as to the applicability of the disqualifying statute to contests over the succession to the estates of decedents. In the note appended to Whitehead v. Kirk, post, 187, the different statutes are set out in substance.

Under a general exclusion statute a person claiming to be the wife of a deceased person was held incompetent as a witness to prove the celebration of her marriage with the deceased, as well as other facts attending their cohabitation, in Redgrave v. Redgrave, 38 Md. 93, and Denison v. Denison, 35 Md. 361; and in Bowman v. Little, 101 Md. 273, 61 Atl. 223, 657, 1084, the foregoing rule was also held to apply to evidence of the claimant generally, although, by the terms of the statute then in force, the disqualification is restricted to transactions had with or statements made by the intestate.

qualifying provision of the statute does not apply to persons seeking to succeed to the estate of a deceased person on the ground of heirship, where this fact is disputed by other persons who otherwise would concededly be entitled to the estate. It is held by the court that it is very clear that those persons do not come within either the letter or spirit of the exception which is alleged to exclude them; that the object of the act was to place the parties upon an equal footing, and to exclude the other party when one party to the contract was dead. The court said that there is no contract between the deceased and those claiming as his heirs which the latter are endeavoring to enforce against his estate; nor is the proceeding against his testatrix for the purpose of establishing a charge against her intestate or his estate, but it is a contest between his widow and the appellees, who claim to be next of kin and heirs at law of the intestate, as to the manner in which his estate shall be distributed, the widow claiming the whole and the alleged heirs one half.

Testimony of the alleged widow of the decedent as to her marriage with the decedent and as to verbal contracts, conversations, and transactions with him to establish such marriage, is excluded by a statute providing that no person having a direct legal interest in the result of any civil action or proceeding when the adverse party is a representative of a deceased person shall be permitted to testify to any transaction or conversation between the deceased person and the witness. Sorensen v. Sorensen, 56 Neb. 729, 77 N. W. 68.

Under the Illinois statute a person claiming to be the common-law wife of a decedent is not competent to testify to the fact of marriage and other facts as tending to show that the marriage relation existed between the deceased and herself, in order to establish herself as an heir of the decedent. Laurence v. Laurence, 164 Ill. 367, 45 N. E. 1071, overruling, upon this point, Brown v. Brown, 142 Ill. 409, 32 N. E. 500.

While inadequacy of consideration alone will not be a sufficient reason for setting aside and canceling a deed, such inadequacy and the showing in connection therewith that the plaintiff was borne down by grief by reason of the death of her husband at the time of the execution of the deed will, in law, constitute good and valid grounds for setting aside and canceling such deed.

In a partition proceeding one seeking to establish her marriage to the deceased owner of the land is not a competent witness against an heir of the decedent. Crane v. Stafford, 217 Ill. 28, 75 N. E. 424.

Where the cohabitation relied upon to establish the relation of husband and wife is not illicit, the alleged widow is a competent witness to the fact of her marriage, in a proceeding in the probate court by her to establish her rights in the property of the deceased as his wife, but where the main issue is the fact of marriage, the party who is attempting to enforce the rights based upon the existence of such relation is within the provision of the statute, and is disqualified as a witness. Collard v. Burch, 138 Mo. App. 98, 119 S. W. 1009.

And a woman is not a competent witness to prove her marriage to the deceased person or any conversations with him, or his treatment of her while they lived together as husband and wife, for the purpose of establishing the marriage relation, in order to entitle her to a wife's interest in the property. Lyons v. Lyons, 101 Mo. App. 494, 74 S. W. 467.

In a proceeding to establish her rights in the estate of the deceased person as his wife, the alleged wife is not a competent witness as to a verbal contract of marriage constituting a common-law marriage which she claims was entered into with the decedent. Imboden v. St. Louis Union Trust Co. 111 Mo. App. 220, 86 S. W. 263.

In Green v. Green, 126 Mo. 25, 28 S. W. 752, 1008, however, it is held that a woman claiming property as the wife of the deceased person is a competent witness to establish the marriage.

The statutory provision that, in an action or proceeding where the adverse party sues or defends as executor, administrator, or legal representative of any deceased person, or as deriving right or title by, through, or from any deceased person, a party in interest or to the record shall not be permitted to testify in his own behalf as to any transaction had by him with, or any statement made to him by, any such deceased person, disqualifies as a witness in her own behalf a woman claiming the property of the decedent as his wife, where the fact of the marriage is the chief issue in the proceedings. Nelson v. Carlson, 48 Wash. 651, 94 Pac. 477; Weatherall v. Weatherall, 56 Wash. 344, 105 Pac. 822.

In a contest between the wife and children of decedent and his collateral heirs as to who is entitled to his estate, the heirs attacking the validity of the marriage of decedent and the legitimacy of the children on the ground that the marriage was forbidden by statute, the alleged wife is not a competent witness as to the fact of the marriage, or that she and decedent lived as husband and wife. Hopkins v. Bowers, 111 N. C. 175, 16 S. E. 1.

In a suit by the children and heirs of their deceased mother to recover her interest in community property the defendant, who is alleged to have been the husband of the decedent, is incompetent as a witness in his own behalf to deny the marriage. Edelstein v. Brown, 100 Tex. 403, 123 Am. St. Rep. 816, 100 S. W. 129.

In Lorimer v. Lorimer, 124 Mich. 631, 83 N. W. 609, it is held that a woman claiming to be the wife of decedent, and as such entitled to a wife's interest in his estate, is disqualified as a witness to establish the marriage contract, since this constitutes a claim against the estate within the meaning of the statute. The court reasons that if the claimant had presented a claim for services as housekeeper for the time she lived with the decedent, there would be no question but what she was incompetent as a witness in her own behalf, and it is said that the rule equally applies where, instead of seeking to enforce a claim for services based on a contract for hire, she seeks to obtain one half of the estate of the deceased upon the ground that she is Specific acts tending to show prostitution were not admissible in evidence for the purpose of showing her general reputation as a common prostitute, or for any other purpose, and could only tend to prejudice the jury against the plaintiff.

Under the Iowa Code, a woman who claimed to be the common-law wife of the deceased person is incompetent as a witness to testify as to conversations with the deceased for the purpose of establishing the agreement, but such testimony is in part admissible as proof of her intent and the circumstances under which her relations with the decedent commenced. Re Wittick, — Iowa, —, 145 N. W. 913.

It has, however, been held that where the contest is between the parties claiming to be the distributees in an estate of an intestate, one of whom is the alleged widow of the decedent, she is competent to testify to the fact of her marriage with the decedent, since the estate of the decedent is not interested in the result of the controversy within the meaning of the statute. Nolen v. Doss, 133 Ala. 259, 31 So. 969.

And, in the administration of an estate of the intestate, a person claiming to be his wife is competent to testify in her own favor as to a marriage contracted between herself and the decedent, and the facts leading up thereto, since an application for letters of administration upon the estate of a deceased person is not a suit instituted by a personal representative of such deceased person, and hence does not come within the terms of a statute which declares that where any suit is instituted or defended by the personal representatives of a deceased person, the opposite party shall not be permitted to testify in his own favor against the deceased as to transactions or communications with him in his lifetime. Buchanan v. Buchanan, 103 Ga. 90, 29 S. E. 608.

In Pennsylvania there is an exception to the disqualification statute in effect making it inapplicable in issues and inquiries devisavit vel non and others, respecting the right of the deceased owner of property, between parties claiming such right by devolution on the death of the owner. Under this exception both parties claiming an estate under the same decedent, which has devolved upon them by descent or succession, are competent witnesses in the trial 51 L.R.A. (N.S.)

of an issue to settle their respective rights. Bowen v. Goranflo, 73 Pa. 357. Under this exception, the alleged widow of a decedent is a competent witness to establish her marriage to the deceased, which is a matter of dispute, in a proceeding by the daughter of the witness to establish her claim to the decedent's estate as his daughter and heir. Greenawalt v. McEnelley, 85 Pa. 352; Drinkhouse's Estate, 151 Pa. 294, 24 Atl. 1083.

In a proceeding to set aside a will, the alleged wife of testator is competent to testify to transactions or communications with the decedent which are relied upon to establish a common-law marriage, and also to testify to her subsequent relations with decedent up to the time of his death, where she disclaims all interest in his property. Shorten v. Judd, 56 Kan. 43, 54 Am. St. Rep. 587, 42 Pac. 337.

In an ejectment action by the alleged son of the testator against persons claiming to be the latter's heirs, the testimony of the mother of the plaintiff is competent to establish her marriage with the decedent prior to the birth of the plaintiff, to establish the claim of plaintiff as a son and heir of decedent, since the witness is not a party to the action, and neither is she interested in the event of the suit within the meaning of the disqualifying statute, for any judgment entered therein would not operate as an estoppel either for or against her. Eisenlord v. Clum, 126 N. Y. 557, 12 L.R.A. 836, 27 N. E. 1024.

In Stevens v. Joyal, 48 Vt. 291, it is held that where the legality of a marriage with decedent in his lifetime is contested by his heirs on the ground that the alleged wife had another husband living at the time of the marriage from whom she had not been divorced, she is a competent witness as to the fact of her marriage with the decedent, and to other facts tending to show the validity thereof, where the only question at issue is the fact of this marriage, since there is involved merely the question as to the distribution of the estate, and the disqualifying statute has no application under such circumstances. Burns v. Goff, 79 Tex. 236, 14 S. W. 1009.

Under the confessed and established facts the deed of plaintiff to the defendant Smith was constructively fraudulent, and she was entitled as matter of law to a decree canceling the same.

Messrs. Ed Sewell and Barry Miller for defendants in error.

Brown, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This suit was instituted by Mary Berger against James Smith, individually, and as administrator of the estate of A. Berger, deceased, and against M. D. Kirby, individually, and as administratrix of the estate of M. W. Kirby, deceased, and against a number of other persons not necessary to mention, as the case depends upon the right of plaintiff, as surviving wife of A. Berger, to the property of said estate. A. Berger was a widower (unless Mary Berger was his wife), and died in Dallas, Texas, leaving as his heirs a brother and some other relatives, whose names are unimportant. Decedent left a considerable estate, and owed some debts. There was a contest over the granting of letters of administration, Mary Berger claiming to be the surviving wife of deceased, but waived her right to administer; and letters were granted to James A. Smith.

To decide the issues of law upon which the case, as before this court, depends, does not require a full statement of the facts, but only those facts upon which plaintiff rests her claim to have been the wife of A. Berger; for if there was material error in the charge of the court upon that question, or if there was error in excluding testimony offered to prove the marriage, the judgment should be reversed; otherwise it must be affirmed.

Mary Berger claimed that she had been servant to A. Berger; and, after his wife's death, he and plaintiff made an oral contract to be husband and wife, and that they lived together as husband and wife to the death of A. Berger. Upon the trial, plaintiff, being upon the witness stand, offered to testify, in substance, "that, four days after the death of A. Berger's first wife, she and A. Berger agreed to live together as man and wife, agreed to be man and wife, just as he and his former wife, Josie Ramirez Berger, had been, and thenceforth they were husband and wife until the day of the death of A. Berger." The objection made is not stated in the application; but the court excluded the evidence. There was much evidence on the various issues; but it is unnecessary to recite it here.

The judge charged the jury as follows: "A common-law marriage is valid in this state; and the issuance of a marriage license or marriage ceremony is not necessary to constitute a common-law marriage. A common-law marriage exists when a man and woman enter into an agreement to become husband and wife, and, in pursuance of such agreement, do live together and cohabit as husband and wife, and hold each other out to the public as husband and wife. Such agreement to become husband and wife may be express or implied. An express agreement is where the parties thereto expressly agree; and an implied agreement is where the parties with reference to the subject-matter is such as to induce the belief, in the minds of the contracting parties, that they intend to do that which their acts indicate they have done. If you believe from a preponderance of the evidence that the plaintiff, Mary Berger, and the deceased, A. Berger, agreed to become husband and wife, as is claimed by the plaintiff, and that, in pursuance of such agreement, they lived together and cohabited as husband and wife, you will find that the plaintiff was the wife of A. Berger, deceased. If you fail to find, under the preceding clause, that the plaintiff was the common-law wife of A. Berger, deceased, then you are instructed that you need proceed no further, but you will return your verdict for the defendants." The jury returned a verdict for the defendants.

Plaintiff's right to recover in this case depends primarily upon the truth of her claim to have been the wife of the deceased Berger. The best phase of the evidence for the plaintiff is that her marriage to the deceased was a question of fact to be decided by the jury; and, to be entitled to a reversal of the judgment, she must show material error in the charge of the court to the jury, or such error in admitting or excluding evidence upon that issue. The charge of the court gave a correct rule to govern the jury in deciding the issue of marriage. See Grigsby v. Reib, 105 Tex. 597, — L.R.A.(N.S.) —, 153 S. W. 1124, opinion filed at the same time as this. The jury returned a verdict for defendants; that is, that Mary Berger was not the wife of Berger.

We now look for error which probably produced an erroneous conclusion upon the facts. We repeat that the evidence was not conclusive of the marriage; and the verdict must stand, unless error be shown in admitting or excluding evidence.

The character of cohabitation between plaintiff in error and deceased was material; and the evidence which tended to show the character of the community in which she lived, and her own character for virtue, were relevant to interpret the visits of Berger and his association with the woman; and there was no error in admitting evidence of these facts.

There was no error in refusing to permit plaintiff to testify that, "about four days after the death of Berger's wife, she married Berger;" it was a conclusion. She did not claim to have been married under license. The proposed statement, if admitted, would not have tended to prove a common-law marriage.

The witness was not competent to prove the transaction between herself and the deceased in making a contract of marriage. Rev. Stat. art. 3690; Edelstein v. Brown, 100 Tex. 403, 123 Am. St. Rep. 816, 100 S. W. 129.

The deeds made by Mary Berger, as the surviving wife of the deceased, were manifestly sought and made to prevent litigation,—buying the peace of the adverse claimants. The recital that she was the surviving wife of Berger constitutes no estoppel under such state of facts. 16 Cyc. pp. 687, 688; Cannon v. Stockmon, 36 Cal. 535, 95 Am. Dec. 206. The charge of the court on the subject of common-law marriage was practically correct. Grigsby v. Reib, supra.

There is no error shown that requires a reversal of the judgment, which we affirm. 51 L.R.A.(N.S.)

v.

MRS. L. G. KIRK.

(— Miss. —, 61 So. 737.)

Witness — testamentary capacity — testimony of wife.

1. A wife cannot, for the purpose of showing the testamentary incapacity of her husband in a will contest, testify to acts committed by him in her presence, when they were alone, such as his habits of intoxication, his hearing voices and communication with spirits of the dead, his mutterings and outcries when asleep, delusions causing him to arm himself, insults to her and attempts to take her life, although similar acts and declarations occur in the presence of others.

Same — confession — admissibility.

2. A wife cannot testify as to confession of adultery made to her by her husband when they are alone, nor as to his charging her with infidelity under the same circumstances.

Same — evidence against decedent's estate — establishing testamentary incapacity.

I. Introductory.

It is not the purpose of this note to include the question where presented in cases involving the admissibility of the evidence of the alleged spouse of decedent for the purpose of establishing the marriage in order to succeed to a share in the estate of the decedent, where the fact of marriage is in dispute. For such cases, see note appended to Berger v. Kirby, ante, 182.

In considering the question of the application of statutes in effect disqualifying interested persons as witnesses where the representative of a deceased person is a party to the proceeding, it is, of course, necessary to examine the statute closely. Much of the apparent confusion and conflict among the decisions may be explained or reconciled by a comparison of the statutes construed. While it is obviously impossible, within the scope of this note, to make a minute comparison of the different statutes, and classify the cases accordingly, an attempt has been made to render possible a comparison of the different statutes and cases applying them, by classifying the cases according to what is regarded, or has been treated by the courts, as the essential features of the statutes construed. This classification is not made with the idea that cases decided under statutes in one subdivision are not authority in the construction of statutes under a different subdivision, but is merely for the purpose of convenience in comparing the statutes. It is to be noted that there are variances in the language even of the statutes classified under the same general head.

In construing statutes in effect disqualifying as a witness in his own behalf one of the parties to a transaction when the other party thereto has deceased or is mentally incompetent, the courts are largely influenced by the general purpose of the statute to protect estates of decedents from fraudulent and fictitious claims, as well as the prevention of perjury. Accordingly these statutes are frequently held to be applicable only when the witness is interested in establishing a claim against or defeating the claim of an estate, and proceedings among the heirs or legatees affecting the distribution of the estate, including the probate of a will offered as that of the deceased, are held not to be within the purview of these statutes, and this generally without reference to the language of the statute, except, of course, when the language clearly indicates the intent to include within the disqualifying provision every character of proceeding, including proceedings relating to the testator's estate.

Where the language of the statute does not clearly include all proceedings relating to the testator's estate, the cases limiting the application of the statutes to proceedings to establish claims for or against the estate of deceased or mentally incompetent persons are not inconsistent; for in proceedings involving the succession to es-

State, 137 Ind. 519, 35 N. E. 907; Yowell v. Vaughn, 85 Mo. App. 206; Wright v. Wright, 114 Iowa, 748, 55 L.R.A. 261, 87 N. W. 709; Shepherd v. Com. 119 Ky. 931, 85 S. W. 191; Sexton v. Sexton, 129 Iowa, 487, 2 L.R.A.(N.S.) 708, 105 N. W. 314.

All declarations of an abusive, vituperative, insulting, or profane character, all charges of infidelity, and all acts, such as running the children and the wife off the place, and threatening to kill her, all the violence, tumultuous and insane conduct, tates, the purpose of the testimony of interested witnesses is not to reduce or destroy the estate, but merely to determine the manner of distribution. In effect these are proceedings in rem in which the estate as an entity is not interested, the persons in interest being those claiming to share in the distribution as heirs, devisees, legatees, or distributees; and since the effect of these proceedings is neither to increase nor diminish the estate, it cannot be said to be a party thereto. The persons interested in the distribution of the estate, whether as heirs, distributees, devisees, or legatees, act therein for their individual benefit, and cannot be said to represent the estate. The issue being directly or indirectly the distribution of the estate, the testimony of witnesses interested in such distribution as to some transaction or conversation with decedent generally can bear but indirectly upon this primary issue, for the purpose of the testimony is to establish some transaction or conversation with the decedent for what bearing it may have upon the primary issue, such as the mental competency of the decedent, or undue influence exercised upon him, or some claim of advancement, affecting merely the distribution of or succession to the estate, and it is not primarily to establish the right of succession. Where the purpose of the testimony is to establish a disputed right to succession, there is more reason for holding a witness to come within the disqualifying provision of the statute. Thus, where a woman claims the right of succession as the wife of decedent where the fact of her marriage is disputed, in many jurisdictions she is held to come within the disqualifying provision of the statute, to the extent, at least, of excluding her testimony to establish the existence of the marital relation, although this rule does not prevail in all jurisdictions. See note to Berger v. Kirby, ante, 182.

In view of the distinction between the probative effect of the testimony of a witness for the purpose of establishing a claim against or defeating the claim of an estate, and for the purpose of proving some collateral fact, having merely an indirect bear-all the insane delusions with respect to the wife, and other matters affecting the wife, are such acts and such declarations as it would simply be a farce to call confidential.

ing upon some issue affecting the succession to or distribution of an estate, the holding of many of the courts that, in the former case, the witness is disqualified, while he is not in the latter case, merely construes the particular statute according to the apparent object sought to be attained thereby.

II. Comparison of decisions as to whether or not statute is applicable.

a. Cases holding statute not applicable.

To illustrate in a general way the tendency of the courts in the majority of the states in this regard, cases are hereinafter cited according to the holding as to whether or not the statute is applicable to proceedings to probate a will or set aside a probated will, or other proceedings affecting the distribution of the estate of a deceased person. Only sufficient cases are referred to to illustrate the holding. It is not intended to show the particular application of the individual cases, nor to give more than a very general idea of the form of the disqualifying statute, for the cases are later referred to more at length with reference to the particular statutes applying, which are more fully set out. In the following cases the disqualifying statutes are held not to apply to contests affecting the probate of a will or succession to an estate, and hence not to exclude as witnesses in their own behalf devisees or legatees claiming under the will, or the heirs at law or next of kin of the testator:

Ala.—Snider v. Burks, 84 Ala. 53, 4 So. 225; Kumpe v. Coons, 63 Ala. 448, holding that legatees or devisees are not disqualified as witnesses in their own behalf, in a proceeding involving the validity of the will under which they claim, by a statutory provision disqualifying as witnesses persons testifying to transactions with or statements by a deceased person whose estate is interested in the result of the suit. Henry v. Hall, 106 Ala. 84, 54 Am. St. Rep. 22, 17 So. 187, holding that the disqualifying provision does not include parties interested in a will contest proceeding.

159 Cal. 6, 112 Pac. 720, Ann. Cas. 1912B, 1193; Epstein v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 143 Mo. App. 135, 122 S. W. 366; State v. Middleham, 62 Iowa, 150, 17 N. W. 446; Lanham v. Lanham, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 146 S. W. 635; Erickson v. Ladies of Macca-bees, 25 S. D. 183, 126 N. W. 259.

Mrs. Kirk's testimony was not incompetent because it was testimony to establish her own claim against the estate of a deceased person, which originated in the lifetime of the deceased person.

Covington v. Frank, 77 Miss. 606, 27 So. 1000; Tucker v. Whitehead, 59 Miss. 605; Kelly v. Miller, 39 Miss. 17; Steen v. Kirkpatrick, 84 Miss. 63, 36 So. 140.

The court has profoundly erred in holding that Mrs. Kirk testified to establish her own claim against the estate of the deceased person.

Jamison v. Jamison, 92 Miss. 468, 46 So. 83, 945; Sivley v. Roberts, — Miss.—, 53 So. 595; Tucker v. Whitehead, 59 Miss. 594; Mullins v. Cottrell, 41 Miss. 291; Covington v. Frank, 77 Miss. 606, 27 So. 1000; Steen v. Kirkpatrick, 84 Miss. 63, 36 So. 140; Kelly v. Miller, 39 Miss. 17; Shailer v. Bumstead, 99 Mass. 112; Garvin v. Williams, 50 Mo. 206; Foster v. Dickerson, 64 Vt. 239, 24 Atl. 253; Re Buckman, 64 Vt. 313, 33 Am. St. Rep. 930, 24 Atl. 252.

The court erred in holding that the declarations and acts of Kirk, testified to by Mrs. Kirk, ought not to have been admitted, because they were privileged communications.

Ark.—Taylor v. McClintock, 87 Ark. 243, 112 S. W. 405, holding that neither devisees, legatees, nor heirs are disqualified as witnesses in their own behalf in any controversy over the will of a deceased person under whom they claim, by a statute prohibiting either party from testifying against the other as to transactions with or statements of the testator, in actions by or against his executor or administrator, where judgment may be rendered for or against him.

Del.—Re Spiegelhalter, 1 Penn. (Del.) 5, 39 Atl. 465, holding that parties to a proceeding to probate a will are not disqualified by a statute providing that in actions or proceedings by or against an executor, administrator, or guardian, in which judgment may be rendered for or against him, neither party shall be allowed to testify against the other as to any transaction with or statements by a deceased or incompetent person.

Fla.—Hays v. Ernest, 32 Fla. 18, 13 So. 451, holding that heirs at law, next of kin, devisees, or legatees are not disqualified as witnesses in their own behalf in proceedings to probate a will, by a statute excluding interested persons from testifying in regard to any transaction or communication by them with a party then deceased.

Ga.—Harris v. Harris, 53 Ga. 678; Brown v. Carroll, 36 Ga. 568, holding that interested parties are not disqualified as witnesses in their own behalf in a trial of an issue of devisavit vel non, by a statute providing that where a suit is instituted or defended by the personal representative of a deceased person, the opposite party shall not be permitted to testify in his own favor as to transactions or communications with the decedent.

Ky.—Flood v. Pragoff, 79 Ky. 607, holding that the Code provision that no person shall testify for himself concerning any verbal statement of, or any transaction with, or any act done by a person since deceased, does not disqualify as witnesses in proceedings to probate a will, the heirs of the testator, or devisees or legatees under his will.

that the heirs of the testator are not disqualified as witnesses in their own behalf in a proceeding to contest the probate of their ancestor's will, by a statute providing that no person shall be excluded as a witness in any civil suit or proceeding at law or in equity, including special proceedings by courts of probate, by reason of interest in the event thereof, except where, at the time of the trial, the party prosecuting or defending is an executor or administrator.

Md.—Johnson v. Johnson, 105 Md. 81, 121 Am. St. Rep. 570, 65 Atl. 918, holding that the widow of a decedent is not disqualified as a witness in her own behalf or in behalf of her children, in a proceeding involving the validity of a will, by a statutory provision disqualifying as witnesses in their own behalf as to transactions with or statements by the decedent, persons interested in the subject-matter of the controversy to which the representatives of a deceased person are parties. Nor are heirs disqualified as witnesses in their own favor in proceedings relative to the distribution of the estate of their ancestor. Jones v. Jones, 36 Md. 447, 11 Am. Rep. 505.

Mass.—Shailer v. Bumstead, 99 Mass. 112, holding that persons interested in or parties to a proceeding to probate a will are not disqualified by a statute prohibiting testimony by a party to a proceeding, where one of the original parties to the contract or cause of action in issue or on trial has deceased.

Mich.—Brown v. Bell, 58 Mich. 58, 24 N. W. 824; Re Disbrow, 58 Mich. 96, 24 N. W. 624; Re Lambie, 97 Mich. 49, 56 N. W. 223; Re Lautenshlager, 80 Mich. 285, 45 N. W. 147; McHugh v. Fitzgerald, 103 Mich. 21, 61 N. W. 354, holding that persons interested in the probate of a will are not disqualified as witnesses in their own favor, in a proceeding to probate a will, by a statute providing that when a suit or proceeding is prosecuted or defended by the heirs, assigns, devisees, legatees, or personal representatives of a deceased person, an interested party shall not be permitted to testify to matters equally within the knowledge of the deceased.

Whitfield v. Whitfield, 44 Miss. 254; Dunlap v. Hearn, 37 Miss. 471; 1 Greenl. Ev. 8th ed. § 337; Stuhlmüller v. Ewing, 39 Miss. 447; Hagerman v. Wigent, 108 Mich. 192; Moeckel v. Mo.—Dickey v. Malechi, 6 Mo. 177, 34 Am. Dec. 130, holding that heirs at law are not disqualified by statute making incompetent as witnesses in their own behalf one of the original parties to the contract or cause of action, where the other party has since deceased. Garvin v. Williams, 50 Mo. 206, holding that beneficiaries under the will are not disqualified. To the same effect, see Gamache v. Gambs, 52 Mo. 287.

N. J.—Mackin v. Mackin, 37 N. J. Eq. 528, holding that the proponent of a will is not disqualified as a witness in his own behalf by a statutory provision that no party shall be sworn in any case where the opposite party sues or is sued in a representative capacity. Neither is an executor, although also the proponent of a will; nor is the beneficiary under the will disqualified as a witness in his own behalf. Grant v. Stamler, 68 N. J. Eq. 555, 59 Atl. 890.

Ohio.—Wolf v. Powner, 30 Ohio St. 472, holding that parties interested in the probate of a will are not disqualified where the statute expressly excepts from the operation of the general disqualifying clause heirs of the decedent and legatees claiming under his will in cases to contest the validity of or to set aside the will.

Pa.—Bowen v. Goranflo, 73 Pa. 357, holding that a person who is an executor and also a devisee under a will is a competent witness on the trial of a feigned issue to determine the validity of such will, where the disqualifying statute excepts from its operation issues and inquiries devisavit vel non and others respecting the right of such deceased owner between parties claiming such right by devolution upon the death of the owner.

R. I.—Hamilton v. Hamilton, 10 R. I. 540, holding that contestants of a will are not disqualified as witnesses in their own behalf by a statutory provision that where an executor or administrator is a party to the suit, the other party shall not be admitted to testify in his own favor.

Tenn.—Beadles v. Alexander, 9 Baxt. 606, holding that, in a proceeding to probate a will, legatees or devisees are not disqualified as witnesses in their own favor by a statute

Messrs. Campbell & Campbell, also for appellee:

Mrs. Kirk does not come within the condemnation of the statute, for two reasons: First, because her claim did not originate in the lifetime of her husband, W. J. Kirk; second, because she is not proposing to testify in a suit seeking to establish her claim against the estate, but in a suit in which the controversy is over the estate of a deceased person.

Covington v. Frank, 77 Miss. 606, 27 So. 1000; Kelly v. Miller, 39 Miss. 17; Mullins v. Cottrell, 41 Miss. 291; Tucker v. Whitehead, 59 Miss. 594; Steen v. Kirkpatrick, 84 Miss. 63, 36 So. 140; Jamison v. Jamison, 92 Miss. 468, 46 So. 83, 945; Sivley v. Roberts, — Miss. —, 53 So. 595; 40 Cyc.

ute providing that, in actions or proceedings by or against executors, etc., in which judgment may be rendered for or against such personal representatives, neither party shall be allowed to testify against the other as to transactions with or statements by decedent.

Tex.—Simron v. Middleton, 51 Tex. Civ. App. 531, 12 S. W. 441, holding that a statutory provision that, in actions by or against executors, administrators, guardians, etc., in which judgment may be rendered for or against such representative, neither party shall be allowed to testify against the other as to any transaction with or statement by the deceased, including actions by or against the heirs or legal representatives, arising out of any transaction with the deceased, does not include proceedings for the probate of a will, and hence does not disqualify witnesses in such proceedings. By earlier cases, however, it is held that an interested witness is disqualified by this statute from giving testimony for the purpose of establishing a nuncupative will. See Texas cases, infra.

Utah.—Miller v. Livingstone, 31 Utah, 415, 88 Pac. 338, holding that in a proceeding to revoke the probate of a will, heirs at law are not disqualified as witnesses in their own favor by a statute disqualifying all parties to a civil action, suit, or proceeding, or any person directly interested in the event thereof, and any person from, through, or under whom such party or interested person derives his interest or title, when the adverse party claims or opposes, sues or defends, as executor, etc., as to any statement by or transaction with the decedent, or matter of fact whatever which must have been equally within the knowledge of both the witnesses and the deceased.

Vt.—Foster v. Dickerson, 64 Vt. 233, 24 Atl. 253, holding that in a proceeding to contest the validity of a will, the legatee therein is not disqualified by a statute disqualifying one party as a witness where the other party to the contract or cause of action has deceased. Va.—Martz v. Martz, 25 Gratt. 361, holding that devisees or legatees are not disqualified by a statute providing that when one of the original parties to a contract or other transaction which is the subject of investigation is dead the other party shall not be admitted to testify in his own favor.

Can.—Re Farquharson, 33 N. S. 261, holding that persons interested for or against the probate of a will are not disqualified as witnesses in their own favor in such a proceeding by a statute disqualifying as witnesses in their own favor persons having dealings, transactions, or agreements with a person since deceased, where the testimony relates to such dealings, transactions, or agreements.

b. Where disqualification applies only to parties or devisees or legatees.

In New Hampshire, the contestant of a will appealing from the probate thereof is held disqualified as a witness in his own behalf by a statute providing that neither party shall testify in any action when the adverse party is an executor or administrator (Welch v. Adams, 63 N. H. 344, 56 Am. Rep. 521, 1 Atl. 1); but, on the trial of an appeal from the probate of a will, neither the testator's heirs, nor the devisees or legatees under his will, are disqualified as witnesses in their own behalf, where they are not appellants, since in such cases they are not parties to the proceeding, although they are interested in the event thereof. Wheeler v. Towns, 43 N. H. 56.

In Nebraska it is held that heirs at law are not disqualified from testifying in a proceeding to probate a will by a statutory provision that no person having a direct legal interest in the result of a civil action or proceeding when the adverse party is the representative of a deceased person shall be permitted to testify to any transaction or conversation with the deceased (McCoy v. Conrad, 64 Neb. 150, 89 N. W. 665), but it seems that devisees or legatees are the deceased made a will devising all of his property to his three sisters, who are the appellants in this case. When this will was offered for probate, Mrs. Kirk, the widow, filed a caveat, protesting against the probate of the will because same was not executed in the manner and form required by law, because at the date of the will testator was not of sound mind and body, and was not capable of making a will, and because the execution of the will was obtained by undue influence of the beneficiaries thereof. An issue devisavit vel non was made up, and a jury impaneled to try the issue returned a verdict in favor of the contestant.

At the trial, all of the grounds of contest seem to have been abandoned, save the one disqualified as witnesses in their own behalf in such a proceeding at least prior to the probate of the will under which they claim. Ibid.

c. Where disqualification depends upon character of testimony.

In some jurisdictions, although the disqualification of the statute is held to include proceedings either to probate a will or to set aside a probated will, the disqualification is limited to the character of the testimony expressly referred to in the statute, and the witness is not held to be generally disqualified or incompetent in such cases; therefore it is really the evidence that is rendered incompetent. This distinction is of importance in considering the weight to be attached to any decision holding that a witness is either wholly or partially disqualified, or that the disqualifying statute does not include proceedings to probate a will. For while, of course, the broad statement in a case that a statute does not disqualify a witness in his own behalf in a proceeding to probate a will is entitled to some weight on this point, yet if, as a matter of fact, the testimony with reference to which the question was raised did not come within the scope and purview of the statute, the value of the decision as to the competency of a witness in a case where the testimony was of a character within the purview of the statute is considerably lessened. This may be illustrated by reference to Johnson v. Johnson, 105 Md. 81, 121 Am. St. Rep. 570, 63 Atl. 918, holding that a widow is not disqualified as a witness on the trial of a caveat to a will filed by her as next friend of her infant children, since she is not a party within the provision of the Maryland statute by which a person interested in the subject-matter of the controversy to which the representative of the deceased person is a party is disqualified as a witness, and which by amendment was limited to personal transactions with or statements made by the intestate. While the exact character of the testimony is not made to appear, it involving the testamentary capacity of the testator. The testimony of Mrs. Kirk, the wife of testator, formed a very material part of the evidence to establish the insanity of her deceased husband, all of which was objected to by appellants, upon two grounds, viz.: First. Because the wife was incompetent to testify concerning the acts and words of her husband, done and said under the protection of confidential communication between husband and wife. Second. Because the testimony of the wife was to establish her own claim to the estate of the deceased, which originated during the lifetime of the deceased.

The testimony of Mrs. Kirk recited in full the most intimate relations between herself and her deceased husband from their marriage to his death. She told about his habit of drinking and intoxication, his hearing of voices and communications with the spirits of the dead, his mutterings and outcries while asleep, the delusions which caused him to arm himself with guns and pistols, backed up by a bottle of whisky to supply courage, insults offered her, and attempts to take her life. True, it appears that he had been guilty of similar conduct at other times in the presence of others. His conduct and declarations in the presence of others it is competent for her to relate; but this does not authorize or permit her to testify about similar conduct and declarations made to her alone.

We think the major part of Mrs. Kirk's testimony comes under the condemnation apparently related to the mental capacity of the testator as affected by his unfounded belief in the unchastity of the witness and the illegitimacy of their children, and the purpose of the testimony was apparently to show that this belief on the part of the testator was unfounded, and hence the testimony related to the chastity of the witness. It is clear that testimony of this character would be held admissible by an interested party in a proceeding to probate a will in New York state under a very similar statute, and which, however, is held to apply to proceedings to probate a will. Thus, the New York statute disqualifies a person interested from testifying in his own behalf concerning a personal transaction or communication between himself and a deceased person against the executor, administrator, or survivor of a deceased person, or a person deriving his title or interest from, through, or under the deceased person. This statute has been held to disqualify a legatee or devisee from testifying in his own behalf where the testimony relates to a transaction or communication with the deceased, but it is pointed out in the case of Lane v. Lane, 95 N. Y. 494, that the statute will not disqualify a witness if the testimony relates to a conversation between the deceased and another person, overheard by the witness, and in which he took no part. On this latter point, however, see other New York cases infra, IX. b.

In Iowa the proponent of a will who is also the devisee therein is held disqualified as a witness in favor of the will in a proceeding for its probate to which the heirs of the testator are parties, if the testimony relates to transactions with or communications of the deceased, by a statute providing that no party to an action or proceeding, or any person interested in the event thereof, shall be examined as a witness as to any personal transactions with or communications of the deceased person as against the executor, heir at law, or next of kin. Sisters of Visitation v. Glass, 45 Iowa, 154; Re Rehards, — Iowa, —, 143 N. W. 1106, holding that a son of the testator, claiming as beneficiary under his 51 L.R.A. (N.S.)

will, is disqualified. Ross v. Ross, 140 Iowa, 51, 117 N. W. 1105, holding that the contestant of a will is disqualified.

In Kansas, the heirs of a deceased person are held disqualified as witnesses in their own behalf with reference to any personal communication with the testator by a statute providing that no party shall be allowed to testify in his own behalf in respect to any transaction or communication with the deceased person when the adverse party is executor, administrator, or next of kin, where they have acquired title immediately from the deceased (Wehe v. Mood, 68 Kan. 373, 75 Pac. 476); and the disqualification applies to an executor who is also a devisee (Rich v. Bowker, 25 Kan. 7).

In North Carolina any interested witness may testify if the testimony does not relate to a personal transaction or communication with the decedent, under a statute forbidding interested witnesses from being examined in regard to any transaction or communication with a deceased person where the testimony is against the party defending as executor, etc. Umstead v. Bowling, 150 N. C. 507, 64 S. E. 368; Linebarger v. Linebarger, 143 N. C. 229, 55 S. E. 709, 10 Ann. Cas. 596.

The West Virginia statute disqualifying an interested person from testifying in his own behalf in respect to any transaction or communication had personally with a deceased person has been held to disqualify heirs at law as witnesses in their own favor in proceedings in equity attacking a probated will. Kerr v. Lunsford, 31 W. Va. 659, 2 L.R.A. 668, 8 S. E. 493; Freeman v. Freeman, 71 W. Va. 303, 76 S. E. 657; Bailey v. Bee, — W. Va. —, 80 S. E. 454. It does not, however, disqualify a devisee and legatee who is also an heir of the testator, from testifying in a similar proceeding to the fact of the execution of the will, according to a statement in Barker v. Hinton, 62 W. Va. 639, 59 S. E. 614, 13 Ann. Cas. 1150.

In Wisconsin a statute providing that no party in interest shall be examined as a witness in reference to any transaction or of the rule which prevents one spouse from testifying about the acts and words of the other, which acts or words were performed or uttered when they were alone, and were therefore to be deemed confidential. This rule has been relaxed in many jurisdictions, and many arguments are advanced to buttress the exception allowed. With these exceptions as weapons, able and distinguished counsel have laid siege to, assaulted, and pounded the rule, until it is a mere shadow of the original. We prefer to adhere to the old rule in all of its form and purity. We are unable to differentiate between acts and words—and cannot appreciate the distinction between words termed “verbal acts” and mere words used in the confidential relations between husband and wife.

The confession of adultery, or the charge of infidelity, made in the privacy and under the confidence of the marriage confessional, are both protected. It will not do to say that because the husband, in a moment of contrition, or apprehension of ultimate detection, confesses to his adulterous relations with another woman, that this removes the ban of confidence, because the very act confessed tends to destroy the marital relations.

Again, because a husband, in a moment of jealous rage or drunken frenzy, confronts the virtuous wife with a cowardly and unfounded charge of infidelity, and because this deadliest of all insults is a thous-communication with the deceased person is held to disqualify as a witness in his own behalf, as to the reading of the will to the testator before its execution by him, a legatee who is also the proponent of the will, and who took part and assisted in the execution of the will which it was sought to probate. Goerke v. Goerke, 80 Wis. 516, 50 N. W. 345. Also to disqualify an heir at law of the testator who is also a devisee or legatee in his will as to testimony regarding personal transactions or communications between himself and the testator. Re Valentine, 93 Wis. 45, 67 N. W. 12. This disqualification is also held to apply to a daughter of the testator. Anderson v. Laugen, 122 Wis. 57, 99 N. W. 437.

In Indiana a statute disqualifying as witnesses interested parties in suits by or against heirs or devisees, founded on a contract of or demand against the ancestor, to obtain title to or possession of property, includes actions to contest wills, and renders parties thereto incompetent to testify to matters occurring in the lifetime of the testator, except such facts and occurrences as are open to the observation of all of his friends and acquaintances, and are to be used as a basis for an opinion as to the mental competency of the decedent. Hiatt v. McColley, 171 Ind. 91, 85 N. E. 772. Compare with cases infra, V. a.

d. Distinction between proceedings affecting probate of will and proceedings between heirs relating to distribution.

In Illinois the statutory provision that no party to any civil action, suit, or proceeding, or person directly interested in the event of the suit, shall be allowed to testify therein in his own behalf when the adverse party sues or defends as executor, administrator, heir, or devisee, is held to apply to proceedings in chancery to set aside a probated will, and hence heirs at law, devisees, and legatees are disqualified as witnesses in their own behalf in such a proceeding (Jones v. Abbott, 235 Ill. 220, 85 N. E. 270; Wickes v. Walden, 228 Ill. 56, 81 N. E. 51 L.R.A.(N.S.)

798; Baker v. Baker, 202 Ill. 595, 67 N. E. 410; Waugh v. Moan, 200 Ill. 298, 65 N. E. 713); but it is held that, in adjusting their rights among themselves, those who are conceded to be heirs at law, or who have been adjudicated to be heirs at law of the decedent, are not disqualified as witnesses in their own behalf (Re Maher, 210 Ill. 160, 71 N. E. 438; Laurence v. Laurence, 164 Ill. 367, 45 N. E. 1071).

The Colorado statute is similar to the Illinois statute, and it is construed to disqualify heirs and devisees from testifying in their own behalf in a proceeding to probate a will. Re Shapter, 35 Colo. 578, 6 L.R.A.(N.S.) 575, 117 Am. St. Rep. 216, 85 Pac. 688.

e. Cases holding disqualification to be absolute.

WHITEHEAD v. KIRK holds that the wife of the deceased is disqualified as a witness in a proceeding to contest the will of her husband where the purpose of the testimony is to invalidate the will, in which event, if the testator had no other valid will, and hence died intestate, the wife would be entitled to receive his property. The disqualifying statute of this state provides that a person shall not testify as a witness to establish his own claim or defense against the estate of a deceased person, which originated in his lifetime.

Under the decision in the foregoing case the widow of the testator is held to be disqualified as a witness upon the question of the mental capacity of the testator. For other cases considering this particular question, see infra, IX. a, 1, 2.

III. Comparison of decisions with reference to form of statute; where party disqualified when opposite party is executor, etc.

The cases are in conflict as to the applicability of statutes which in general terms disqualify one party to the proceeding where the other party is the representative of the deceased person. In view of this conflict of decisions, attention is es-and times worse than a blow, we do not think the wife can go upon the witness stand and detail before a jury the revolting and shocking brutality of her jealous or drunken spouse. By the policy of the law, as we understand it, the door of confidence is closed to all prying eyes and eager ears, never to be opened by the husband or wife in a court whose duty it is to uphold the rule founded upon the wisdom of time and experience.

When the husband and wife are alone, everything said and done is under the protection of the rule, and the declarations and conduct of both are presumed to be confidential. That similar acts occur and similar words are used in the presence of others raises no presumption that the presumably confidential declarations and conduct have been thereby released, and that those things said and done in privacy then become public property. Of course, many things are said and done by husband or wife, which, upon their face, bear no semblance of confidence; but ordinarily what a wife says to her husband alone is said because he is her husband, and because she can speak freely, undisturbed by the possibility that he will repeat what she says. For this reason, we think, when communication between husband and wife can be reasonably construed as confidential, the rule of public policy applies, and, no matter what may happen in particular cases, the courts will not permit a disclosure.

Change does not always denote progress, specially called to the cases included under subdivision IV., under the classification, "where party to contract or cause of action is excluded." The statutes construed by the cases included under the latter classification are very similar to the statutes construed under subdivision III., although in Welch v. Adams, 63 N. H. 344, 56 Am. Rep. 521, 1 Atl. 1, (included under subdivision II.), the Massachusetts and Missouri cases referred to under subdivision IV., are said to be based upon a statute materially different from the New Hampshire statute.

Cases holding interested witness disqualified.

Under the Illinois statute providing that no party to any civil action, suit, or proceeding, or person directly interested in the event thereof, shall be allowed to testify therein of his own motion or in his own behalf when any adverse party sues or defends as the executor, administrator, heir, or devisee of any deceased person, unless when called as a witness by such adverse party suing or defending, heirs are not competent witnesses in their own behalf in a suit to which they are parties to set aside the will of their ancestor. Brace v. Black, 125 Ill. 33, 17 N. E. 66; Volbracht v. White, 197 Ill. 298, 64 N. E. 324; Waugh v. Moan, 200 Ill. 298, 65 N. E. 713; Wickes v. Walden, 228 Ill. 56, 81 N. E. 798.

And under that statute, a daughter of the testator, who is a beneficiary under the will, is incompetent to testify in support of the will in a suit to set aside the probate, in which the adverse party sues as heir of the testator. Jones v. Abbott, 235 Ill. 220, 85 N. E. 279.

So, the nephew and niece of the testator, who were parties to the proceeding for the probate of the will, and were beneficiaries under it, and also trustees to carry into effect its provisions, were held not competent witnesses in support of the will, the opposite parties being heirs at law of the deceased. Re Tobin, 196 Ill. 484, 63 N. E. 1921.

Wood v. Wood, 263 Ill. 285, 104 N. E. 1108, holds that by the terms of § 2 of Hurd's Rev. Stat. 1913, chap. 51, a person claiming as legatee under a will is not competent to testify in his own behalf in a proceeding contesting the probate of a will, that he was present at the time of the execution of the will, and that he dictated to the scrivener the form of a devise to himself, where the scrivener informed him that she did not know how to frame it, the question at issue being whether such devise was inserted in the will before or after the death of the testator.

In Laurence v. Laurence, 164 Ill. 367, 45 N. E. 1071, the court said that the rule to be deduced from the Pigg Case, infra, and other cases that had commented upon that case, was that "where, among those who are conceded the heirs, there arises a controversy as to the distribution of the estate among them, they may testify, as such testimony does not tend to reduce or impair the estate among them." And that language is quoted with apparent approval in Re Maher, 210 Ill. 160, 71 N. E. 438.

In Pigg v. Carroll, 89 Ill. 205, a suit for partition among the heirs at law, where the matter in dispute related to the value of advancements made by the ancestor, it was held that the parties were competent witnesses. The court said that the property involved belonged to the litigants, and it made no difference how they acquired the title to it, whether by purchase or descent; that there was no more reason for saying that they sued or defended as heirs than if the property had been acquired otherwise than by inheritance.

But in a suit for partition of land which the complainants' father, since deceased, had inherited jointly with his brother from his father, the uncle was held incompetent as a witness to prove that certain advances were made to the complainants' father by their grandfather. Comer v. Comer, 119 Ill. 170, 8 N. E. 796, distinguishing Pigg v. Carroll, supra, upon the ground that in that case the parties litigating held a title derived from the same identical source, and the litigation concerned property which con-and modern departures from ancient rules of law in response to the exigencies of particular cases frequently obliterate the wisest and safest rules designed for the protection of society. Modern practices and advanced ideas look with complaisance upon the spectacle of husband and wife worshipping different Gods and voting in the same booth for different candidates and different governmental policies. We confess to a preference for the old-fashioned ideal of the oneness of man and wife, and at the risk of being classed as "standpatters" we adopt as a sound policy, applicable to the wife as to the husband, the sentiment expressed in these words: "Therefore shall a man leave his father and his mother, and shall cleave unto his wife; and they shall be one flesh." True, this admonition is hoary with age; but we doubt that the cock-suredness of modern iconoclasm has succeeded in demonstrating the unwisdom of the common paternal ancestor of all mankind. The majority still believe in the doctrine, even though few obey it.

There is an irreconcilable conflict in the authorities upon the precise point involved in this case. In Stein v. Bowman, 13 Pet. 209, 10 L. ed. 129, it is said: "The rule which protects the domestic relations from exposure rests upon considerations connected with the peace of families. And it is conceived that this principle does not merely afford protection to the husband and wife, which they are at liberty to invoke or not, at their discretion; . . . but it cededly belonged to the parties in suit; whereas, in the case at bar, the title that was in the ancestor of the complainants was disputed, and the minor heirs were endeavoring to maintain the right that was in him.

A legatee under a will in contest, being also the widow of the testator, is competent as a witness in her own behalf to testify in rebuttal, denying statements testified to have been made in the presence of the testator, where the statute expressly provides that where, in any action, suit, or proceeding, any witness not a party to the record, or not a party in interest, or not an agent of the deceased person, shall, in behalf of any party to such action, suit, or proceeding, testify to any conversation or admission by any adverse party or party in interest, occurring before the death or in the absence of such deceased person, such adverse party or party in interest may also testify to the same admission or conversation. Judy v. Judy, 261 Ill. 470, 104 N. E. 256.

The Colorado disqualifying statute is adopted from the Illinois statute, and in construing same the decisions of the Illinois courts have been followed; the Colorado court holding that under this statute heirs and devisees are incompetent to testify in a proceeding to probate a will, the court remarking that the same rule applies to a proceeding to probate a will as applies to a proceeding to set aside a probated will, it being the latter point which was involved in most of the Illinois cases. Re Shapter, 35 Colo. 578, 6 L.R.A.(N.S.) 575, 117 Am. St. Rep. 216, 85 Pac. 688.

Where the statute disqualifies as a witness interested parties in suits by or against heirs or devisees, founded on a contract with or demand against the ancestor to obtain title to or possession of property, etc., actions to contest wills are included and render the parties thereto incompetent to testify to matters occurring in the lifetime of the testator, except such facts and occurrences as were open to the observation of all his friends and acquaintances, and are to be used as a basis for an opinion 51 L.R.A.(N.S.)

as to the mental competency of the testator. Hiatt v. McColley, 171 Ind. 91, 85 N. E. 772.

In Wolfe v. Kable, 107 Ind. 565, 8 N. E. 559, parties to a suit for partition were held incompetent to testify as to what their father said at the time certain conveyances were made, for the purpose of proving that they were gifts rather than advancements. The court declared generally that where the controversy is between heirs as to rights derived through contracts or transactions with the ancestor, none of the parties are competent to testify as to declarations made by him.

Cases holding interested witness competent.

In New Hampshire it is held that a statute providing that neither party shall testify in an action when the adverse party is an executor or administrator disqualifies as a witness in his own behalf the contestant of a will appealing from the probate thereof, since the reason which forbids the surviving party to testify as to matters of dispute, or transactions with the deceased, is equally applicable in the trial of an appeal from the probate of a will. And the same injustice that the statute seeks to prevent in other actions to which the executor is a party, by excluding the surviving party from testifying, will often be done in the trial of an appeal upon the probate of a will, if the contestant may testify to matters about which the testator, if living, might testify, and perhaps contradict or explain the testimony of the contestant. Welch v. Adams, 63 N. H. 344, 56 Am. Rep. 521, 1 Atl. 1. In this jurisdiction, however, it has been held in an appeal from the probate of a will, that the heirs of the testator and also devisees or legatees under his will, who are not appellants, are not disqualified as witnesses, since they are not parties to the proceeding, although interested in the event thereof. Wheeler v. Towns, 43 N. H. 56.

A statute providing that no party shall be sworn in any case where the opposite party sues or is sued in a representative capacity does not disqualify as a witness in renders them incompetent to disclose facts in evidence in violation of the rule. And it is well that the principle does not rest on the discretion of the parties. If it did, in most instances, it would afford no substantial protection to persons uninstructed in their rights, and thrown off their guard and embarrassed by searching interrogatories. . . . Can the wife, under such circumstances, either voluntarily be permitted or by force of authority be compelled to state facts in evidence which render infamous the character of her husband? We think most clearly that she cannot be. Public policy and established principles forbid it."

In State v. Jolly, 20 N. C. 108 (3 Dev. & B. L. 110) 32 Am. Dec. 656, the court, her own behalf the proponent of a will, although interested in the probate thereof as the widow of the testator. The fact that she has presented the will for judicial action, although it makes her in a certain sense a party to the proceedings, does not make her a party within the meaning of the statute, which, by its prohibitory limitation, aims to prevent persons making claims by proceedings at law or in equity against the estates of deceased persons from profiting in their suit by means of their own testimony as to transactions with or statements of the deceased, since the proceeding to probate a will is not a suit, but a judicial inquiry as to whether the instrument before the court is the last will and testament of the deceased. Mackin v. Mackin, 37 N. J. Eq. 528. Neither the testimony of the executor of a will nor that of the beneficiary thereunder in relation to testamentary capacity, in a proceeding for the probate of the will, is incompetent. Grant v. Stanler, 68 N. J. Eq. 555, 59 Atl. 890.

The statute providing that when the original party to the contract or cause of action is dead, or when an executor or administrator is a party to the suit, the other party may be called as a witness by his opponent, but shall not be admitted to testify upon his own offer, does not disqualify as witnesses in their own behalf the contestants of a will, since it is only when an executor is party as executor representing the estate that the statutory provision applies, and in a proceeding to contest a will the person nominated therein as executor is not a party to the proceeding in his capacity as executor. Hamilton v. Hamilton, 10 R. I. 540.

A statutory provision that no person shall be excused or excluded from being a witness in any civil suit or proceeding at law or in equity, including special proceedings before courts of probate, by reason of his interest in the event thereof, as a party or otherwise, except where, at the time of trial, the party prosecuting or defending is an executor or administrator, or is made a party as heir, does not disqualify as witnesses the heirs of the testator in a pro-

in commenting upon what acts and conduct are within the privilege as verbal communications, said: "But it is not enough to throw protection over communications made in the spirit of confidence. The intimacy of the marriage union enables each to be a daily and almost constant witness of the conduct of the other; and thus in fact a confidence, reaching much farther than that of verbal communications, is forced upon each of the parties. What one may even desire to conceal from all human eyes and ears is thus almost unavoidably brought within the observation of the other. . . . The rule we deem a valuable one, and we view with apprehension any exception having a tendency, more or less direct, to promote cunning, or to generate distrust,

IV. Where party to contract or cause of action is excluded.

In a proceeding to probate a will a statute prohibiting testimony by a party to the proceeding where one of the original parties to the contract or cause of action in issue and on trial has deceased does not disqualify as witnesses persons interested in or parties to such proceeding. Shailer v. Bumstead, 99 Mass. 112.

In Missouri a statute making incompetent as a witness in his own behalf the original party to a contract or cause of action where the other party has since deceased is held not to apply to the heir at law of the decedent, since he is not a party to a proceeding to establish and probate a lost will in a sense to disqualify him as a witness, especially where his testimony is against his own interests. Dickey v. Malechi, 6 Mo. 177, 34 Am. Dec. 130. Neither does the statute operate to disqualify as witnesses to sustain a will beneficiaries therein. Garvin v. Williams, 50 Mo. 206; Gamache v. Gambs, 52 Mo. 287.

In a proceeding to contest the validity of a will a legatee therein is competent as a witness in favor of the will upon all the material issues in the case, since the statute disqualifying one party as a witness where the other party to the contract or cause of action in issue and on trial is dead does not apply to a proceeding of this character. Foster v. Dickerson, 64 Vt. 233, 24 Atl. 253; Re Buckman, 64 Vt. 313, 33 Am. St. Rep. 930, 24 Atl. 252; Manley v. Staples, 65 Vt. 370, 26 Atl. 630; Re Mason, 82 Vt. 160, 72 Atl. 329.

And an interested witness may testify to the execution of the will, in contradiction of the testimony of the attesting witnesses. Re Wheelock, 76 Vt. 235, 56 Atl. 1013.

In Foster v. Dickerson, supra, it is said that the testatrix, by her legal representatives, is not a party to or in any way interested in a proceeding to probate her will. The controversy is between the living par-where the best interests of society require that perfect frankness and confidence ought to prevail. If one exception be sanctioned, because, from the character of the criminal act imputed, the dissent of the witness from its commission must be presumed, others may follow, where the like presumption will be entertained, . . . and there will be danger of our having no rule capable of general and steady application. . . . Moreover, the rule is not founded exclusively upon an actual voluntary confidence reposed by one of the married pair in the other, but also upon the unavoidable confidence which the intimacy of the marriage state necessarily produces." In Schreffler v. Chase, 245 Ill. 395, 137 Am. St. Rep. 330, 92 N. E. 272, a case treating testimony much like the testimony delivered by Mrs. Kirk in this case, it is held that the divorced husband was incompetent to testify to the conduct of the testa-ties who, on the one side, are legatees under the will, represented by the proponents, and, on the other side, are the heirs at law of the testatrix. The former claim to take the estate under the will, and the latter under the statute regulating the descent of estates, insisting that the alleged will is a nullity, and the act of the testatrix in making the alleged will is the only subject-matter of the investigation. The proceeding is in the nature of a proceeding in rem, and establishes the relation of all the parties to the corpus of the estate. The gist of the action is not changed by the fact that the trial may indirectly involve a determination of the relations of the witnesses to the testatrix.

The statutory provision that when one of the original parties to a contract or other transaction which is the subject of investigation is dead, the other party shall not be admitted to testify in his own favor unless first called to testify on behalf of the party first named, does not disqualify as witnesses in their own behalf devisees or legatees, in a proceeding to probate the testator's will, since they are not parties to the transaction. Martz v. Martz, 25 Gratt. 361.

In the preceding case the court remarked that legatees or devisees may be said to be parties in interest under the will, but they cannot be said to be parties to the making of the will merely because it invests them with an interest. The testator is the only party to the execution of his will. He may have consulted others and been advised, and he may have employed a scrivener to write it, but if it is his will, it is his act alone.

And see Wilkes v. Wilkes, — Va. —, 80 S. E. 745, holding that since a will is solely the act of the testator, and its execution is not such a contract or transaction as comes within the purview of the disqualifying statute, the widow of a deceased testator is a competent witness to the fact of having stricken a certain clause from the testator's will at his request.

transactions, and agreements with a person since deceased, does not disqualify as witnesses in their own behalf persons interested either for or against the probate of a will. Re Farquharson, 33 N. S. 261.

V. Where disqualification is limited to personal transactions or communications with decedent.

a. Cases holding statute inapplicable.

The cases are in conflict as to the rule applicable under statutes prohibiting interested witnesses from testifying as to personal transactions or communications with a deceased person whose executor, etc., is a party to the proceeding, or whose estate is interested in the result of the suit. The following cases hold that a proceeding to probate a will is not within the scope and meaning of disqualifying statutes in this form, and hence, in proceedings of this character, persons interested in the probate of a will, or in defeating its probate, are not disqualified as witnesses in their own favor.

Thus it has been held that a statute providing that, in an action by or against an executor, administrator, or guardian, in which judgment may be rendered for or against him, neither party shall be allowed to testify against the other as to any transactions with or statements of the testator, intestate, or ward, unless called to testify by the opposite party, was intended to protect the estate of deceased persons from the attacks of persons who had or claimed to have had business transactions with the deceased, and who are seeking to establish claims against his estate, and it has no application to controversies between devisees themselves over a will, or between devisees or legatees and the heirs as to the distribution of the estate by will or otherwise, since in such case the corpus of the estate is in no manner affected; hence, under this statute, the testimony of an heir at law of a testator, who is contesting the latter's will, is competent in her own behalf. Taylor v. McClintock, 87 Ark. 243, 112 S. W. 405.

trix, as observed by him from the time he married up to the time of the separation.

The other point relied upon for a reversal invokes a broader rule to exclude the testimony of Mrs. Kirk. It is insisted that she was incompetent to testify at all "to establish his [her] own or assigned claim . . . against the estate of a deceased person." Section 1917, Revised Code of 1906. This section of the Code has been the law of the state since 1857, or longer. The language of the various statutes embodying the rule varies somewhat, but they are all to the same effect. Many times this court has construed this statute, and it is difficult to entirely harmonize the decisions. Able counsel for appellants in their briefs collate and critically analyze all the cases.

Probate of a will is not an action or proceeding by or against an executor in which a judgment or decree may be rendered for or against him as such executor, within a statute providing that, in actions or proceedings by or against executors, administrators, or guardians, in which judgment or decree may be rendered for or against them, neither party shall be allowed to testify against the other as to any transaction with or statement by the testator, intestate, or ward, unless called to testify thereto by the opposite party, since to such a proceeding there are no parties, and in contemplation of law it is solely an inquiry as to the validity of a certain paper writing, whether it is or is not the last will and testament of the testator. Re Spiegelhalter, 1 Penn. (Del.) 5, 39 Atl. 465.

In Texas the doctrine is asserted that in a proceeding to establish a nuncupative will the persons claiming thereunder as devisees or legatees are disqualified from testifying to establish the will by the statutory provision that, in an action by or against executors, administrators, or guardians, in which judgment may be rendered for or against them, neither party shall be allowed to testify against the other as to any transaction with or statement by the testator, intestate, or ward, unless called to testify by the opposite party, or called to testify by the court, since the heirs are parties to the proceeding, and the prohibition is not intended to protect an executor or administrator, although they are named, but it is intended to protect the parties beneficially interested . . . the heirs and creditors. Lewis v. Aylott, 45 Tex. 190.

The person named as executor by a nuncupative will is not a competent witness to establish same. Watts v. Holland, 56 Tex. 54.

So, the guardian of minor children of a deceased heir is disqualified from testifying in his own behalf, as a witness, in partition proceedings prosecuted by him against the other heirs, with reference to declarations of the ancestor, and the different heirs are also disqualified from giving tes-

We have examined the cases with care, and find ourselves unable to improve upon the work of counsel, and will therefore make use of their work by quoting liberally therefrom.

Before proceeding further, we now state the question, viz: Did Mrs. Kirk testify to establish her claim against the estate of deceased, which claim originated during the lifetime of deceased? To answer this question, we come now to a consideration of the decisions of this court:

Griffin v. Lower, 37 Miss. 458, was a suit by an administrator to recover on a note payable to him as such. Defendant offered to defend, by testifying about transactions with deceased in his lifetime, constituting timony in their own behalf. Ellis v. Stewart, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 24 S. W. 585.

According to this doctrine a proceeding to set aside the probate of a will is, in effect, an action by the heirs, arising out of a transaction with the testator; and hence a legatee is disqualified from testifying as to any statements made by the testator having a bearing on the validity of the will in controversy. Brown v. Mitchell, 75 Tex. 9, 12 S. W. 606.

While these earlier decisions indicate the inclination of the Texas court to apply the prohibitive provision of the disqualifying statute to proceedings to establish or probate wills as well as to ordinary civil suits, yet the later decisions, although not in express terms overruling the earlier ones, have considerably limited the doctrine asserted in them.

Thus, in Simon v. Middleton, 51 Tex. Civ. App. 531, 112 S. W. 441, it is held that a proceeding for the probate of a will is not an action by or against the heirs or legal representatives of a decedent, arising out of any transaction with such decedent, within the meaning of this language, following the provision heretofore referred to, disqualifying interested witnesses in actions by or against executors, administrators, or guardians, and hence, in a proceeding to probate a will, the contestant thereof, a daughter of the testator, is not disqualified as a witness in her own behalf to conversations with decedent tending to establish fraud and undue influence in procuring the will.

And it has been held that legatees and devisees are not included within the prohibitive provision of the statute, and are competent witnesses as to the declarations of the testator, in a contest between the legatees. Schnable v. Henderson, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 152 S. W. 231.

In a proceeding to probate a will, the widow of the testator, who is contesting the probate thereof, may testify to the amount of money and property owned and held by her at the time of her marriage to the deceased, and that she sold the property, and loaned the proceeds of the sale to the dethe consideration for the note. Testimony excluded.

Kelly v. Miller, 39 Miss. 17, was a case in which an executor and devisee was admitted to testify in support of the will. The whole question was whether article 45, p. 434, Code 1857, which made void a devise to a subscribing witness, resulted in making such witness incompetent to testify in support of the will.

Lamar v. Williams, 39 Miss. 342, was a suit to recover damages for battery to a slave. Defendants offered to testify that the owner, since deceased, consented. Evidence excluded, and the court gave a broad meaning to the word "claim," and said that the statute intended to prohibit the "undue advantage" of allowing a living party to "testify to matters which took place between him and the deceased, and which, resting entirely in the private transactions of the parties, could not be disproved or explained by reason of the death of the other party."

Witherspoon v. Blewett, 47 Miss. 570, contains a full and strong statement of the court's policy in construing the statute. It was said that "the interpretation put upon the statute is broader than its words, but was demanded by its reason and intent."

Jacks v. Bridewell, 51 Miss. 887, contains a full and strong review and assertion of the policy and meaning of the statute. The statute extends to every assertion of right to any part of the estate left by a deceased ceased. McDonald v. McDonald, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 150 S. W. 593.

In Tennessee a statutory provision that in actions or proceedings by or against executors, administrators, or guardians, in which judgment may be rendered for or against them, neither party shall be allowed to testify against the other as to transactions with or statements by the testator, intestate, or ward, unless called to testify by the opposite party, is held not to disqualify devisees or legatees from testifying in a proceeding to probate the will, as to declarations of the testator in his lifetime, since an issue of devisavit vel non is not an action by the executor in which judgment may be rendered for or against him, in the sense of this statute, but it is a contest by the devisees and legatees on the one side, and the heirs and distributees on the other. Beadles v. Alexander, 9 Baxt. 604.

The meaning of such a statute is that in a suit between the estate of a deceased person and a living party, the latter shall not be allowed to give his version of transactions or conversations of deceased, whose lips are closed; and in principle the provision does not apply to an issue to contest the will of a deceased person where both the devisee and heirs are still living and may testify for themselves. Ibid.

To the same effect is Davis v. Davis, 6 Lea, 543, as to a legatee.

In Florida it is held that a statute excluding interested persons from testifying in regard to any transaction or communication between them and a party at the time of the examination deceased does not exclude from testifying as witnesses to the probate of a will, the heirs at law, next of kin, or devisees of the testator, since a proceeding to establish or invalidate a will rests upon different ground from ordinary causes of action, and is in the nature of a proceeding in rem. The subject-matter of investigation is the act of the testator in executing the will, and the proceeding is directed to this, and the execution of the will is not a transaction or communication between the testator and the legatee or his heirs at law or next of kin. Hays v. Ernest, 32 Fla. 18, 13 So. 451.

In Maryland by an early act, a person interested in the subject-matter of the controversy to which the representative of the deceased person was a party was disqualified as a witness therein. By the amendment of this provision in 1904, the exclusion was limited to personal transactions with or statements made by the intestate.

In Johnson v. Johnson, 105 Md. 81, 121 Am. St. Rep. 570, 65 Atl. 918, it was held that the widow of the testator was a competent witness for her children in the trial of a caveat filed by her in their behalf, since she was not a party to the case within the meaning of the statute. The nature of the testimony does not clearly appear.

And in a contest between the alleged widow and those claiming to be the heirs at law and next of kin of a deceased person, the heirs at law are competent witnesses to establish their relationship, since the contest is merely as to the manner in which the estate shall be distributed. Jones v. Jones, 36 Md. 447, 11 Am. Rep. 505.

In Nebraska the statutory provision that no person having a direct legal interest in the result of a civil action or proceeding when the adverse party is the representative of a deceased person shall be permitted to testify to any transaction or conversation had between the deceased person and the witness is held not to disqualify the conceded heirs at law of the testator in such proceeding. McCoy v. Conrad, 64 Neb. 150, 89 N. W. 665. The court said that the devisees or legatees would be incompetent in such a proceeding, as they would assail the estate with a view to appropriating it or a part of it.

So, persons who would take as heirs at law or next of kin of the testator in case of the latter's intestacy are not disqualified from testifying as to transactions and conversations with the deceased, in a contest over his alleged will. Williams v. Miles, 68 Neb. 463, 62 L.R.A. 383, 110 Am. St. Rep. 431, 94 N. W. 705, 4 Ann. Cas. 306, rehearing denied in 68 Neb. 479, 96 N. W. 151, 4 Ann. Cas. 312.

party, by testimony about dealings with such party in his lifetime.

In Rothschild v. Hatch, 54 Miss. 554, A. L. Hatch, plaintiff in ejectment against the heirs of one Griffith, deceased, was held incompetent to testify about certain statements made by deceased in his lifetime as to the nature of his holding of the lands in controversy. In this case it was held that an assignment of the claim restored the competency of the party; whereupon the legislature promptly passed Acts 1878, p. 190, extending the exclusion to one who had assigned.

In Tucker v. Whitehead, 59 Miss. 594, it was held that the proponent and contestant were both competent to testify, notwithstanding the statute, and Kelly v. Miller, supra, was cited. But this case was as follows: In deceased's papers was found a will, with the signature torn off. In such case, the law presumes that this was done by the testator, and done animo revocandi. (See authorities cited by Mr. Leigh.) The real claim and issue on this issue of devisavit vel non was this, and only this: A question of fact, whether, after the death, a brother of the deceased got hold of the will and mutilated it. That was the sole question actually brought before the jury, as is shown by the statement of the case; and it was about that that the parties were in fact held competent to testify.

Neblett v. Neblett, 70 Miss. 572, 12 So. 598, was a controversy between two sets of devisees; the devisees having been made in

In Alabama it is held that a statute disqualifying as witnesses persons testifying to transactions with or statements by any deceased person whose estate is interested in the result of the suit does not disqualify as witnesses to the fact of the execution and attestation of a will legatees or devisees therein, in a suit or proceeding in which the validity of the will is involved, since the controversy is one to determine the status of the estate of the decedent and the condition in which he died, whether testate or intestate; hence it is a controversy between living parties, affecting only their interests, and in no proper sense is the estate of the testator interested in the result. Snider v. Burks, 84 Ala. 53, 4 So. 225; and to the same effect, see Kumpe v. Coons, 63 Ala. 448.

The estate of a decedent is not interested within the meaning of this statute in proceedings to probate a will, since it remains the same whether the will is probated or not. Hence the parties in interest are competent to testify to any fact relevant and material to the issue raised by a contest over the probate of a will on the ground of fraud, undue influence, or mental incapacity. Henry v. Hall, 106 Ala. 84, 54 Am. St. Rep. 22, 17 So. 187.

The grounds of the doctrine were thus stated in Kumpe v. Coons, supra: "An original proceeding in the court of probate for the probate of a will is a proceeding in rem. The purpose is to ascertain the status of the estate of the decedent, and the condition in which he died, whether testate or intestate. It does not assume the form and is not a suit inter partes, until the heirs or distributees intervene in the mode prescribed by the statute. . . . The character of the suit is not changed if there is no contest in the court of probate, and the heir at law, or next of kin, resort to the statutory remedy by bill in chancery. That remedy stands in the place of, and is the substitute for, proof of the will in solemn form, as practised in the ecclesiastical courts; or, if the will is of real estate, the action of ejectment at common law. . . . In either proceeding—the contests in the court of probate or by bill in a court of equity—the parties claiming under the will are in fact the actors, bound to support it affirmatively, while the heir or next of kin is in the relation of a defendant. . . . In either court, the controversy is between living parties, the estate of the testator is not interested. The interests of those claiming to succeed to it, either by operation of law, or by operation of the instrument propounded as a will, are alone involved. The estate remains intact, undiminished, whatever may be the result of the controversy, and the subject-matter of investigation is not a transaction with or statement by the decedent, but an act of his in its nature ambulatory and revocable, taking effect only by his death. . . . Upon all questions involved, the parties are competent witnesses,—competent as attesting witnesses, though devisees or legatees,—competent to prove any fact which may be involved in the real issue, whether there is a will or not."

In Georgia the statute declaring that where any suit is instituted or defended by the personal representatives of a deceased person the opposite party shall not be permitted to testify in his own favor against the deceased as to transactions or communications with him in his lifetime does not disqualify an executor or legatee as a witness, on the trial of an issue devisavit vel non. Harris v. Harris, 53 Ga. 678.

Neither does this statute disqualify as witnesses in their own favor in a proceeding to establish and probate a nuncupative will, either the propounders or the caveators, since the cause of action is the factum of the will, and the parties to the proceeding are all in life. In no sense of the word can the testatrix be called "the other party" in opposition to the propounder or the caveator. Brown v. Carroll, 36 Ga. 568.

And in Kentucky it is held that in a proceeding in opposition to the probate of a will a devisee therein it a competent witness to testify that, after the execution of the codicil of a will, he handed it to the testator, and the witness is not disqualified by the Code provision that no person general terms, and the questions turning on the titles of the devisors. Stirling Neblett, Sr., conveyed to his two sons, W. J. Neblett and Stirling Neblett, Jr., in 1857. The father died in 1871, devising his estate to his wife, Ann Neblett. Stirling Neblett, Jr., one of the two donees by the deed above mentioned, died in 1877; his mother being still living. The mother, Ann Neblett, then died in 1881. Then W. J. Neblett, the other donee by the deed above mentioned, died in 1891, ten years after the death of Ann. Bill was filed by the devisees of Ann Neblett, who died in 1881, against the devisees of Stirling Neblett, Jr., who died in 1877, and against the devisees of W. J. Neblett, who died in 1891, to vacate the deed of 1857. Complainants testified in their own behalf, but it was held that they were incompetent under the statute; their testimony going to show that after the making of the deed of 1857, until his death in 1871, Stirling Neblett, Sr., had retained possession of the lands, etc., and declarations and admissions by the deceased donees.

In Covington v. Frank, 77 Miss. 606, 27 So. 1000, Frank filed his bill against the unknown heirs of Covington, deceased, to collect certain notes executed by Covington alone. Covington's widow and daughter made appearance, interposed defense, etc., and testified to prove their relationship. Frank's bill was filed against the "unknown heirs" of Covington, and the depositions of the widow and daughter were strictly responsive, and only proved their shall testify for himself concerning any verbal statement of, or any transaction with, or any act done or admitted to be done by, a person since deceased, since the purpose of this statute is to protect the estate against the claims of third persons, and not to disqualify as witnesses the heirs, devisees, or legatees, for, in the latter case, the several claimants to the estate are on an equal footing, and there is perfect mutuality and equality so far as concerns the opportunity and the right to testify. Flood v. Pragoff, 79 Ky. 607.

In a controversy over the probate of a will the devisees and heirs at law of the deceased are competent witnesses in their own behalf, since such a proceeding is not one to settle the estate of the decedent, nor is it an action against the executor, administrator, heir, or devisee, in the sense in which that term is used by the disqualifying statute. Milton v. Hunter, 13 Bush, 163.

In contest over the probate of a will all the parties interested therein are competent witnesses (Williams v. Williams, 90 Ky. 28, 13 S. W. 250), including the heirs at law and devisees or legatees under the will (Phillips v. Phillips, 81 Ky. 328; King v. King, 19 Ky. L. Rep. 868, 42 S. W. 347; Carmical v. Carmical, 32 Ky. L. Rep. 171, 104 S. W. 1037; Cave v. Cave, 13 Bush, 452); and on the question whether money paid a legatee was an ademption of the legacy, a residuary devisee is a competent witness, and the legatee herself or her husband may testify in her behalf (Swinebroad v. Bright, 24 Ky. L. Rep. 2253, 73 S. W. 1031).

b. Cases holding statute applicable.

In the following cases the parties to a proceeding to probate a will or succeed to an estate, or persons interested in such proceeding, are held disqualified as witnesses in their own behalf.

In Kansas it is held that in a proceeding to contest a will the heirs of the testator are disqualified as witnesses with reference to personal communications of the 31 L.R.A. (N.S.)

testator in his lifetime by the statutory provision that no party shall be allowed to testify in his own behalf in respect to any transaction or communication had personally by such party with a deceased person when the adverse party is the executor, administrator, heir at law, or next of kin of the deceased, where they have acquired title to the cause of action immediately from such deceased person, since the heirs of a deceased person acquire title immediately from their deceased ancestor within the spirit and meaning of this act. Wehe v. Mood, 68 Kan. 373, 75 Pac. 476. In a proceeding to quiet title to land where all the parties claim from the same ancestor, evidence of any of them as to communications of the deceased ancestor is incompetent. Renz v. Drury, 57 Kan. 84, 45 Pac. 71. So, one who is executor and a devisee is incompetent in a suit to have a will set aside and the probate thereof vacated, to testify concerning personal communications with deceased. Rich v. Bowker, 25 Kan. 7.

And in Iowa it is held, under a statute providing that no party to an action or proceeding, or any person interested in the event thereof, shall be examined as a witness in regard to any personal transaction or communication between such witness and a person since deceased, against the executor, heir at law, or next of kin of such deceased person, that one of the proponents of a will, and a devisee therein, is disqualified as a witness in a proceeding to probate the will to which the heirs of the testator are parties, where the testimony relates to transactions or communications with the deceased, and is offered in behalf of the other proponents. Sisters of Visitation v. Glass, 45 Iowa, 154; to the same effect see Blake v. Rourke, 74 Iowa, 519, 38 N. W. 392. A son of the testator, being also a beneficiary under his will, is incompetent to testify in his own interest in a will contest as to personal transactions or communications with the deceased (Re Rehard, — Iowa, —, 143 N. W. 1106); and the exclusion also applies to the same extent to a contestant (Ross v. Ross, 140 Iowa, 51, identity as being those heirs, whom the complainant had called into court by the general terms of his bill. In that action they were not pursuing the estate for anything, and no decree rendered in their favor could have established any right in them as against any representative or heir of the estate. On the other hand, they were not testifying defensively, within the meaning of the statute, because they were not being pursued in behalf of the estate of any person whatever. It was simply one instance of the well-recognized class of cases (of which there are numerous other instances in the decisions on this statute) where the testimony would only remotely or collaterally claim an interest, which would have to be vindicated or asserted effectually in 117 N. W. 1105); and the disqualifying rule includes controversies between the heirs over their ancestor's property (Neas v. Neas, 61 Iowa, 641, 17 N. W. 30).

In West Virginia the disqualifying statute is limited to testimony in regard to a personal transaction or communication had with the decedent where the witness is a party to or interested in the result of the suit. Under this statute an heir at law of the testator is disqualified as a witness in his own behalf in a proceeding in chancery attacking a probated will where the testimony relates to transactions or communications had personally with the deceased. Kerr v. Lunsford, 31 W. Va. 659, 2 L.R.A. 668, 8 S. E. 493; Freeman v. Freeman, 71 W. Va. 303, 76 S. E. 657; Bailey v. Bee, — W. Va. —, 80 S. E. 454.

In Freeman v. Freeman, supra, it is said that the purpose of this disqualifying provision is to prevent a person having an interest to be affected by the suit from giving testimony concerning the words or actions of the decedent which he, if living, could contradict, against those who claim under the decedent. "Death having sealed the lips of one, the law closes the mouth of the other. Therefore the words 'transactions or communications,' as used in the statute, should be given a liberal construction."

But according to a statement in Barker v. Hinton, 62 W. Va. 639, 59 S. E. 614, 13 Ann. Cas. 1150, a devisee or legatee who is also an heir at law of the testator, not an attesting witness, is competent and may be examined to sustain the probate of a will in a proceeding in equity to have the same declared not to be the last will and testament of the testator, and the proceedings probating same annulled and set aside. The testimony of this witness related to the fact of the execution of the will by the testator, while in the cases holding the witness disqualified on the ground of interest, the testimony related to a personal transaction or communication with the deceased, and was offered on the issue of the testamentary capacity of the testator.

some other suit or proceeding, if asserted at all. See note to Townsend v. Kennard, 1 Miss. Dec. 222, 224.

In Steen v. Kirkpatrick, 84 Miss. 63, 36 So. 140, T. J. Steen and his wife had an antenuptial agreement that, if one should die, the survivor should take interest in the deceased's estate for life only, and that at the death of the survivor such interest should revert to the estate of the first decedent. Under this agreement, when Steen died, his wife received $1,750 as her share of his estate, and while she lived fully recognized that on her own death this money was to be property of her husband's estate. She did die; and a son of Steen (by a former marriage), in behalf of himself and his brothers of the whole blood, ton, 80 N. C. 251, the proponents and caveators upon an issue devisavit vel non were held to be adversary parties within the North Carolina statute forbidding a witness having a legal or equitable interest which may be affected by the event of the action from being examined in regard to any transaction or communication between such witness and a person at the time of the examination deceased, against a party then prosecuting or defending the action as executor, so that the husband of one of them was incompetent to testify in regard to a transaction or communication between himself and the decedent. The contest in this case was between persons claiming respectively under an earlier and later will, the next of kin and heirs at law having failed on citation to take sides. On the authority of that case it was declared in Umstead v. Bowling, 150 N. C. 507, 64 S. E. 368, that an executor and devisee would be incompetent to testify upon the trial of an issue devisavit vel non in regard to any transaction or communication with the deceased, though the testimony offered in this case was held not to relate to a personal transaction or communication, and was therefore not excluded. And in Linebarger v. Linebarger, 143 N. C. 229, 55 S. E. 709, 10 Ann. Cas. 596, the wife of one of the caveators was held incompetent as a witness to prove declarations of the alleged testator.

And the Wisconsin court holds that the statutory provision that no party in interest shall be examined as a witness in respect to any transaction or communication by him personally with a deceased person disqualifies as a witness in his own interest the principal legatee, where the latter took part and assisted in the execution of the will. Goerke v. Goerke, 80 Wis. 516, 50 N. W. 345. Heirs at law of the testator who are devisees and legatees in his will are necessary parties to a proceeding for the probate thereof, and hence are disqualified as witnesses therein, and the husbands or wives of such parties are likewise disqualified. Re Valentine, 93 Wis. 45, 67 N. W. 12. And the daughter of a testator is undertook to probate this claim against the estate of his stepmother. This probate was contested by the children of Mrs. Steen by her first marriage. In this state of the case it was held that W. T. Steen could testify. The decision was expressly put on the ground that "this claim is a controversy between the two sets of children, and did not originate during the lifetime of the decedent, Mrs. Steen."

In Watson v. Duncan, 84 Miss. 763, 37 So. 125, Duncan, surviving his wife, renounced her will and elected to take under the law. His right to renounce was denied, and a prenuptial contract set up against him. He undertook to testify that the important clause in that contract was a forgery.

not a competent witness to a conversation with him during his lifetime in a proceeding to probate the latter's will, where the testimony is in her own interest. Anderson v. Langen, 122 Wis. 57, 99 N. W. 437.

Under § 829 of the New York Code of Civil Procedure, which disqualifies a party or person interested from testifying in his own behalf concerning a personal transaction or communication between himself and a deceased person, "against the executor, administrator, or survivor of the deceased person . . . or a person deriving his title or interest from, through, or under a deceased person . . ." testimony of a legatee or devisee in behalf of the will is incompetent where it relates to matters included in the provision. Lane v. Lane, 95 N. Y. 494; Cadmus v. Oakley, 3 Dem. 324; Re Voorhis, 1 How. Pr. N. S. 261. And to the same effect see Re Dunham, 121 N. Y. 575, 24 N. E. 932; Re Bernsee, 141 N. Y. 391, 36 N. E. 314.

In Lee v. Dill, 39 Barb. 516, a devisee was held an incompetent witness to a personal transaction between the testator and himself, tending to establish the will, under § 399 of the Code of Procedure, which at that time excluded the testimony when the opposite party was the executor, administrator, or "legal representative" of the deceased person.

In a proceeding in equity to restore a lost will the plaintiff was held, in Timon v. Claffy, 45 Barb. 438, not competent as a witness in his own behalf to prove conversations between himself and the deceased at the time of making the will and in reference thereto, under § 399, which then excluded the testimony if the action was brought "by or against the executors, administrators, heirs at law, next of kin, or assignee" of the deceased person.

The heirs at law or next of kin of the testatrix are incompetent as witnesses in their own behalf in a proceeding to probate a will where their testimony relates to transactions or conversations with the deceased. Schoonmaker v. Wolford, 20 Hun, 166; Hatch v. Peugnet, 64 Barb. 189.

We think the points before the court in the several cases are fairly stated, and it will be observed that this court seems to have employed language and decided cases which can be construed to be on either side of this controversy. If Mrs. Kirk is competent to testify, her testimony will have the effect to destroy the will of her husband. Her evidence relates to the conduct and declarations of the deceased, and tends to prove that he was not mentally capable to make a will. If this incapacity is established, she would inherit all of his property, and her title to same was absolutely fixed and irrevocable, provided only she survived her incurably afflicted spouse. The effect of Mrs. Kirk's testimony is to make it impossible for any act of Mr. Kirk to deprive testifying in a partition proceeding commenced by him to partition the land of his ancestor upon the theory that a will of the latter, disposing of the land, is invalid. Scott v. Scott, 13 N. Y. S. R. 202.

The disqualification under § 829 applies to strangers in blood to the testator who are respectively claiming his estate under different wills, and both are disqualified as witnesses to transactions or conversations with the testator in his lifetime, for the position of such parties, though not precisely analogous, is similar, to that of heirs or next of kin. Re Smith, 95 N. Y. 516.

Dieterich's Will, 1 Tucker, 129, holding that a widow who contested a will propounded by the person named as executor was not disqualified from testifying, the only heir at law and next of kin being also a contestant, was decided under § 399 of the Code of Procedure, which excluded testimony against "executors, administrators, heirs at law, next of kin, or assignees" of deceased.

VI. Where exclusion limited to matters equally within knowledge of decedent.

A statute disqualifying as a witness "a party to any civil action, suit, or proceeding, and any person directly interested in the event thereof, and any person from, through, or under whom such party or interested person derives his interest or title or any part thereof, when the adverse party in such action, suit, or proceeding claims or opposes, sues or defends, as . . . the executor or administrator, heir, legatee, or devisee of any deceased person. . . . as to any statement by, or transaction with, such deceased . . . person, or matter of fact whatever, which must have been equally within the knowledge of both the witness and such . . . deceased person, unless such witness be called to testify thereto by such adverse party so claiming or opposing, suing or defending in such action, suit, or proceeding," does not apply to a contest of a will, and hence in a proceeding to revoke a will the heirs at law her of a sure title to his estate, no matter what may be the equities of the case. If she could succeed in convincing a jury that her husband was incurably insane at and before the execution of his will, her status is conclusively fixed.

Nobody would contend that she was competent to testify that Mr. Kirk conveyed his property to her before his death, and that the deed of conveyance was properly acknowledged before an officer now dead, and that the deed was lost or destroyed. If she could establish such conveyance, it would follow that Mr. Kirk did not own any property, and that his will conveyed nothing to his devisees. If she can establish his insanity, the same result is reached, and her claim to his property originated before his death, and this inchoate claim would become a complete title, should she survive him. As a matter of fact, she is not testifying about an inchoate right, but about a right already ripened into a sure thing. She related to the jury the conduct and declarations of the dead, which testimony has established his insanity; and the insanity establishes her claim to his estate, and this claim is established by the acts and conduct of deceased, and it logically follows that her claim not only began or originated in the lifetime of the deceased, but was established then so far as the deceased was concerned. According to Mrs. Kirk's testimony, his power to change her inchoate claim was abrogated by something originating in his lifetime, and death alone of the testator are competent witnesses to testify as to statements made by the testator and by the chief beneficiary in his will, tending to show undue influence by the latter, practised upon the former, to secure the will. Miller v. Livingstone, 31 Utah, 415, 88 Pac. 338, overruling upon this point so far as it is in conflict with the doctrine stated, Re Atwood, 14 Utah, 1, 60 Am. St. Rep. 878, 45 Pac. 1036, holding that on a petition by a child omitted from the testator's will, to be allowed her share in the testator's estate, the legatees under the will are disqualified to testify as to the reasons given by the testator for such omission.

In Miller v. Livingstone, supra, it is said: "The act of the testator in making the alleged will is the only subject-matter of the investigation. The estate of the testator is not interested. The interests of those claiming to succeed to it either by operation of law or by operation of the will are alone involved. The estate remains intact and undiminished whatever may be the result of the controversy, and the subject-matter of the investigation is not a transaction with nor a statement by the decedent. As to such an investigation, the parties to the suit and those interested in the result thereof are upon terms of equality in regard to the opportunity of giving testimony."

In Michigan it is held that a statute providing that when a suit or proceeding is prosecuted or defended by the heirs, assigns, devisees, legatees, or personal representatives of a deceased person, an interested party, if examined as a witness in his own behalf, shall not be admitted to testify at all to matters which, if true, must have been equally within the knowledge of such deceased person, does not disqualify as a witness in his own behalf a legatee in a proceeding to probate his testator's will, although such legatee is also a proponent of the will, since the statute does not apply to proceedings for the probate of wills. It is said that such a contest is between persons claiming an interest in the estate, and as to the estate proper they are third persons and represent no one but themselves. The contest is not between the estate or the representative of the estate, and the proponent. The object of the statute is to prevent fraud and false swearing whereby estates become unjustly depleted in cases where no person on the part of the estate, except the deceased, has any knowledge of the facts necessary to sustain the claim in favor of the estate, or to make good the defense of the estate when unjust claims are attempted to be enforced against it; hence it is limited in its spirit and scope by fair construction to contests and litigation upon claims between other persons and the deceased, existing prior to his death, to such suits and proceedings as the deceased would have been a necessary party to, and since which, his heirs, devisees and legatees, personal representatives or assigns, are compelled to prosecute or defend for him in his place. Brown v. Bell, 58 Mich. 58, 24 N. W. 824; and to the same effect are Re Disbrow, 58 Mich. 96, 24 N. W. 624; Re Lambie, 97 Mich. 49, 56 N. W. 223; Re Lautenschlager, 80 Mich. 285, 45 N. W. 147; McHugh v. Fitzgerald, 103 Mich. 21, 61 N. W. 354; Lawyer v. Smith, 8 Mich. 411, 77 Am. Dec. 460.

VII. Where limited to claims against decedent.

In Mississippi the disqualifying statute provides that a person shall not testify as a witness to establish his own claim or defense against the estate of a deceased person which originated in his lifetime.

It will be observed that in a number of cases, local statutes have been held inapplicable to will contests, notwithstanding that they were by their terms much less favorable to that view than the Mississippi statute. Indeed, so far as the form and phraseology of the statute are concerned, none of the other statutes appears so unfavorable as the Mississippi statute to the view adopted in WHITEHEAD v. KIRK. The discussion in the opinion in that case of the earlier Mississippi cases makes it unnecessary to repeat them here. Some of them, as conceded by the opinion, are opposed to the result reached in that case.

could rob her of her claim to his estate. This status, alleged to have originated during the lifetime of the husband, is the thing to be established by the testimony of the wife; and, when thus established, her claim to the estate is established, originating when the husband lost his mind, but not coming into full flower until his death.

The policy of the statute is to close the mouth of the living, because death has sealed the lips of the dead. In the instant case the husband cannot speak in defense of his right to dispose of one half of his estate by will; and, if the policy of the law means anything, the living should not be permitted to establish a state of facts which the defendant cannot now deny, when, as here, the living wife absolutely fixes her claim to that portion of the estate. We think counsel for appellants in their brief thus accurately state the rule to be followed in determining whether or not the evidence offered should be admitted:

"Whenever a witness is offered for the purpose of proving any transaction, act, contract, admission, license, condition, etc. (whatever may be its exact nature), as 'a fact to be proven,' and proven as a fact existing or occurring prior to the death, and the proof of such fact as then existing

The court seems to have been influenced in a large measure by the view that the testimony of the widow in this case was within the spirit and the general purpose of the statute, or at least, that it involved the same mischief that was intended to be guarded against by the statute, and that the terms of the statute, when liberally construed, were not necessarily fatal to giving it such effect. In many, if not a majority, of the states, however, the courts have apparently adopted the view that will contests or other contests over the right to succeed to a decedent's estate are not within the scope or spirit of the statute, and have given effect to that view notwithstanding that it was necessary, in some instances, at least, to construe the statute somewhat strictly and technically. While in a number of states the local statute is held applicable to such controversies, there seems to be no authority, outside of Mississippi, for the view that the right to succeed to a decedent's estate, as widow or heir, amounts to "a claim" against the estate; much less that it amounts to a claim against the estate originating in the lifetime of the decedent.

It is also to be observed that the disqualifying provision of the statute relates to an attempt by the witness to establish his claim or defense against the estate of decedent, but WHITEFIELD v. KIRK clearly extends the statute to proceedings which may merely affect a subsequently asserted claim of the witness, and where the present effect of the testimony of the witness is not to establish her claim, but to defeat claims, the defeat of which will be to the advantage of the witness as a claimant to the succession of the testator's estate as his widow.

VIII. Special statutory exceptions.

Under the exception to the Pennsylvania disqualifying statute to the effect that it shall not apply to issues and inquiries vel non and others, respecting the right of a deceased owner between parties claiming such right by devolution on the death of the owner, a person who is executor and also devisee is a competent witness upon the trial of a feigned issue to determine the validity of a purported will of the testator. Bowen v. Goranflo, 73 Pa. 357.

In a proceeding to partition the land of a deceased person an heir and devisee under his will, who is interested in the suit, and whose interest in the land was charged with advancements, is not a competent witness in his own favor in matters which occurred in the lifetime of the testator for the purpose of disputing the amount of the advancement as set forth in the will. Dunshree v. Dunshree, 243 Pa. 599, 90 Atl. 362.

A statutory provision excepting from the operation of the disqualifying clause the heirs of the decedent and legatees claiming under his will in cases to contest the validity of or set aside the will virtually withdraws contests of this character from the operation of the disqualification clause. Wolf v. Powner, 30 Ohio St. 472.

And an heir who is one of the plaintiffs in a proceeding to set aside the will of his ancestor is a competent witness to testify against the will to facts which transpired in the lifetime of the testator, although the person nominated as executor in the will is a party defendant to the proceeding, since, in the contest of wills, the executor is merely a formal party. Thompson v. Thompson, 2 Ohio Dec. Reprint, 214.

IX. Extent of exclusion.

a. Evidence of mental incompetency.

1. In general.

Since an opinion as to mental competency of the testatrix is not a transaction, an heir at law of the testatrix is competent to testify as to the latter's mental competency and to the facts upon which he bases his opinion, including conversations with the testatrix. Rakestraw v. Pratt, 160 N. C. 436, 76 S. E. 259.

In a proceeding to set aside a will the heirs and the wife of the testator and devisees or legatees in a will are competent witnesses on the question of the mental competency of the testator. Lamb v. Lamb, 105 Ind. 456, 5 N. E. 171. And see Hiatt v. McColley, 171 Ind. 91, 85 N. E. 772.

In a proceeding to contest a will, the legatee is competent to testify as to the or occurring is determinative of a claim or right of such witness to or in property of the deceased, and establishes such claim or right directly and finally, there the witness is testifying to establish his claim which originated during the lifetime of such deceased. In short, the word 'claim,' as used in this statute, is employed in a broad and general sense; and it draws into the prohibition all testimony, the direct, immediate, and final effect of which is to establish in the witness's own behalf a right in or to things prior to the death. The statute must be taken as dealing with an effectual claim,—with a claim which means something, and is not a mere shadow. If the issue on the trial is such, in order for the claim to amount to anything, it is necessary to prove or disprove certain facts as existent or nonexistent before the death, then the claim originated before the death; for neither logically nor legally can the 'claim' be separated from what is necessary to make it effectual, or from anything that flows into it, becomes part of it, augments and increases it, and fixes, or contributes to fix, the scope of it."

We do not undertake to harmonize the decisions of this court construing § 1917 of the Code, but content ourselves with de-mental competency of the testator. Harper v. Harper, 83 Kan. 761, 113 Pac. 300.

Persons interested in contesting a will in a proceeding to set the same aside are competent witnesses upon the question of the mental competency of the testator where the evidence does not involve personal transactions with the deceased. Denning v. Butcher, 91 Iowa, 425, 59 N. W. 69.

The widow of a deceased testator may testify to the appearance, demeanor, and conduct of her husband during his lifetime as bearing upon his mental competency in a proceeding to contest his will. Re Evans, 114 Iowa, 240, 86 N. W. 283.

In a proceeding to set aside the probate of a will, the son of the testator is competent to testify in regard to the condition of his father's health for some years before he died, and especially at the time of the making of the will, and before and about that time, since the questions do not relate to any personal transaction or communication between the witnesses and the decedent. Sim v. Russell, 90 Iowa, 656, 57 N. W. 601.

As the proponent of a will the husband of a legatee therein is competent to testify in a proceeding to probate the will as to whether he observed any difference in the testator's mental condition as bearing upon his mental incompetency. He is not, however, a competent witness to testify as to any personal transactions or communications between himself and the testator. Severin v. Zack, 55 Iowa, 28, 7 N. W. 404.

In New York, however, it is held that the statute disqualifies an heir at law and contestant of his ancestor's will from testifying in a proceeding to probate the will as to the appearance of the testator at about the time the will was executed, for the purpose of showing that the latter's appearance was such as to indicate his mental incompetency to make the will. Re McArthur, 59 Hun, 619, 12 N. Y. Supp. 822.

On a bill in equity to contest the validity of a will of their ancestor by some of his heirs they are parties to the proceeding, and hence incompetent as witnesses with reference to the mental capacity of their ancestor. Brace v. Black, 125 Ill. 33, 17 N. E. 66.

And an heir at law who is also a party to a proceeding in equity to contest the will is not competent to testify as to the testamentary capacity of the deceased, or to detail a conversation alleged to have been had with him, or to give testimony as to facts or circumstances tending to support the issues on behalf of the contestants. Volbracht v. White, 197 Ill. 298, 64 N. E. 324.

2. Where opinion is based upon personal conversations or transactions with decedent.

In Freeman v. Freeman, 71 W. Va. 303, 76 S. E. 657, it is said that the words of the statute disqualifying an interested witness as to "transactions or communications" with a deceased person should be given a liberal construction. To limit their meaning so as to include only individual conversations and direct personal dealings between the witness and deceased would be too narrow a construction and would result in defeating the purpose of the statute, in many cases. The words of the statute include personal contact with and observations of deceased's conduct, on which an opinion of his mental condition could be formed. A "transaction" within the meaning of the statute is an action participated in by witness and decedent, as something done in decedent's presence, to which, if alive, he could testify of his personal knowledge, and the term embraces every variety of affairs, the subject of negotiations, actions, or contracts and the two terms "transactions and communications" include every method by which one person can derive any impression or information from the conduct, condition, or language of another.

An interested party is disqualified by the statute not only from giving testimony to conversations with the testator, but also from testifying as to his mental capacity where his information is based upon such conversations. Re Goldthorp, 94 Iowa, 336, 58 Am. St. Rep. 400, 62 N. W. 845.

As bearing upon the mental competency of his father, a son who was present and aided the former in a transaction between the father and a third person is incompetent as a witness to testify as to such transciding that Mrs. Kirk's evidence was to establish her claim to the estate of her deceased husband, within the meaning of the statute. So it is we have concluded that the testimony of Mrs. Kirk, relating to confidential relations and conduct of her husband, should not have been permitted to go to the jury, because the rule forbidding husband and wife to give such evidence is founded upon public policy, for the protection and conservation of the marital relations. We have further concluded that Mrs. Kirk is disqualified to testify in support of, or in aid of, her claim to the estate of her deceased husband, about matters occurring within the lifetime of her husband. Reversed and remanded.

Suggestion of error overruled.

action in a proceeding for the probate of the father's will. Re Van Houten, 147 Iowa, 725, 140 Am. St. Rep. 340, 124 N. W. 886.

The contrary conclusion is reached in Rakestraw v. Pratt, 160 N. C. 436, 76 S. E. 259, on the theory that as the opinion of a witness with regard to the mental competency of a person executing a will is not a transaction with such person, an interested party is competent to testify as to such mental competency, and to the facts upon which his opinion is based, including conversations with the testator.

And the husband of the testatrix is a competent witness as to personal transactions and conversations with her in her lifetime on an issue as to the mental capacity of the latter, although the testimony is against the validity of the will. Orr v. Cox, 3 Lea, 617.

b. Where witness took no part in transaction or conversation.

It has been held that the disqualification extends to testimony as to conversations or transactions in the presence of the witness, on the theory that a communication made in the presence of the witness will be deemed to have been made to him. Re Dunham, 48 Hun, 618, 1 N. Y. Supp. 120, affirmed in 121 N. Y. 575, 24 N. E. 932.

And a legatee is disqualified to testify as a witness to transactions between the decedent and a third person in his presence, although he took no part therein. Re Bernsee, 141 N. Y. 391, 36 N. E. 314.

In holding that the disqualification of the statute extends to testimony relative to a conversation with or transactions by a deceased person in the presence of the witness, although he took no active part therein, in Re Bernsee, supra, it is reasoned that, "if active participation in the conversation was necessary to exclude an interested witness, and he should, as an observer, be permitted to testify to transactions in form between the deceased and third persons, although such transactions were in his interest, it would furnish an easy and convenient method in every case of evading the statute. The decisions have enforced the spirit of the statute by excluding such evidence, and have treated transactions between the deceased and third persons in the presence of interested parties as if the witness actually participated therein."

It has been held that where the interested witness is present during the whole interview during which the will was executed and took part in its subscription by the testator, the disqualification of the statute extends to him, since the act of executing the will, "although consisting of several incidents, constitutes but one transaction, and derives its efficacy as a valid execution from the performance of each requirement of the statute. The transaction was continuing and related to but one subject . . . the execution of a will. A participation by a person in any of the material acts required to complete its valid execution made the transaction one between the testator and that person." Re Eysaman, 113 N. Y. 62, 3 L.R.A. 599, 20 N. E. 613.

This disqualification applies to a person interested in the event of a proceeding to contest a will, although the testimony relates to conversations between the testator and a third person which he overheard, and in which he took no part. Eighmie v. Taylor, 68 Hun, 587, 23 N. Y. Supp. 248.

In a proceeding to contest the probate of a will on the ground of its invalidity an heir at law of the testator is incompetent to testify as a witness to conduct of the testator in his presence, or to statements by the former in his hearing, although he took no part in the transaction. Holland v. Holland, 98 App. Div. 366, 90 N. Y. Supp. 208.

It has, however, been held that this disqualification does not extend to testimony by a legatee in his own interest, where it relates to a conversation between the testator and a third person in the witness's presence, and in which he took no part. Lane v. Lane, 95 N. Y. 494.

In Iowa it is held that an interested witness and a party to the proceeding may testify to a conversation he overheard between the testator and another defendant, where he took no part therein. Smith v. James, 72 Iowa, 515, 34 N. W. 309.

c. Where testimony is adverse to interest of witness.

Beneficiaries under a will are opposite parties to the contestant, and hence are competent witnesses against the will. Sanders v. Kirbie, 94 Tex. 564, 63 S. W. 626.

The heirs at law of the testatrix are competent witnesses to sustain the will where their testimony is against their interests. Re Hedges, 57 App. Div. 48, 67 N. Y. Supp. 1028.

Where a will is attacked upon the ground of undue influence practised upon the tea-tatrix by the chief beneficiaries in her will, the latter may be called by the contestant as witnesses against their own interests and in favor of the contestant, and their testimony as to conversations between themselves and the testatrix, tending to show undue influence or mental incapacity, is competent as a whole, and should not be limited to a garbled and one-sided account of the colloquy. Re Potter, 161 N. Y. 84, 55 N. E. 387.

And see Bailey v. Bee, — W. Va. —, 80 S. E. 454, applying § 23, chap. 130, Code 1906, declaring incompetent a party to a suit when examined about a transaction or communication with one then deceased, and holding that in a proceeding in equity to annul a will, an heir at law is not incompetent as a witness in favor of the will upon a question of the testamentary capacity of the testatrix, where such testimony is adverse to his interests.

The question of interest will not be determined by the position of the parties in the case as to whether they are complainants or defendants, but the court will disregard mere matters of form, and will look to the substance, and see on which side of the controversy the real interest of the proposed witness lies; and it will determine his competency according to his interest, regardless of the mere question of pleadings. Bardell v. Brady, 172 Ill. 420, 50 N. E. 124; to the same effect is Pyle v. Pyle, 158 Ill. 289, 41 N. E. 999.

The true test of the competency of a witness is to be determined by ascertaining whether he would gain or lose by a decree setting aside the will. It devolves upon the party objecting to show that the interest of the witness is with the party offering him, if that fact does not otherwise appear. Campbell v. Campbell, 130 Ill. 466, 6 L.R.A. 167, 22 N. E. 620.

Defendants to a proceeding in chancery to contest a will are prima facie competent to testify on behalf of the contestants, and before excluding them the court must ascertain their real interest. The fact that they are heirs at law of the testator does not of itself establish their incompetency where they are also devisees. Ibid.

Although the proposed witnesses are defendants to a chancery bill to set aside a will, where their interests are common with those of the complainant, they are not competent witnesses in behalf of the former. Corderoy v. Hughes, 6 Ill. App. 401.

The widow of the testator, whose interest lies in sustaining his will, is not disqualified as a witness in behalf of the heirs contesting the will, if her testimony is otherwise competent. Donnan v. Donnan, 236 Ill. 341, 86 N. E. 279.

A nephew and heir of the testator, whose interests are adverse to the interests of a devisee seeking a construction of the will as to her devise, is competent as a witness in favor of such devisee. Hoffner v. Custer, 237 Ill. 64, 86 N. E. 737.

A legatee is a competent witness against the will although he has an agreement with 51 L.R.A. (N.S.)

the contestants that he shall suffer no financial loss if the will is set aside, since an agreement of this character affects the witness's credibility as a witness, but not his competency. Wetzel v. Firebaugh, 251 Ill. 190, 95 N. E. 1085.

As shown by most of the cases included in this note, as well as those expressly referred to under most disqualifying statutes as construed by the courts, an interested witness is disqualified only from testifying in his own interest, and he is a competent witness where his testimony is against his interest. In Iowa, however, it is sufficient to disqualify a witness in a proceeding to contest a will if it appears that he is interested in the event of the proceeding; and where his interest is a present, contingent, and valuable one, which may be increased or diminished by the result of the action, the prohibition of the statute applies without reference to whether his testimony is offered for or against his interest. The disqualifying statute in this state, however, provides that no person interested in the event of any action shall be permitted to testify to personal transactions of the decedent, against the legatee or devisee of such person. Re Martin, — Iowa, —, 142 N. W. 74.

d. Matters not involving transactions with or communications by deceased person.

A statutory provision forbidding a witness having a legal or equitable interest which may be affected by the event of the action from being examined in regard to any transaction or communication between such witness and a person deceased at the time of such examination, the testimony to be used against a party then prosecuting or defending the action as executor, etc., when the interest of the witness may be affected by the result, does not exclude the testimony of such a person as to what he saw the testator do at about the time of executing his will and in regard to executing the will, or where the testator went, the means of his conveyance, or the relative position of the parties when the will was executed. Umstead v. Bowling, 150 N. C. 507, 64 S. E. 368.

It is, however, held under the New York statute that a legatee in a will is disqualified as a witness to testify to his observations of the acts and conduct of, or conversations with, the testator at or about the time of the execution of his will. Re Eysaman, 113 N. Y. 62, 3 L.R.A. 599, 20 N. E. 612.

The New York statute does not disqualify as a witness in favor of a will a devisee therein and one of the proponents, who was present at the execution of the will, and whose testimony relates to the manner in which the will was executed by the testator, and tends to disprove the testimony on this point of one of the attesting witnesses. Re Bernsee, 63 Hun, 628, 17 N. Y. Supp. 669.

In a proceeding to set aside the probate of a will, a legatee under a will is a competent witness to testify to finding letters addressed to the testatrix among her papers subsequently to her death, and which were material on the question in issue. Doyle v. Doyle, 257 Ill. 229, 100 N. E. 950.

The widow of decedent, although named as legatee and devisee in his will, is competent to prove that the testator's will was found after his death, among his valuable papers, since such evidence does not relate to any personal transaction or communication with the deceased. Cornelius v. Brawley, 109 N. C. 542, 14 S. E. 78.

The widow of the testator, who is contesting the probate of his will, may testify to the amount of money and property held by her at the time of her marriage to decedent, and that she sold the property, and loaned the proceeds of the sale to him. McDonald v. McDonald, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 150 S. W. 593.

The contestants of a will are competent to testify as to the amount of money or property advanced to them by the testator in his lifetime as bearing upon the validity of the latter's will in a contest over the probate thereof. Re Perkins, 109 Iowa, 216, 80 N. W. 335.

An interested party may testify to the facts negating the claim that he had certain transactions with the deceased in the latter's lifetime, and where the will recites that he has received all that is coming to him from the deceased, he may deny that he has received anything. Re Winslow, 143 Iowa, 649, 122 N. W. 971.

And he may deny that he was a party to personal communications with the testator in his lifetime with reference to his will. Gaston v. Gaston, 83 Kan. 215, 109 Pac. 777.

A legatee may deny that he was a party to any transaction with the testator with reference to the execution of the latter's will. Kerr v. Kerr, 85 Kan. 460, 116 Pac. 880.

The opinion of an interested witness that a certain paper which is offered as a will is in the handwriting of the alleged testator is not testimony as to any statement by the testator, nor is it testimony as to any transaction with him; and hence as to such matters the witness is competent. Martin v. McAdams, 87 Tex. 225, 27 S. W. 255.

X. Persons to whom disqualification applies.

a. Heirs or legatees.

1. In general.

As shown by the great majority of cases considered in this note, if a disqualifying statute is applicable to proceedings relative to the succession to the property of the deceased person, it will disqualify the heirs at law and the legatees or devisees who claim under a will of the decedent. 51 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Where a devisee in one will has a direct interest in defeating the probate of another will, this interest disqualifies him as a witness against the latter will. Hathaway v. Hathaway, 91 N. C. 139.

An heir of the testator, who is also a beneficiary under his will, is disqualified as a witness with reference to personal transactions with the testator in his lifetime in an action involving a contest of the testator's will. Re Rehard, — Iowa, —, 143 N. W. 1106.

An heir at law of the testator (Anderson v. Laugen, 122 Wis. 57, 99 N. W. 437), an heir at law who is also a legatee (Re Valentine, 93 Wis. 45, 67 N. W. 12), or a legatee (Goerke v. Goerke, 80 Wis. 516, 50 N. W. 346), are incompetent as witnesses to transactions or communications with a deceased person where the testimony is in their own interest, in a proceeding to probate the will under which they claim or which affects their interest.

And under the New York statute legatees (Lane v. Lane, 95 N. Y. 494; Lee v. Dill, 39 Barb. 516; Cadmus v. Oakley, 3 Dem. 324; Re Voorhis, 1 How. Pr. N. S. 261), heirs at law (Schoonmaker v. Wolford, 20 Hun, 166; Hatch v. Peugnet, 64 Barb. 189; Scott v. Scott, 13 N. Y. S. R. 202), or even strangers in blood to the testator claiming his estate under different wills (Re Smith, 95 N. Y. 516), are disqualified as witnesses in proceedings affecting the validity of a will of the testator, where the testimony relates to personal transactions or conversations with the testator in his lifetime. In an inferior New York court, however, it is held that an heir opposing the probate of the will of his ancestor is not within the terms of the statute. Dieterich's Will, 1 Tucker, 129.

It has, however, been held that a devisee or legatee who is not an attesting witness is not within the terms of the prohibition of the statute, and hence may be examined in support of the will like any indifferent person. Barker v. Hinton, 62 W. Va. 639, 59 S. E. 614, 13 Ann. Cas. 1150.

On a bill for the partition of land by the infant sons and heirs of their deceased father, who was one of two heirs to the real estate sought to be partitioned, the other heir is not a competent witness to prove advancements to the complainants' father by his ancestor, in order to decrease the interest of the complainants. Comer v. Comer, 119 Ill. 170, 8 N. E. 796.

This rule, however, is modified to the extent that where there arises a controversy as to the distribution of the estate among the conceded heirs thereto they may testify, as such testimony does not tend to reduce or impair the estate among them. Laurence v. Laurence, 164 Ill. 367, 45 N. E. 1071; Re Maher, 210 Ill. 160, 71 N. E. 438; Pigg v. Carroll, 89 Ill. 205.

Where the heirs of the testator are also devisees or legatees under his will and are not appellants from the probate thereof, they are competent witnesses on the trial of the appeal, since they are not parties to the proceeding within the terms of the disqualifying statute, although they are interested in the event of the action. Wheeler v. Towns, 43 N. H. 56.

In McCoy v. Conrad, 64 Neb. 150, 89 N. W. 665, applying the statute that no person having a direct legal interest in the result of any civil action or proceeding when the adverse party is the representative of a deceased person shall be permitted to testify to any transaction or conversation had between the deceased person and the witness, a distinction is made between a legatee or devisee and the heirs at law of the testator, and it is said that while this statute disqualifies devisees or legatees as witnesses in a proceeding to probate the will under which they claim, it does not disqualify the heirs at law of the testator in such proceeding. The court reasoned that after the will of a decedent had been established, the devisees and legatees are properly regarded as within the protection of the statute; but so long as they are merely the proponents of a contested alleged will of the deceased, their interests are as clearly adverse to those of the heirs at law or other acknowledged representatives of the decedent as are those of other litigants seeking to recover against his estate on account of any other transaction had with him in his lifetime. In such litigation the plaintiffs or proponents, being named as devisees or legatees, as the case may be, are assailing the estate with the view of the appropriation of it or part of it to their own uses. Any such assailants are therefore clearly excluded by the statute, and so, of course, is the executor in a proposed will.

Parties who, as heirs or next of kin, would have been entitled to the property of a deceased person, had he died intestate, are not disqualified from testifying as to transactions and conversations with the deceased in a contest over his alleged will. Williams v. Miles, 68 Neb. 463, 62 L.R.A. 383, 110 Am. St. Rep. 431, 94 N. W. 705, 96 N. W. 151, 4 Ann. Cas. 306.

2. Where legacy is invalid or contingent.

A legatee is disqualified as a witness in his own interest although the legacy is conditional, being conditioned upon the rendition by him of certain services of a religious character. Re Burke, 5 Redf. 369.

And where a legacy is contingent upon the death of a direct legatee before reaching his majority, the contingent legatee is disqualified by statute as a witness to sustain the will. Re Klinzner, 71 Misc. 620, 130 N. Y. Supp. 1059.

A legatee under a prior will is not, by reason of that fact, disqualified as a witness against the subsequent will, since at most her interest is merely contingent. Titlow v. Titlow, 54 Pa. 216, 93 Am. Dec. 691.

Where a person is a legatee in one will which is being contested, this fact does not disqualify him as a witness in a contest over 51 L.R.A. (N.S.)

the will of another person, although, if the latter will is established, the witness will lose his legacy. Re Masterton, 6 Dem. 35, 19 N. Y. S. R. 789, 3 N. Y. Supp. 209.

But the disqualification of the statute extends to a legatee in a prior will as a witness against the validity of a subsequent will (Pringle v. Burroughs, 100 App. Div. 366, 91 N. Y. Supp. 750. Compare with Re Hennessey, 157 App. Div. 136, 141 N. Y. Supp. 736); especially where he intervenes in and is made a party to a proceeding to probate the subsequent will (Re Jeffrey, 129 App. Div. 791, 114 N. Y. Supp. 667).

A legatee in two wills offered for probate simultaneously, who receives a larger legacy by the will first executed than by the later will, may testify in favor of the later will. Re Kindberg, 207 N. Y. 220, 100 N. E. 789.

3. Effect of release of interest.

A release by a legatee or devisee of his interest in the estate of a deceased person under his devise or legacy will remove the disqualification of the statute, and render him competent as a witness in favor of the will. Re Wilson, 103 N. Y. 374, 8 N. E. 731; Loder v. Whelpley, 111 N. Y. 239, 18 N. E. 874; Reeve v. Crosby, 3 Redf. 74; Harper v. Harper, 1 Thomp. & C. 351; Re Kindberg, 207 N. Y. 220, 100 N. E. 789.

In Missouri by statute it is expressly provided that if a subscribing witness who is also a devisee or legatee in a will, before giving testimony concerning the execution of the will, releases any legacy or devise therein given him, he shall be admitted as a witness. Grimm v. Tittman, 113 Mo. 56, 20 S. W. 664.

The express acceptance of a will by an heir or legatee of the testator, and a covenant and agreement not to institute or prosecute any suit to contest the same, or voluntarily to assist any other person in so doing, does not remove the disqualification imposed on the witness by statute, where he is offered as a witness in behalf of the party seeking to set aside the will, and where, in spite of this agreement, the interests of the witness will be subserved by his own testimony. Dougherty v. Gaffney, 239 Ill. 640, 88 N. E. 150.

4. Disclaimer or withdrawal from proceedings.

The disclaimer by an heir at law of the testator for the purpose of rendering himself a competent witness in a proceeding in equity to contest his ancestor's will does not remove the disqualification of the statute. Volbracht v. White, 197 Ill. 298, 64 N. E. 324.

An heir at law of the testator, and a contestant of his will, is incompetent to testify as to personal transactions and communications with the testator, although, after tendering such testimony, the witness withdraws from the contest. Re Lassak, 56 Hun, 647, 10 N. Y. Supp. 80, affirmed in 131 N. Y. 624, 30 N. E. 112.

The dismissal of a witness as a complainant in a bill in equity to contest a will, and naming him in the pleadings as a defendant, has no effect to render him an adverse party in interest to the complainants, and does not qualify him as a witness in their behalf. Volbracht v. White, supra.

b. Husband or wife of devisee or legatee.

On the ground of interest this statutory disqualification also extends to the wife of a party to a will contest, who, if the will was sustained, would acquire an inchoate right of dower. Johnson v. Cochrane, 91 Hun, 165, 36 N. Y. Supp. 283, affirmed in 159 N. Y. 555, 54 N. E. 1092; Steele v. Ward, 30 Hun, 555; Re Weed, 143 App. Div. 822, 127 N. Y. Supp. 966.

The statute disqualifies from testifying as to personal transactions and communications with the testator, the wife of one of the testator's next of kin, where the testimony is against the will, and the testator left real estate which, except for the will, would descend to his heirs at law. Roche v. Nason, 105 App. Div. 256, 93 N. Y. Supp. 565.

And it has been held that this disqualification exists although the husband does not join in the proceeding to contest the will, where, however, he would profit if the will were invalidated. Re Blaine, 143 App. Div. 687, 128 N. Y. Supp. 186. Compare with Burmeister v. Gust, infra, d.

And evidence by the husband of an interested party to a will contest as to personal communications of the deceased is held incompetent in Re Brown, 143 Iowa, 649, 120 N. W. 667.

Where one of the parties to a proceeding to annul a will, being the grandchild of the testatrix, is disqualified as a witness in her own behalf, her husband is likewise disqualified. Bailey v. Bee, — W. Va. —, 80 S. E. 454.

To the same effect is Freeman v. Freeman, 71 W. Va. 303, 76 S. E. 657, wherein it is said that where one consort is forbidden by a disqualifying statute "to give testimony in regard to a personal transaction or communication had with the decedent, because of his or her being a party to or interested in the result of the suit, the other consort is also denied the right to testify. The denial of the right rests on two grounds, viz.: (1) if the testimony offered would be in favor of the other consort, it is excluded on the ground of identity of interest of husband and wife; and (2) if the testimony is adverse to the interest of the other consort, it is excluded on the ground of public policy. It would certainly not be conducive to domestic happiness and concord to permit one consort to testify against the interest and the will of the other."

The wife of one of the heirs at law of the testator, who is contesting the latter's will, is disqualified as a witness against the will. Linebarger v. Linebarger, 143 N. C. 229, 55 S. E. 709, 10 Ann. Cas. 596.

An heir at law of the testator, who is also a devisee or legatee in his will, is disqualified as a witness in his own behalf in a proceeding to probate the will, and the spouses of such parties are likewise disqualified to the same extent. Re Valentine, 93 Wis. 45, 67 N. W. 5.

In Scherrer v. Kaufman, 1 Dem. 39, it is held, however, that the wife of an heir at law of the testator is not disqualified as a witness in a proceeding to probate the latter's will, although her testimony is in favor of the interests of her husband. But compare with New York cases supra.

The statutory provision that no party to a civil action shall be allowed to testify in any action where the adverse party is the executor or administrator of a deceased person, or is a party claiming or defending as heir, grantee, or devisee of the deceased person, is intended to exclude from testifying the real, and not the mere formal, nominal, or wholly unnecessary parties, and hence does not exclude the husband of a devisee or heir of the testator who is merely joined with his wife in a proceeding devisavit vel non because of her coverture, where, to give her a standing in court, she needed neither the aid of her husband nor her next friend. Wolf v. Powner, 30 Ohio St. 472.

In Spivey v. Walton, — Miss. —, 64 So. 947, it is held that the Code provision that a person shall not testify as a witness to establish his own claim or defense against the estate of the deceased person which originated during the lifetime of such person does not disqualify the spouse of such person.

c. Widow of decedent.

Ordinarily the widow of a deceased person is either made one of his heirs or a distributee by statute, hence she is an interested witness, and where the disqualifying provisions of the statute are held applicable to proceedings to succeed to the estate of the deceased person the qualification will be held to apply to her. Many of the cases applying the provision to the widow of the deceased will be found under the various subdivisions. As to the right of an alleged widow of a deceased person, in a proceeding to succeed to the latter's estate, to testify to the fact of marriage, where this is the matter in dispute, see note appended to Berger v. Kirby, ante, 182.

The widow of a testator, and a legatee in his will, is incompetent to testify, in support of his will, to communications of the decedent during his life time. French v. French, 14 W. Va. 458.

And a widow cannot testify to communications made to her by her deceased husband in a proceeding to contest the latter's will. Re Evans, 114 Iowa, 240, 86 N. W. 283.

In a contest over the probate of a will, the widow of the testator is incompetent as a witness as to statements of her husband with reference to his reasons for not making any testamentary provision for his children. Re Perkins, 109 Iowa, 216, 80 N. W. 335.

On a bill in equity by some of the heirs to set aside a probated will of their ancestor on the ground of his mental incapacity, in which the widow and part of the heirs are made parties defendant, the widow is not a competent witness to sustain the will. Freeman v. Easley, 117 Ill. 317, 7 N. E. 656.

In Mississippi it is held that the surviving spouse is not a competent witness in his or her own favor in a proceeding involving the succession to a share of the testator's estate, although the relationship is conceded. WHITEHEAD v. KIRK; Watson v. Duncan, 84 Miss. 763, 37 So. 125.

On the ground of interest the widow of the testator is not disqualified from testifying against the will of her deceased husband where there is in existence another will previously executed by him, by the terms of which she receives the same amount as she does under the will being contested. Talbot v. Talbot, 23 N. Y. 17.

But a widow of a deceased person is not a party to a proceeding to probate a will, although she filed a caveat as next friend for her infant children, and hence she is not disqualified as a witness therein. Johnson v. Johnson, 105 Md. 81, 121 Am. St. Rep. 570, 65 Atl. 918.

d. Executor.

The interest of a person nominated in a will as executor in the fees which would accrue to him if he were appointed and served is not sufficient to disqualify him as a witness in favor of the will. Re Wilson, 103 N. Y. 374, 8 N. E. 731; Loder v. Whelpley, 111 N. Y. 239, 18 N. E. 874; Re Folts, 71 Hun, 492, 24 N. Y. Supp. 1052; Reeve v. Crosby, 3 Redf. 74; Re Gagan, 20 N. Y. Supp. 426.

An executor is not disqualified by the Georgia statute as a witness on the trial of an issue devisavit vel non. Harris v. Harris, 53 Ga. 678.

And see Re Spiegelhalter, 1 Penn. (Del.) 5, 39 Atl. 465, holding that an executor named in a will was competent as a witness in favor of the will in a proceeding for its probate.

A statute providing that it shall not be competent for any party to an action or any person interested in the event thereof, to give evidence therein of or concerning any conversation with, or admission of, a deceased party, does not disqualify as a witness a person named as executor in the will sought to be probated, although he is also the husband of one of the legatees therein, since the proceeding to establish a will is one in rem, and the executor is not a party to the action, within the meaning of the statute; for the disqualification of the statute does not extend to all parties to the record, but only to such as are parties to the specific issue to which the testimony relates. Neither is the executor disqualified as a person having an interest in the event of the action; for his interest is 51 L.R.A.(N.S.)

not pecuniary, legal, certain, and immediate. Burmeister v. Gust, 117 Minn. 247, 135 N. W. 980.

And in Maine it is held that an executor is not a party prosecuting or defending the suit within the meaning of the disqualifying statute, so as to disqualify him as a witness, in a contest over the probate of a will. Millay v. Wiley, 46 Me. 230; McKeen v. Frost, 46 Me. 239.

Where by statute no party to a civil action, or person directly interested in the event thereof, may testify therein when the adverse party sues or defends as executor, administrator, heir, legatee, or devisee, unless called as a witness by the adverse party, the executor of a will, although made a party defendant, cannot testify in favor of the complainants, where his interests lie with the complainants, and not with the defendants. Bardell v. Brady, 172 Ill. 420, 50 N. E. 124.

Where a person becomes an active party in a proceeding to probate a will his interest in securing the admission of the will to probate disqualifies him as a witness; but where he has contracted with the decedent to execute his will without compensation, and, being so bound, he seeks the probate of the will in the performance of his agreement, he is not thereby disqualified to testify on the part of the contestants in a proceeding to set aside a second will. Godfrey v. Phillips, 209 Ill. 584, 71 N. E. 19.

And a person named as executor by a nuncupative will is not a competent witness to establish same. Watts v. Holland, 56 Tex. 54.

And see Umstead v. Bowling, 150 N. C. 507, 64 S. E. 368, and Bowen v. Goranflo, 73 Pa. 357, holding an executor to be incompetent as a witness in favor of a will.

In Hogan v. Hinchey, 195 Mo. 527, 94 S. W. 522, the court remarked that the fact that a will directed the collection of certain notes and the application of the proceeds toward the payment of designated debts, and the application of the balance according to verbal instructions known only to the appointee, gave him an interest in sustaining the will, and they were not prepared to say that he was a competent witness.

In Anderson v. Laugen, 122 Wis. 57, 99 N. W. 437, the court intimated that an administrator, as such, was excluded as a witness with reference to a transaction or communication with deceased by the statutory provision that no party shall be examined in respect to a personal transaction or communication with the deceased. This provision, however, was held to be modified by an amendment providing that no party shall be examined as a witness in his own behalf; and under this amendment an executor who is the proponent of the will, but not a devisee or legatee therein, was held not disqualified.

e. Miscellaneous.

Merely that a will provides that an attesting witness shall be employed by the executor as his attorney in settling the estate is not sufficient to disqualify such person as a witness to the will, on the ground that he is a party in interest under its provisions. Re Rehard, — Iowa, —, 143 N. W. 1106. A. G. S.

WASHINGTON SUPREME COURT.
(Department No. 1.)

JAMES A. DOUGAN, Appt.,
v.
CITY OF SEATTLE, Resp't.

(— Wash. —, 136 Pac. 1165.)

Highway — injury to pedestrian — presumption of negligence.

1. It is not negligence per se for a city to maintain a sidewalk without cleats on a grade of 12.9 per cent.

Evidence — judicial notice — grade of walk.

2. The court may take judicial notice

Note. — Negligence with respect to slope or grade of sidewalk.

This note, as indicated in its title, is confined to the question whether the maintenance of a sloping sidewalk or cross walk does or does not constitute negligence. This, of course, includes the question what is a proper grade or slope. Cases where the injury occurred upon a sloping walk, but negligence with respect to the grade or slope was not made an issue, are excluded. The note to Elam v. Mt. Sterling, 20 L.R.A. (N.S.) 513, treating generally of the liability of municipal corporations for defects or obstructions in streets, includes, at page 619, some of the earlier cases on this question.

As to liability of municipality for injury from unevenness in sidewalks or cross walks, see notes in 20 L.R.A. (N.S.) 640; 29 L.R.A. (N.S.) 180; 35 L.R.A. (N.S.) 666, and 43 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1158.

The present note, being confined to cases where the liability is predicated upon the construction of a walk with a slope or grade, does not purport to cover the cases where the liability is predicated upon the failure to remove ice or snow from such a walk, though it is intended to include the cases where the fact that ice and snow are liable to accumulate on the walk is considered as an element of the question whether the construction was negligent. As to liability for permitting accumulation of snow and ice, see Index to L.R.A. Notes, "Highways," §§ 71, 84, 86, 91.

The question as to contributory negligence of one using a walk with a slope or grade is not within the scope of the present note. On that question, see notes to Lerner v. Philadelphia, 21 L.R.A. (N.S.) 614, 638, and Knoxville v. Cain, 48 L.R.A. (N.S.) 628, 634.

Municipal corporations are under no obligation to maintain a perfectly level sidewalk.

that 13 per cent grades are common in the cities and towns of the state, and that they have not been prohibited by law.

Appeal — findings of trial court — conclusiveness.

3. The findings of the trial court will be accepted as conclusive, unless the evidence preponderates against them.

(Gose, J., dissents.)

(December 13, 1913.)

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Superior Court for King County in defendant's favor in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. James A. Dougan, in propria persona:

Failure of municipal authorities to place cleats, or other safeguards, on a portion of walk. So, while municipalities are not bound to protect pedestrians against extraordinary or unlikely conditions, and are not liable where accidents are caused by the mere slipperiness of the walks in no way connected with a faulty construction, the law requires a municipal corporation to so construct its walks that they will be reasonably safe under all ordinary conditions. In constructing a walk upon a slant, a municipality should take into consideration, local, climatic, and topographical conditions, with a view to making the walk reasonably safe for pedestrians. Consequently, a municipality is negligent in failing to anticipate and guard against the danger of a pedestrian slipping upon a walk built upon a slant and likely to become slippery because of water and ice. Smith v. Yankton, 23 S. D. 352, 121 N. W. 848.

So, where an adjoining owner in rebuilding changes the grade of a sidewalk, so as to give it a lateral pitch of 7½ inches instead of 2 inches in 10 feet, thus rendering the walk, because of its slope, dangerous to pedestrians, the municipal corporation was, in Urquhart v. Ogdensburg, 97 N. Y. 238, limiting 91 N. Y. 73, 43 Am. Rep. 655, held guilty of negligence for failure to remedy the defect after notice.

It is negligence for a municipal corporation to maintain a sidewalk on an incline with an exceedingly smooth surface, which is especially dangerous in moist weather, without adopting, as is usual in such cases, the ordinary rough finish. Armour v. Peterborough, 10 Ont. L. Rep. 306, 5 Ont. Week. Rep. 630. An action for injuries in such a case as the above would be for failure to repair.

A walk 6 feet long, having a longitudinal slope of 18 inches, is improperly and negligently constructed, where the contour of the ground on which it was laid, or the surrounding conditions, did not render an in-the sidewalk which is at a great incline, renders the city liable to a pedestrian who is injured.

The construction of a wooden sidewalk cline necessary. White v. Trinidad, 10 Colo. App. 327, 52 Pac. 214.

In the following cases, no municipal liability for injury to a pedestrian by falling upon a sloping sidewalk or cross walk, based upon negligence with respect to the grade or slope of the walk, was established: McQueen v. Elkhart, 14 Ind. App. 671, 43 N. E. 460 (8 feet inclines, sloping 12 inches, connecting two sidewalks of different level); Lush v. Parkersburg, 127 Iowa, 701, 104 N. W. 336 (approach from street to sidewalk, sloping 1 foot in 7. A town was not negligent in constructing such a slope, in the absence of a finding that the slope rendered the walk dangerous); Wesley v. Detroit, 117 Mich. 658, 76 N. W. 104, 4 Am. Neg. Rep. 651 (earth incline at end of walk about 12 inches in 3 feet, the walk being made unsafe solely by snow and ice); Owen v. New York, 141 App. Div. 217, 120 N. Y. Supp. 38 (slope towards curb of 1½ inches in 11 feet); Cook v. Milwaukee, 27 Wis. 191 (stone leading across gutter from sidewalk into street, having inclination of about 1 inch to a foot, and sidewalks having inclination of 6 inches in the 2 feet immediately adjacent to such stone); Schroth v. Prescott, 63 Wis. 652, 24 N. W. 405 (decline 3½ inches to 2½ feet in plank sidewalk in city of 800 inhabitants); Grossenbach v. Milwaukee, 65 Wis. 32, 56 Am. Rep. 614, 26 N. W. 182 (apron at crossing 8 feet long, ascending from 8 to 12 inches in whole length); De Pere v. Hibbard, 104 Wis. 666, 80 N. W. 933 (inclination of apron at cross walk amounting to fall of 1 inch in 10, even though combined with a slight lateral inclination); Snyder v. Superior, 146 Wis. 671, 132 N. W. 541 (cross walk is not unsafe because a 10-inch plank therein on the outer edge inclines at an angle of about 33½ degrees, making it easier for teams and wagons to go over the crossing, and leaving a drop of about 4 inches on the extreme outer edge, the drop in the walk not exceeding 2 inches at any place where a pedestrian would naturally be expected to walk); Koepke v. Milwaukee, 112 Wis. 475, 88 N. W. 238 (longitudinal decline of three quarters of an inch to the foot, because of ground sinking beneath walk, together with a lateral pitch of one fourth of an inch to the foot).

It is not negligent per se to construct an approach from a street to a sidewalk at a slope of 1 foot in 7; and the fact that plaintiff slipped on such an approach when it was covered by a recent fall of snow would not be sufficient to warrant the jury in finding that the slope was in itself, as a matter of fact, too great, and that the approach was therefore negligently constructed and maintained; nor was the allegation of negligence in constructing the walk so that the plank ran lengthwise instead of crosswise such an allegation of negligence as should have gone to jury in the absence of any evidence whatever that it was unusual or improper to employ the former form of construction instead of the latter, or that the approach was more dangerous on account of the form of construction employed. Lush v. Parkersburg, supra.

So, a city is not negligent in maintaining a plank apron at a cross walk 6 feet wide and 6 feet long, sloping 2 inches to the foot for the 6 feet, although cleats 14 inches apart nailed to planks had become covered with ice. Cooper v. Waterloo, 98 Wis. 424, 74 N. W. 115.

Where a sidewalk is not negligently constructed nor allowed to become unsafe or dangerous, an injury caused by a mere slant in the sidewalk is not actionable. Price v. Maryville, 174 Mo. App. 698, 161 S. W. 295.

Whether the maintenance of a sloping sidewalk or cross walk, without taking some precaution, such as providing cleats, to pre-on an incline does not constitute a defective construction, nor is it negligence per se, for which the city is liable.

Chadwick, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Plaintiff slipped and fell upon a sidewalk laid upon a slope of 12.9 per cent, suffering injuries for which he seeks compensation in this action. The accident occurred on the morning of the 5th day of April, 1912. There was a slight frost on the sidewalk. From a judgment in favor of the defendant, plaintiff has appealed.

Plaintiff estimated the grade of the walk at about 17 per cent. The court made no specific finding upon this point, holding, in addition to the fact that the city was not vent pedestrians slipping in case the walk should become slippery because of water, snow, or ice, is negligence, is generally a question of fact for the determination of the jury. Griffith v. Denver, 55 Colo. 37, 132 Pac. 57 (incline one-half inch to foot toward street, such incline being slightly in excess of that fixed by ordinance); Beirness v. Missouri Valley, post, 218 (sidewalk varied from grade of the center of the street, the latter being at the grade of 13 per cent and the former at the grade of 14 $\frac{79}{100}$ per cent); Breckman v. Covington, 143 Ky. 444, 136 S. W. 865 (a sidewalk is not dangerous as matter of law where, within 1 $\frac{1}{2}$ feet of some stone steps leading into a grocery store, it had a slope of 3 $\frac{1}{2}$ inches); Moynihan v. Holyoke, 193 Mass. 26, 78 N. E. 742 (smooth, slippery sidewalk, made partly of glass, sloping longitudinally 2 $\frac{1}{2}$ inches in 10 feet); Connell v. Canton, 24 S. D. 572, 124 N. W. 839 (approach to cross walk 6 feet long, sloping in that distance 10 inches); Morrison v. Madison, 96 Wis. 452, 71 N. W. 882 (apron from the sidewalk across the gutter constructed on a slope of 1 $\frac{1}{2}$ inches to the foot).

A city is not bound to construct its sidewalk so that, rendered slippery with snow and ice, it would be impossible for one stepnegligent, that plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence, and it made no difference whether the grade was 13 per cent or 17 per cent. The evidence of a city engineer based on actual measurements fixes the grade at 12.9 per cent, and we shall accept his finding.

Waiving the question of contributory negligence, there is but one question in this case; that is, whether it is negligence per se for a city to maintain a sidewalk without cleats on a 12.9 per cent grade.

Negligence is not to be presumed from the sole fact that plaintiff fell and was injured. Grossenbach v. Milwaukee, 65 Wis. 32, 56 Am. Rep. 614, 26 N. W. 182; Sorenson v. Menasha Paper & Pulp Co. 56 Wis. 338, 14 N. W. 446; Lush v. Parkersburg, 127 Iowa, 701, 104 N. W. 336. The testimony does not show the opinion of those who are competent to pass an opinion upon the physical facts disclosed; nor is it made to appear that other accidents upon sidewalks similarly constructed have happened with sufficient frequency to put the city upon notice of its dangerous character.

No cases are cited, nor have we found any, where courts have assumed to hold a grade of like character dangerous as a matter of law. We may take judicial notice that such grades are frequent—in fact common—in the cities and towns of this state, and that they have been maintained without prohibitive or regulative legislation. The courts have treated the question of negligence in such cases as one of fact, ping over it to slip and fall; nor is a city negligent as matter of law in maintaining a plank sidewalk without cleats on an incline of 4 $\frac{1}{2}$ feet to about 32 feet. Owens v. Chicago, 162 Ill. App. 196.

Where a walk sloped toward the center of a street, the side or edge next to the fence being 10 inches higher than the other, it was held in Shumway v. Burlington, 108 Iowa, 424, 79 N. W. 123, that whether the city was negligent in not anticipating and providing against the dangerous condition of such sloping walk, because of water discharging thereon and freezing, was a question for the jury, where the evidence tended to show that water from adjacent premises had been discharged through a hole in the fence, over the walk, for so long a time that the defendant should be charged with knowledge of it.

It was held in Clemence v. Auburn, 66 N. Y. 334, to be a question for the jury whether a stone 3 $\frac{1}{2}$ feet, laid at a slope of 6 inches to its width, connecting two sidewalks of different levels, was so unsafe as to render the city liable to one who, while passing over this stone when it was covered with a light fall of snow, slipped, fell, and was injured.

It was held a question of fact for the jury and have persistently refused to direct verdicts or render judgment non obstante.

In Morrison v. Madison, 96 Wis. 452, 71 N. W. 882, the slope was 22 inches in 134 feet, or 13.6 per cent. The court said: "The facts in regard to its construction and condition are all undisputed; yet, if there was any room for honest differences of opinion among reasonable men of unbiased minds in respect to the inferences that should be drawn therefrom regarding the fact in issue, then it was for the jury, and not the court, to draw the correct inference. It is only when the facts are undisputed, and the reasonable inferences therefrom in regard to the ultimate fact in issue are all one way, that what is the proper inference is a question of law for the court to answer." This case is instructive in that it refers to many cases where the grade and absence of cleats were the only defects complained of. In Lush v. Parkersburg, supra, it is said: "The only evidence as to the approach to the sidewalk being dangerous, and as to the negligence of the defendant in allowing it to remain in a dangerous condition, was to the effect that it should have been provided with cleats or strips nailed across it. The approach was of pine planks laid lengthwise, 5 feet long, and it was 8½ inches higher where it joined the sidewalk than where it joined the street. The slope of the approach was therefore 1 foot in 7, and there is no evidence whatever that this slope in itself rendered the approach dangerous, or that the town was negligent, in view of all the circumstances, in constructing the approach at such a slope." The annotator of the Lawyers' Reports, in an exhaustive monographic note following the case of Elam v. Mt. Sterling, 20 L.R.A. (N.S.) 512, finds the rule to be: "Whether a given street was in a reasonably safe condition for the convenience of travel is a practical question, to be determined by the jury in each case by the particular circumstances."

Plaintiff cites many cases holding that it is negligence for the city to maintain a sloping sidewalk without cleats. We have examined these cases carefully and find confirmation of our tentative opinion that it has always been so held in aid of the verdict of a jury. In other words, an appellate court will not so hold as a matter of law unless the facts are so patent as to warrant it in saying that the minds of reasonable men would not differ in their conclusion; but a jury, having considered all the facts, and having so found, its verdict will not be disturbed. Reference to the cases will show that the grade complained of in this case is not unusual. The instant case was tried before the court, and findings made that the city was not negligent.

It is the settled practice of this court to treat such findings as a verdict of a jury, and sustain them, unless, upon an examination de novo, we find that the evidence preponderates against them. Rem. & Bal. Code, § 1736.

to determine, in McMaugh v. Milwaukee, 32 Wis. 200, whether a cross walk 2 feet 4 inches wide, extending over a gutter 2½ feet below the walk, the walk descending at that place at the rate of 18 feet in 100 (the grade established by the city ordinance being 1 foot in 100 feet), was a properly constructed walk, reasonably safe for travelers who might have occasion to pass over it in the night when it might be covered with ice and snow.

It was stated in Whitney v. Milwaukee, 57 Wis. 639, 16 N. W. 12, where the sufficiency of a cross walk was held a question of fact for the jury, that a jury might say that a cross walk but 5½ feet wide, descending from a sidewalk 14 feet and 9 inches wide, on an incline of 3½ feet in 8 feet, not in line with the sidewalk, and without any guard or railing, on one of the great thoroughfares of a large city, was constructed in a faulty and unsafe manner, and that it was practicable to construct it so as to avoid the danger of passing up and down the descent.

Whether the maintenance of an incline of 2½ feet in 20, from a bridge to a sidewalk, with cleats 1 foot apart, constituted negligence on the part of the city, was held a question for the jury in Perkins v. Fond du Lac, 34 Wis. 435, the court observing that, it being inferable from the evidence that it was practicable to construct the walk differently and more on the level with the bridge, so as to avoid the danger of passing up and down the descent, the jury might have found that the walk was improperly built, and that, as a consequence, it was not safe and convenient for ordinary travel.

In Hill v. Fond du Lac, 56 Wis. 248, 14 N. W. 25, the question was not whether the mere sudden declivity in the sidewalk, in the absence of any storm or freezing, would have been dangerous, nor whether the mere storm and freezing weather in the absence of the walk in question, and with the walk differently constructed, would have caused danger, but whether that walk so constructed, with such ice and snow as would ordinarily accumulate upon it during such severe storms and freezing weather as ordinarily occurred at that season of the year at the place of the injury, would be unsafe for travelers upon it. If, in that condition and under such circumstances, it was unsafe, then it was defective. It was clearly the province of the jury to determine that question.

J. D. C.

Plaintiff cites the cases of Calder v. Walla Walla, 6 Wash. 377, 33 Pac. 1054; Short v. Spokane, 41 Wash. 257, 83 Pac. 183; and Bull v. Spokane, 46 Wash. 237, 13 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1105, 89 Pac. 555. We have examined these cases and find that they suggest nothing in opposition to our present conclusion.

The judgment is affirmed.

Crow, Ch. J., and Ellis and Main, JJ., concur.

Gose, J., dissenting:

It was not necessary to offer evidence to show that one is more liable to fall when descending a smooth, slippery inclined plane than when walking over a smooth, slippery level. That fact is one of common knowledge. The danger necessarily increases as the grade increases. When a sidewalk is laid at such a grade as to render travel upon it unsafe, its maintenance without cleats or other safeguard is a negligent act. It requires neither evidence nor argument to prove that a smooth-surfaced sidewalk laid upon a grade of approximately 13 per cent is unsafe and dangerous. That fact is so obvious, as I view it, that evidence can neither emphasize nor weaken its force. Nor was it necessary to prove that others had fallen. The inference to be drawn from the majority opinion is that the first traveler who fell, or perhaps the first half dozen who were so unfortunate as to fall and sustain injuries, could have no redress, but that those who later fell, and who could prove the misfortune of their brethren, could recover. The city laid and maintained the walk and knew its condition. To my mind its negligence is apparent. The appellant testified that he did not observe the frost, which was a light one, before he fell. He is therefore not chargeable with contributory negligence. I therefore dissent.

IOWA SUPREME COURT.

MARGARET BEIRNESS, Appt.,
v.
CITY OF MISSOURI VALLEY.

(— Iowa, —, 144 N. W. 628.)

Proximate cause — snow and ice on walk — injury to pedestrian.

1. The negligence, if any, of a municipal corporation in permitting snow and ice to remain on a sidewalk in rough and uneven surfaces, is immaterial where the undisputed evidence shows that plaintiff had, before falling, passed over the part of the walk where the ridges and rough surfaces were claimed to have been.

Note. — As to liability of municipal corporation for injuries from rough or uneven snow or ice accumulated from natural causes on a street or sidewalk, see notes to Bull v. Spokane, 13 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1105, and Jackson v. Grand Forks, 45 L.R.A. (N.S.) 51 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Evidence — ice on walk — constructive notice.

2. Where, in an action against a municipality for injuries from a fall on an icy sidewalk on Wednesday morning, it is shown that, on the preceding Sunday and Monday, there had been a fall of snow, and that between Sunday and Tuesday evening there had been a slight thaw, and on Tuesday night an additional snowfall of about one-half inch, there is nothing to warrant a jury in the conclusion that a small spot of ice covered with snow on the walk had existed for such time as would charge the city with notice of it.

Municipal corporation — ice on walk — right to wait for thaw.

3. When cold follows a melting of snow, causing a film of ice upon the sidewalks which it is practically impossible to remove, the municipality may, without being guilty of negligence, wait for a change of temperature to remedy the condition.

Notice — complaint of condition of walk.

4. Complaint to a city official of the condition of a walk does not charge the city with notice of a condition to which the complaint did not relate.

Highway — variance between grade of sidewalk and of street.

5. The fact that the grade upon which a sidewalk was constructed varied from the grade of the street, to the extent of increasing its slant about 1 inch in 2 feet, cannot be held a contributing cause to an injury sustained by a pedestrian who slipped upon a spot of ice covered with snow, since it is pure speculation as to whether the accident would or would not have happened had the sidewalk conformed to the street grade.

Same — smooth surface of walk.

6. The negligence, if any, of a city in constructing a walk with a surface so smooth as to be dangerous to pedestrians, is immaterial where the accident complained of was not caused by the smoothness of the walk, but from the presence of snow-covered ice thereon.

Evidence — sidewalk cleaning ordinance.

7. It is not error, in an action against a city for injury sustained by one falling on a slippery walk, to exclude evidence of an ordinance which requires removal of snow from walks within twelve hours after it has ceased to fall, where the failure to remove the snow within a reasonable time is not shown to have been a contributing cause to the injury.

75. For other questions in relation to snow and ice, see Index to L.R.A. Notes, "Highways," §§ 71, 84, 86, 91.

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the District Court for Harrison County sustaining a motion by defendant for direction of a verdict in its favor in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Affirmed.

Statement by Withrow, J.:

Action to recover damages for injury resulting from a fall on an icy sidewalk. The trial court directed a verdict for the defendant, and plaintiff appeals.

Messrs. Ambrose Burke and S. H. Cochran, for appellant:

The construction of the sidewalk on a different grade than provided in the city ordinance is evidence of negligence.

Withrow, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

I. The appellant received certain injuries as the result of a fall while passing along a sidewalk in the city of Missouri Valley. She brought action to recover damages, alleging that the city was negligent: (1) In permitting the construction and maintenance of the sidewalk at a grade which was steeper than the established grade of the street to which it was adjacent, which it is alleged was dangerous to the public using the same. (2) In constructing the walk in this climate with a smooth surface, and in permitting snow and ice to remain on the walk in violation of the city ordinance, in violation of law, and in permitting snow and ice to remain on the walk in rough and uneven surfaces. There was a trial to a jury, which resulted in a verdict being directed in favor of the defendant, from which this appeal is taken by the plaintiff.

II. Appellant's accident and injury occurred about 8:30 o'clock A. M. Wednesday, December 7, 1910. On the preceding Sunday and Monday there had been a fall of snow, estimated by witnesses as from 3 to 5 inches in depth. On the night before the accident there had been an additional snow fall of about one-half inch. Between Sunday and Tuesday evening there had been a slight thaw, the effect of which was to remove some, but not all, of the snow from the walk. In the center of the walk, which was of concrete structure, a path had been made by travelers over it. The effect of the travel along the path had been to create ridges or uneven conditions raised by the imprint and pressure of feet in the snow, followed by freezing, which made the raised places more or less solid. The walk was sloping, being built upon a hillside; the grade of descent at the point where the accident occurred, being near 15 per cent. At the time of the accident, the appellant was going down the hill, upon the sidewalk.

While it is urged that the accident resulted from the combined causes of the rough and uneven surface of the walk, occasioned by the snow and ice upon it, in connection with the steep grade, which it is charged is not in accordance with the established grade of the street at that point, the evidence shows without dispute, and it therefore must be taken as true, that appellant had passed over the part of the walk where the ridges and rough surface are claimed to have been, and her fall resulted from stepping upon a place covered by the snow of the previous night, which under the pressure of her weight slipped on a thin coating of ice beneath, occasioning her fall. These facts remove from the case, as a charge of negligence, the permitting of the snow and ice to remain upon the walk in rough and uneven surface, as that particular condition is shown to have had no proximate connection with her fall.

III. The testimony of the appellant and her husband was to the effect that the ice upon which she slipped covered a surface about the size of a hand, by her described as "just a little spot of ice." Where she fell the sidewalk was bare in spots, having the appearance of being covered with sleet. At that place the snow was soft. We are therefore led directly to the question whether the spot of ice at the particular place where the accident happened is shown to have existed for such length of time as created liability for failure to remove it. The evidence shows without dispute that in near-by places the walk appeared to be sleety. There is no evidence of there having been a fall of sleet; but that condition is explained by the evidence which shows that between Sunday and Tuesday evening there had been a slight thaw, which, followed by a freeze, would occasion ice surface at places where the water rested or had not flowed away. We do not find in the evidence that which would permit us or warrant a jury in the conclusion that the particular icy condition at the place of the accident had existed for such time as charged the city with notice of it. Tobin v. Waterloo, 131 Iowa, 75, 107 N. W. 1031; Goodson v. Des Moines, 66 Iowa, 255, 23 N. W. 655.

But independent of the question of notice, actual or presumed, it has been held that when cold follows a melting of snow, causing a film of ice upon the sidewalks which it is practically impossible to remove, the municipality may, without being guilty of negligence, wait for a change of temperature to remedy the condition. 28 Cyc. 1378; Taylor v. Yonkers, 105 N. Y. 202, 59 Am. Rep. 492, 11 N. E. 642; Luther v. Worcester, 97 Mass. 268.

There is in the record evidence which tends to show that, prior to the time of the accident, complaint of the condition of the walk had been made by a citizen to an official of the city; but even if this be held as notice, it did not reach to the condition which is the controlling one in this case.

IV. There remains the question whether the variance between the established grade of the street, and the grade upon which the sidewalk was built, constituted negligence which caused the injury, either alone or concurrently with other causes. The established grade of the street at the intersection of Fifth and Huron streets was 64.50, and at the intersection of Fifth and Superior streets it was 112.60, both above the plane of reference. The accident occurred about 50 feet north of the intersection of Fifth and Huron. The sidewalk between the intersections named varied from the grade of the center of the street, the latter being at a grade of 13 per cent, and the sidewalk at a grade of 14.79 per cent, which, as the testimony shows, increases the slant of the sidewalk, as claimed by appellant, 7.6 feet in 180 feet, or about 1 inch in 2 feet. The appellee makes different deductions from the measurements, but for our present purpose we follow the claim of appellant. It is the rule that an ordinance establishing a grade for the center of the street operates to establish a grade for that portion of the street occupied by sidewalks. Gallaher v. Jefferson, 125 Iowa, 324, 101 N. W. 124. Such was expressly required by an ordinance of the defendant city.

Such variance arising, does it follow that in failing to follow the established grade the city was negligent in such manner as to contribute to the injury of the appellant? We have been cited to no case holding that under such conditions, where the sidewalk is a permanent structure, negligence arises as a matter of law because of the difference between established grade and structure. Cases cited by the appellant are to the effect only that, where the manner of constructing a sidewalk was such that it did not afford reasonable safety to those who might pass along it, the question of negligence is for the jury. Ford v. Des Moines, 106 Iowa, 97, 75 N. W. 630, 4 Am. Neg. Rep. 379; Langhammer v. Manchester, 99 Iowa, 295, 68 N. W. 688.

But assuming, as contended by appellant, that the grade upon which the walk was constructed varied to the extent shown by the evidence from the established grade of the street, can it be said that such difference in grade had causal connection with appellant's injury? The suggestion of the question immediately presents the difficulties which must attend its solution, and, as applied to this case, a question almost impossible of a reasonably certain or fairly probable answer. Upon a walk built in accordance with the established grade, under such conditions and circumstances as attended the accident in question, it cannot be said, either as a matter of law, or as a question upon which testimony might be offered, that the accident would not have happened, for such would be a mere conjecture, incapable of definite demonstration as a probable result. To have submitted the question upon the claim of negligence based upon such facts, it would have been the duty of the trial court to instruct the jury that defendant would be liable if it found that but for the added slope in the sidewalk the injury would not have been sustained. Langhammer v. Manchester, supra.

In the present case the appellant slipped upon the snow-covered ice. That was the operating cause of her fall. It is possible the increased slope of the walk had something to do with it, and likewise possible that it did not, and a conclusion as to either is necessarily a matter of speculation, without the support of substantial proof. Under such conditions, the grade slant of the sidewalk cannot be held to be a contributing cause to the injury. Taylor v. Yonkers, supra; Moore v. Abbot, 32 Me. 46; Billings v. Worcester, 102 Mass. 329, 3 Am. Rep. 460.

V. The claim of negligence based upon the construction of the sidewalk with a surface so smooth as to be dangerous to pedestrians is without support as applied to this case, for the reason that it is not shown that the accident resulted from such condition, but rather from the snow-covered ice.

VI. Appellant offered in evidence the ordinance of the city of Missouri Valley which required the removal of snow from the sidewalks within twelve hours after it has ceased to fall. The trial court refused to admit it in evidence, and error is based upon such refusal. Because of the conclusions we have reached as stated above, this was not error, as the failure to remove the snow within a reasonable time was not shown to have been a contributing cause to the injury.

We agree with the conclusion reached by the trial court, and its judgment is affirmed.

v.

BUSINESS MEN'S PROTECTIVE ASSOCIATION OF DES MOINES, Appt.

(— Iowa, —, 145 N. W. 479.)

Insurance — gunshot accident — witness of event.

Note. — Insurance: validity and construction of provision requiring the fact or circumstances of loss to be established by eyewitness.

The reason for the incorporation of the provision under consideration in life or accident policies was doubtless the difficulty experienced by insurers in establishing their defenses, where the evidence as to the fact or circumstances of the death was entirely circumstantial, especially the defenses that depended upon the cause of death, or whether or not it was suicidal.

The decisions which have considered provisions of the kind under consideration are person other than the insured, who was an eyewitness of the event, requires the witness to have seen the shooting.

Same — validity — control of court proceedings.

2. Requiring the establishment of the accidental nature of an injury by a gunshot wound before liability attaches therefor under an accident policy is not against public policy as an attempt to modify or control the procedure of courts of justice.

(February 19, 1914.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the District Court for Jackson County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover the amount alleged to be due on an accident insurance policy. Reversed.

Statement by Deemer, J.:

Action upon a benefit certificate in the defendant association. The defendant denied liability upon grounds which will be referred to in the body of the opinion. The case was tried to the court without a jury, resulting in a judgment for plaintiff for the amount of the certificate with interest, and defendant appeals.

Messrs. Dunshee & Haines, for appellant:

The by-law being in force at the time the decedent joined, and having been as-few. In Lewis v. Brotherhood Acci. Co. 194 Mass. 1, 17 L.R.A. (N.S.) 714, 79 N. E. 802, the facts and circumstances of a drowning accident were held to be sufficiently established within the meaning of an accident policy limiting the insurer's liability in case of drowning, "when the facts and circumstances of the accident and injury are not established by the testimony of actual eyewitnesses," where witnesses testified to having seen the insured in a cranky canoe, with a companion, within three or four minutes of the time of the accident, and to having seen the overturned canoe and evidence of its having recently capsized within a few minutes after it overturned, although they did not actually see it go over.

In the only other case which appears to have considered such a provision, it was held that the insured, who had received a nonfatal injury by shooting, was an eyewitness to his own injury, within the meaning of a provision of an accident policy limiting liability if the injury was caused by "shooting, when the facts and circumstances of the accident and injury are not established by the testimony of an actual eyewitness." National Acci. Soc. v. Ralstin, 101 Ill. App. 192. as no other witness testifies to the manner of the shooting, appellant is only liable for $40, one twentieth of the sum otherwise payable. Appellee was by law a competent witness. As such he detailed the facts and circumstances of his accident as it occurred. He was an actual eyewitness whose testimony showed that the shooting was wholly unintentional. He was corroborated as to the shooting being accidental by his daughter, who swore that she saw her father get his gun and go with it from the house into the yard to shoot the cat, and that she, within a short time, heard the report of the gun and immediately saw her father's hand lacerated and bleeding. Policies of insurance should be construed most strongly against the insurer. May, Ins. § 175; Aurora F. Ins. Co. v. Eddy, 49 Ill. 106; Niagara F. Ins. Co. v. Scammon, 100 Ill. 644. An eyewitness to a shooting does not mean one who saw the load leave the discharged gun. Nor does its meaning exclude anyone whom the statute says may testify to a matter in issue. If appellant desired to exclude appellee from establishing the fact of injury from shooting by his own testimony, it should have inserted in the policy after the words, 'when the facts and circumstances of the accident and injury are not established by the testimony of an actual eyewitness,' the words 'other than the insured.'"

Deemer, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendant is a mutual assessment accident association incorporated under chapters 7 and 8 of title 9 of the Code of Iowa. As such, on the 21st day of March, 1912, it received an application from one Albert Roeh for membership in the association. The application contained a statement that the insured would accept the certificate issued by the association "subject to all the conditions, provisions, and limitations contained in defendant's articles and by-laws." The application was accepted and a certificate was issued to and accepted by the insured on March 30, 1912. It provided certain indemnities in case of injury or death resulting from accident. No beneficiary is designated, but the articles provided that the indemnity should be paid to a surviving wife or heir of the member. On July 26, 1912, the insured came to his death as a result of the discharge of a rifle; whether the discharge was accidental or with suicidal intent does not clearly appear. This action was commenced by the administratrix of his estate to recover the benefits and indemnity of $1,000, in case of death by accidental means. Defendant introduced many defenses, and the case was tried on a stipulation of facts, supplemented by certain oral testimony.

Among other things it was stipulated in the certificate of membership that "the articles of incorporation and by-laws may be changed by amendments legally adopted, and the rights of the member to claim benefits or indemnity shall be determined by the provisions of the articles and by-laws in force at the time a claim arises. Acceptance. I hereby accept this certificate of membership subject to all the provisions, conditions, and limitations of the articles of incorporation and by-laws, and agree that both myself and my beneficiary shall be bound by future amendments legally adopted, and also subject to the terms and conditions hereinbefore set out; and I agree that the articles of incorporation, by-laws, my application, and this certificate shall jointly constitute the contract between myself, my beneficiary, and the association."

The articles of incorporation provided that "the association shall pay to the beneficiary designated in writing by any member of the accident department, who must be either the surviving wife or an heir of such member, the proceeds of one full assessment on each member of the accident department in good standing at the time of the accident, to an amount not exceeding the sum specified in his certificate for indemnity, on account of the death of any member of the accident department occurring within ninety days from the happening of the accident, and resulting directly and without intervening cause from a bodily injury sustained by the member while in good standing, and effected solely by external, violent, and accidental means, subject only to the conditions, provisions, and limitations of the by-laws. Article 5, § 14. The right of any member or person claiming by, through, and under any certificate issued to any member, to claim weekly benefits or indemnity from the association, shall be fixed and established by the provisions of the articles of incorporation and of the by-laws in force at the time the accident occurred or sickness commenced out of which any claim arises."

And the by-laws had these, among other, provisions:

"Article 1, § 3. The contract between the association and its members shall consist of the articles of incorporation and by-laws and the application and the certificate of membership."

"Article 4, § 5. This association shall not be liable for the payment of benefits or indemnity on account of disability or death resulting from a bodily injury caused by the discharge of firearms, unless the member or person claiming by, through, or under any certificate issued to such member, shall establish the accidental character of such discharge by the testimony of at least one person other than the member, who was an eyewitness of the event."

The only oral testimony as to the manner of death, we here quote: Plaintiff testified: "I had some talk with my husband about noon on the day of his death over the telephone. He wanted to know what kind of meat I wanted for dinner, and said he would be down in a short time. That was somewhere between 12:30 and 1 o'clock. I heard of his death about 1:30 the same day."

Another witness said: "I saw the body of Mr. Roeh on the 26th day of July, 1912, after he was dead. I was called in there by Mr. Anderson. I found the body in the revolving chair with his head against the wall and his rifle at his left side on the floor. The ramrod was across his knees, and his legs were crossed. His right hand was hanging down, and his left hand was on his lap. The ramrod was an ordinary ramrod, about 3 feet long, with a crook on the end of it, and on the other end of it there was a rag for cleaning the gun. The rag was a little black from the powder from the gun. The rifle was a 32 Magazine Winchester, the trigger being guarded by the lever, which works up and down. The rifle was usually kept in the shop right at the desk where he was sitting. It was used for killing cattle, Roeh being in the butcher business. I do not remember how many days it was prior to this occurrence that they had killed cattle. I think it was two days, and that the supply of meat was low. I know Roeh had some cattle ready for killing out at a farmer's. I do not know whether he had any arrangements for killing them on that day. It was in the neighborhood of 1 o'clock when I saw the body in the chair." Cross-examination: "Mr. Roeh was dead when I arrived. I did not hear the report of the rifle. I was called in there." Redirect examination. "I did not know that Roeh was dead until after the doctor had been there. That was about ten minutes after I first saw him. I did not examine him to see if he was dead."

Another gave the following testimony: "I was working for Mr. Roeh in the butcher shop the day he was killed. I had a talk with Mr. Roeh about 12 o'clock on that day. He picked up the rifle and said: 'I don't believe this rifle has been cleaned out for ten years, it is so dirty.' Then he told me to get my dinner and come back to the barn and get the horses and wagons, and get back as early as possible, as we had a big afternoon's work ahead of us. I left the shop right at 12 o'clock or close to it, and it was about 1 when I got back. When I got back I stood on the sidewalk holding the team and hollered two or three times for him to come out. When he did not come, I tied the horses and went through the shop. I called as I went in, but got no answer. I glanced into the office and saw him in the chair. He was sitting in the revolving chair with his head back against the partition. I did not stop to look further, but ran out and called Mr. Goose and Mr. Peterson." Cross-examination: "I think Mr. Roeh was dead when I first saw him. I did not hear the rifle shot. I was not present when the shooting took place. Nobody else was present that I know of or ever heard of. Our town is about 1,200 population, and I never have heard that anybody was there. Nobody ever heard the shot. Nobody saw or heard the shooting."

And the last and only other witness said: "I am the person who was called by Mr. Anderson the day on which Roeh was killed. When I got in, I found the body sitting in the revolving chair with the head leaning back against the wall, the rifle to his left side, his legs crossed, and the ramrod across his right foot. The muzzle of the gun was pointing south. He was sitting facing north. The ramrod had a rag on it, and it appeared to be a little black from running through the gun. That is all I know." Cross-examination: "I was not present at the time of the shooting, and I did not see it. So far as I ever heard of, no one heard the shot."

The defendant insisted, and still contends, that there can be no recovery under this record for the reason that there was no eyewitness to the shooting other than the member himself. On the other hand, it is argued for appellant that there is such testimony as the policy requires, and, in any event, that the provisions of the articles and by-laws on which defendant relies are contrary to public policy, null, and void, because they undertake to make a rule of evidence and interfere with the orderly procedure of courts of justice. Upon the first proposition plaintiff contends that the by-law requiring testimony of at least one person other than the member, who was an eyewitness of the event, does not necessarily mean that this other person should have been present and actually have seen the shooting; that the event includes all matters and circumstances leading up to and following the discharge, provided these be sufficient to show the character of the discharge of the gun.

The event referred to in the by-law relied upon is manifestly death resulting from a bodily injury caused by the discharge of firearms, and provides that the independent testimony should come from one who was an eyewitness of that event. The objects and purposes of this rule or by-law are clear. It was to remove the presumption of accident arising from death as a result of a gunshot wound, and to require eyewitnesses of the event in order to establish liability on the part of the insurer. Not only is the beneficiary to prove the operating cause of death, as that it was from a gunshot wound; but he must prove by eyewitnesses of the event that the gun was accidentally discharged. It is not enough that he prove that it might have been so committed. His proof must have been stronger than that, and fairly preponderate in favor of the proposition that the gun was accidentally discharged. The clause which we are now considering is quite different from any that have heretofore been before the courts. The nearest approach to it seems to be found in National Acci. Soc. v. Ralstin, 101 Ill. App. 192. In that case the insured was injured by the discharge of a gun, and gave testimony as to the manner of the discharge. It was held that, as the plaintiff was an eyewitness of his own injury, the provision of the certificate issued by the company was complied with. In Lewis v. Brotherhood Acci. Co. 194 Mass. 1, 17 L.R.A.(N.S.) 714, 79 N. E. 802, the provision of the policy was as follows: "In the event of any accidental bodily injury, fatal or nonfatal, contributed to or caused by . . . drowning or shooting, when the facts and circumstances of the accident and injury are not established by the testimony of an actual eyewitness, . . . then and in every such case the limit of the liability of this company hereunder shall be one twentieth of the accidental death benefit provided for in this policy not to exceed $250 for accidental death, and for nonfatal injuries causing total or partial disability, one fifth of the weekly indemnity provided for in this policy." It will be noticed that the facts and circumstances of the accident and injury were to be established by an eyewitness, and the court held that death by accidental drowning might be established by eyewitnesses of the facts and circumstances; in other words, that the accidental drowning might be established by circumstantial evidence.

In the case at bar, that the event, that is to say, the accidental character of the discharge of firearms resulting in death, must be established by at least one person other than the insured, and "who was an eyewitness," does not necessarily mean that the witness should have seen the exact manner of the discharge; but it seems to us that it does comprehend the presence of the witness at or near the scene, and his direct observation of such facts and circumstances connected with the immediate transaction as of themselves, and without any aid from presumption or inference arising from love of life, or the instincts of self-preservation, indicate that the shooting was accidental. The following quotation from the Lewis Case, supra, indicates our thought in the matter: "An eyewitness is a person who testifies to what he has seen. By the terms of this policy the facts and circumstances of the accident and injury are to be established by those who saw them. Not only are the facts and circumstances of the injury to be established by an eyewitness, but also those of the accident; that is, the operating cause of the injury. Enough must be testified to by eyewitnesses to show the operating cause of the injury, or at least to show that at the time of the injury there was an operating cause to which the accident may fairly be attributed, and to indicate in a general way the nature of that cause and the manner of its working. To illustrate: Suppose a person standing upon the shore sees not far out a boat sailing peacefully along in a mild breeze, with a competent and careful man at the helm. The boat is so large and steady that it is not likely to be capsized by any movement that the man would make, nor by the wind as then blowing. In no sense can the boat be said to be in then present peril from any cause. Suppose the observer leaves the shore and returns in an hour, and then sees the upturned boat near where he first saw it. During his absence an accident has happened resulting in the upsetting of the boat. Can it be said that he has seen the circumstances of the accident within any fair interpretation of the language? He has seen no cause in operation to which the accident may be fairly attributed. But suppose that when he first sees the boat, or while he is looking at it, a squall suddenly looms up in the distance and rapidly approaches the boat. He sees it strike the boat, putting her in evident peril. Wanting to get a better look, he runs to a house for a spyglass, is gone only a few minutes, and when he returns sees only a capsized boat. Such a man is an eyewitness of the accident, although he did not actually see the boat capsize. He saw the boat in peril from a then impending cause. He saw the cause at work, and he saw what was the natural effect of such a cause. That is far enough; and in such a case the cause of the accident must be held to have been established by an eyewitness within the meaning of the policy."

In the instant case no one heard the shot, although it must be conceded under the record that insured died as a result of a rifle shot. Leaving out all presumptions and inferences as to the nature of the operating cause, the proof adduced would in itself be insufficient, as we think, to show (by eyewitnesses) that the gun was accidentally discharged. Not only was the burden upon the plaintiff to show that the gun was accidentally discharged; but she had to do this by eyewitnesses of the event, and that event was, of course, the discharge of the gun.

If the by-law is good, we think plaintiff has failed to make out a case.

II. It is contended that the by-law is contrary to public policy, in that it attempts to modify and control the procedure of courts of justice. It does not in any manner deprive courts of their jurisdiction, but simply provides a rule of evidence or a condition precedent or subsequent to a right of recovery. We see nothing in the by-law contrary to public policy. Contracts relating to procedure have frequently been sustained. The parties may, by contract, fix their own statute of limitations. See Harrison v. Hartford F. Ins. Co. 102 Iowa, 112, 47 L.R.A. 709, 71 N. W. 220. They may also specify the terms and conditions of liability, even though without the contract recovery might be had. Griswold v. Illinois C. R. Co. 90 Iowa, 265, 24 L.R.A. 647, 57 N. W. 843. A contract may be made waiving a jury trial. Bank of Columbia v. Okely, 4 Wheat. 235, 4 L. ed. 559. A by-law much like the one now before us was applied in National Acci. Soc. v. Ralstin, supra; Kelly v. Supreme Council, C. M. B. A. 46 App. Div. 79, 61 N. Y. Supp. 394. A contract providing a rule of evidence was also upheld by this court in Russ v. The War Eagle, 14 Iowa, 363.

The legislature has not spoken upon this subject, and, until it does so, we see nothing inimical to public policy in the by-law now before us.

For the reasons pointed out, the judgment must be, and it is, reversed.

IOWA SUPREME COURT.

A. PATTEN, Appt.,

v.

H. B. HASELTON et al.

(— Iowa, —, 146 N. W. 477.)

Elections — death of successful candidate — right of rival.

Where a candidate for election dies before election day, too late to have a candidate substituted as provided by statute, or to notify the voters of his death, so that a majority vote for him in ignorance of his death, the person receiving the next highest number of votes cannot be declared elected, but a vacancy will exist in the office, where the statute provides that the person having the greatest number of votes shall be declared elected.

(April 7, 1914.)

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the District Court for Carroll County dismissing his petition for a writ of mandamus to compel defendants to declare him elected at a general election as a member of the board of supervisors of Carroll County. Affirmed.

Statement by Evans, J.:

Action of mandamus against the members of the board of supervisors of Carroll county acting as canvassers of election re-

Note.—Right of candidate receiving next highest number of votes where person receiving highest number died before election.

As to the closely related question of right of candidate receiving next highest number of votes in the event that the person receiving the highest number is ineligible, see the notes to State ex rel. Clawson v. Bell, 13 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1013, and Hanson v. Grattan, 34 L.R.A.(N.S.) 240.

For a note on when vacancy in party ticket occurs within a statute authorizing the filling of vacancies, see State ex rel. Curryea v. Wells, 41 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1088.

It is held that where a person who has died shortly before or during an election receives the highest number of votes, and the voters had no knowledge of this fact, the votes cast for him are so far of force as to prevent the election of the candidate receiving the next highest number of votes.

Thus, the candidate receiving the next highest number of votes was held not to have been elected in State ex rel. Sheets v. Speidel, 62 Ohio St. 156, 56 N. E. 871, where the one receiving the highest number of votes died during the election. The court here said: "The claim of Cover that he has the right to be inducted into the office of sheriff of Clermont county has no foundation. Whether Buvinger, the deceased candidate, was elected or not, Cover was not elected. No process of valid reasoning can make 3,802 votes to be more than 4,369 votes. Not merely a plurality, but a majority, of all the votes cast for sheriff on that election day, were cast against Cover; and it does not avail him that the majority of votes was cast, in good faith, for a man who had died during the election. The majority was not for Cover, and that is all he can make of it. The election may fail altogether by reason of the death of the person receiving the largest number of votes turns. The prayer of the petition is that the defendants be ordered to declare the plaintiff duly elected at the general election of 1912, as a member of the board of supervisors of Carroll county for the term beginning January 1, 1914. Upon trial had, plaintiff's petition was dismissed, and he appeals.

Messrs. Lee & Robb and Charles C. Helmer, for appellant:

The death of a candidate before election day creates a vacancy in the ballot, which may be filled in the manner provided by the statute.

Iowa Code, §§ 1102, 1108; Code Supp. 1907, §§ 1087a-24.

The person receiving the highest number of votes should be declared elected.

Iowa Code, § 1170.

A dead man is not a "person" within the meaning of the statute.

State ex rel. Bancroft v. Frear, 144 Wis. 79, 140 Am. St. Rep. 992, 128 N. W. 1068; Morton v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 130 N. C. 299, 41 S. E. 484.

The natural and obvious signification of the word "person" in the statute is a living being. When a statute speaks of one who is dead, they speak of him as a "deceased person" or a "person deceased."

cast, or by reason of ineligibility of the successful candidate, or by reason of irregularities, but that could not elect a man who in fact has received a smaller number of votes than his opponent. We will not attempt to follow and discuss all the refinements of reasoning in which counsel indulge on this subject; but it is worthy of note that it is not made manifest to us that a single vote was cast after Buvinger's death. It is true that the argument is that the death of the candidate one hour and three quarters before the close of the election made a vacancy on the ticket, and that the case is one in which the law will not regard a fractional part of a day; and that if there was a vacancy on the ticket for part of the day, it was a vacancy for the whole day, and therefore that none of the 4,369 votes cast for Buvinger were cast for a living person. We have already answered that argument; but it may be added that if it is just reasoning that there was a vacancy on the ticket for the whole day, because there was a vacancy for one hour and three quarters, it is equally fair to maintain that there was no vacancy at all on the ticket, during that whole day, because there was no vacancy on the ticket during ten hours and one quarter of the day."

And in harmony with the preceding decision, it was held in Howes v. Perry, 92 Ky. 260, 36 Am. St. Rep. 591, 17 S. W. 575, where the candidate for clerk of court who received the greatest number of votes died during the election, that the only other Mandamus is the appropriate remedy to compel the board of supervisors, acting as canvassers of election returns, to declare elected and so certify the persons receiving the highest number of votes cast.

Bradfield v. Wart, 36 Iowa, 291.

Messrs. Reynolds & Meyers, E. A. Wissler, Douglas Rogers, and Brown McCrary, for appellees:

Mandamus can be maintained only when there is no other adequate remedy.

26 Cyc. 139.

The court has no authority by mandamus to compel the canvassing board to declare plaintiff elected to an office, when the law requires such officers to act upon the returns of the various precincts as made, and no other.

Code, §§ 1138, 1143, 1144, 1149; 14 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 145.

Plaintiff had the right to contest the election upon the grounds alleged in his petition, to wit (in any error of the board of canvassers in declaring the results). On another ground "any other cause which shows that another person was the person, elected."

opposing candidate was not entitled to the office.

A distinction has been recognized between cases where the death of the candidate was generally known to the voters at the time of voting, and those where the death was not known.

Thus, in State ex rel. Bancroft v. Frear, 144 Wis. 79, 140 Am. St. Rep. 992, 128 N. W. 1068, this distinction was adhered to, and where one whose name had been printed on the primary ballot as a candidate met a tragic death shortly before the election, and the fact was published in the newspapers of the state and disseminated by means of telegrams and party workers, and he received the highest number of votes, it was held that under the circumstances it might be assumed that the voters generally were informed of the candidate's death, and that the votes cast for him could not be counted, and that the one receiving the next highest number was entitled to have his name placed on the party ticket. The court said: "Elections are held for the purpose of selecting officers, not for the purpose of creating a vacancy to the end that the place may be filled by appointment or even by a new election. The function of the voter is to express an affirmative choice of some person; not to content himself with merely expressing his disapproval of certain candidates. If a vote for a man known by the voter to be dead can be counted, then a vote for a stick or a stone or for 'the man in the moon,' as is said

State ex rel. Cormie v. Ramsey, 27 S. D. 302, 130 N. W. 768.

The board of canvassers have no right to go behind the returns.

Jones v. Fisher, — Iowa, —, 137 N. W. 940; Furguson v. Henry, 95 Iowa, 439, 64 N. W. 292.

While mandamus will lie to compel the board of canvassers to discharge their ministerial duties in canvassing votes or returns, it will not lie where the right of the relator sought to be enforced is not clear.

26 Cyc. 275.

When it becomes necessary to go behind the returns and consider the questions touching the legality of the election, mandamus is not the proper remedy.

Hoy v. State, 168 Ind. 506, 81 N. E. 509, 11 Ann. Cas. 944.

Where electors vote for an ineligible candidate without knowledge of his disqualification, and such candidate receives a plurality of the votes cast, his disqualification does not result in electing the candidate receiving the next highest number of votes. In such a case the votes cast for the ineligible candidate must be counted, and there is a vacancy in the office instead of an election of the candidate receiving then a plurality of the votes.

Votes cast for a candidate with knowledge of his death should be counted against the other candidate.

State ex rel. Herget v. Walsh, 7 Mo. App. 142; Sheridan v. St. Louis, 183 Mo. 25, 81 S. W. 1082, 2 Ann. Cas. 480.

Though, at the time of trial, relator had a right to a certificate of election, his failure to qualify within the time prescribed by statute creates a vacancy, and in the English cases, should be counted. It is true that in this country the majority rules, but the majority should not pursue a policy of mere negation. If the majority should contumaciously persist in voting for candidates notoriously ineligible, it might not be possible to fill the office at all. The illustration may be somewhat far-fetched, but instances have occurred in England where an ineligible candidate for member of Parliament received a majority of the votes cast at election after election, and such occurrences are by no means impossible in this country. Besides, there can be no affirmative choice by the electors unless a new election is provided for and held. Either the Republican state central committee or the governor must select the new candidate, if there is a vacancy in the instant case. It may be that a single officer or a committee consisting of a couple of dozen members could make a selection that would be more acceptable to the majority in the present instance than would be the candidate for whom over 56,000 votes were cast, but conditions might easily change so that the contrary would be true."

And it was further held that a statute providing that "if the nominee die after the ballots are printed, and no nomination shall be made as herein provided, the votes cast for him shall be counted and returned, and if he shall receive a plurality, the vacancy shall be filled as in case of vacancies occurring by death after election," was not incorporated into the primary election law 51 L.R.A. (N.S.)

by § 25, providing that the statutes in force in relation to the holding of elections, the solicitation of voters at the polls, the challenging of votes, the manner of conducting elections, of counting the ballots and making return thereof, and all other kindred subjects, should apply to all primaries, in so far as they were consistent with the primary act, and it was therefore held that such statute did not affect the holding that the votes cast for the deceased candidate should not be counted for any purpose. Ibid.

But in State ex rel. Herget v. Walsh, 7 Mo. App. 142, it was held that the fact that the death a few hours before the opening of the polls, of the candidate who received the highest number of votes, and knowledge thereof by the voters and judges of the election, did not prevent the votes cast for him being counted against the candidate having the next highest number of votes; and see the quotation from this case in PATTEN v. HASELTON.

It was held in State ex rel. Bancroft v. Frear, supra, that a dead man was not a "person" within the meaning of a statute providing that "the person receiving the greatest number of votes at a primary as the candidate of a party for an office shall be the candidate of that party, and his name as such candidate shall be placed on the official ballot at the following election," the court remarking that the word "person," as it is ordinarily used, means a living human being.

he would have no further interest in this action, and it therefore becomes a moot question, and plaintiff's appeal should be dismissed.

Evans, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Some controversy is presented over questions of practice. The defendants challenge the right of the plaintiff to try the question presented in an action of mandamus. In view of our conclusions on other features of the case, we shall have no occasion to pass upon this question. Also the appellant contends that the case is triable here de novo, on appeal, whereas the defendants contend that it is triable on errors only.

We find ourselves in accord with the trial court in the finding of facts. It is therefore immaterial, for the purpose of this appeal, whether it be deemed triable de novo or otherwise.

The material facts are undisputed. The plaintiff was the regular Republican candidate upon the ballot in the general election of 1912 in Carroll county, for the office of county supervisor, for the term to begin January 1, 1914. One Shirck was the regular Democratic candidate upon the ballot for the same office. At 8:30 o'clock of the night preceding the election day, Shirck died. The election proceeded on the following day without any change in the official ballot, and without any attempt at filling the vacancy on the part of the party officials, and without knowledge on the part of the voters generally that the death of the candidate had occurred. Upon a canvass of the election returns, by the canvassing board, it was found that more than 1,800 votes had been cast for Shirck, and that about 1,100 were cast for the plaintiff. No other candidate received an equal number with the plaintiff. It will be noted, therefore, that the highest number of votes cast, were cast for the deceased candidate, and the next highest number were cast for the plaintiff. It is the contention of plaintiff that the death of Shirck prevented his election, even though a majority of the votes were cast for him, and that the plaintiff therefore was the person who received the greatest number of votes. The argument is that the death of Shirck before the day of election created a vacancy upon the Democratic ticket, and that the statute points out the method by which such vacancy should have been filled, and that the failure of the party officials to adopt such method left the Democratic ticket without a candidate, and rendered nugatory all votes which purported to be cast for the dead candidate. The following sections of the Code are involved:

Section 1087 a—24 (Code Supp. 1907): "Vacancies occurring after the holding of any primary election occasioned by death, withdrawal or change of residence of any candidate, or from any other cause, shall be filled by the party committee for the county, district, or state, as the case may be, representing the party in which the vacancy nomination occurs."

Section 1102: "If a candidate declines a nomination, or dies before election day, or should any certificate of nomination or nomination paper be held insufficient or inoperative by the officer with whom it may be filed, or in case any objection made to any certificate of nomination, nomination paper, or to the eligibility of any candidate therein named, is sustained by the board appointed to determine such questions as hereinafter provided, the vacancy or vacancies thus occasioned may be filled by the convention, caucus, meeting or primary, or other persons making the original nominations, or in such a manner as such convention, caucus, meeting or primary has previously provided. If the time is insufficient for again holding such convention, caucus, meeting or primary, or in case no such previous provisions being made, such vacancy shall be filled by the regularly elected or appointed executive or central committee of the particular division or district representing the political party or persons holding such convention, primary, meeting or caucus, and certified as hereinbefore provided. The certificates of nominations made to supply such vacancies shall state, in addition to the facts hereinbefore required, the name of the original nominee, the date of his death or declination of nomination, or the fact that the former nomination has been held insufficient or inoperative, and the measures taken in accordance with the above requirements for filling a vacancy, and shall be signed and sworn to by the presiding officer and secretary of the convention, caucus, meeting or primary, or by the chairman and secretary of the committee, as the case may be."

Section 1108: "The name supplied for a vacancy by the certificate of the secretary of state, or by nomination certificates or papers for a vacancy filed with the county auditor, or city or town clerk, shall, if the ballots are not already printed, be placed on the ballots in place of the name of the original nominee, or, if the ballots have been printed, new ballots, whenever practicable, shall be furnished. Whenever it may not be practicable to have new ballots printed, the election officers having charge of them shall place the name supplied for the vacancy upon each ballot used before delivering it to the judges of election. If said ballots have already been delivered to the judges of election, said auditor or clerk shall immediately furnish the name of such substituted nominee to all judges of election within the territory in which said nominee may be a candidate, and such election officer having charge of the ballots shall place the name supplied for the vacancy upon each ballot issued before delivering it to the voter, by affixing a paster, or by writing or stamping the name thereon."

Section 1170: "All canvassers of returns shall be public, and the persons having the greatest number of votes shall be declared elected."

It is argued that a dead man is not a "person," within the meaning of § 1170. As a legal proposition, this may be conceded; but it does not become decisive of the case. It can properly be said that, because of his death, Shirck was not a "person having the greatest number of votes." This was the holding in State ex rel. Bancroft v. Frear, 144 Wis. 79, 140 Am. St. Rep. 992, 128 N. W. 1068, which is relied on by appellant. It can also be properly said that, because Shirck was not a "person" within the meaning of § 1170, the canvassing board could not declare him elected. On the other hand, though plaintiff was a "person" within the meaning of this section, yet, in an important sense, he did not have the "greatest number" of votes. It is quite clear to us that the case cannot be determined upon the mere terms of this section, because the contingency now confronting us was not within the contemplation of such section.

Turning to the sections above quoted relating to the filling of vacancies upon a ballot, it would be uncandid to hold, upon the facts appearing in this record, that it was a practical possibility for the party officials to have filled the vacancy in time for the opening of the polls. With one or two exceptions, none of these officials knew of the death until the following day and after the voting had begun. The precise question presented to us therefore is: Where a regular candidate dies only a few hours before election day, so that the time intervening between such death and the opening of the polls is so brief that fair compliance with the provisions of the statute for filling vacancies is impossible, and where the name of such dead candidate appears upon the official ballot at the time of the voting, and where the fact of his death is not generally known to the voters, and where a majority of the voters vote for him as a purported candidate, will the candidate having the next highest number of votes be entitled, as a matter of law, to claim his own election? This precise question is involved in some doubt. It has not frequently arisen, and the authorities are very few. Analogous questions, however, have arisen quite frequently, and the authorities thereon may be looked to for some light hereon.

It has not infrequently happened that ineligible candidates have been voted for by a majority of the voters. Though the candidate thus voted for by a majority cannot be declared elected because of his ineligibility, and the majority vote is thereby rendered ineffective for such purpose, yet it is quite uniformly held that such majority vote is effective to forbid the election of the candidate having the next highest number of votes. The effect of such majority vote is to render the purported election nugatory, and to leave a vacancy in the office thus attempted to be filled. State ex rel. Sheets v. Speidel, 62 Ohio St. 156, 56 N. E. 871; State ex rel. Dunning v. Giles, 2 Pinney (Wis.) 166, 52 Am. Dec. 149; State ex rel. Holden v. Tierney, 23 Wis. 430; Barnum v. Gilman, 27 Minn. 466, 38 Am. Rep. 304, 8 N. W. 375; People ex rel. Crawford v. Molitor, 23 Mich. 341; State ex rel. Goodell v. McGeary, 69 Vt. 461, 44 L.R.A. 446, 38 Atl. 165; People ex rel. Furman v. Clute, 50 N. Y. 451, 10 Am. Rep. 508; State ex rel. Bancroft v. Frear, 144 Wis. 79, 140 Am. St. Rep. 992, 128 N. W. 1068; State ex rel. Clawson v. Bell, 169 Ind. 61, 13 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1013, 124 Am. St. Rep. 203, 82 N. E. 69.

Some authorities make a distinction as between cases where the ineligibility of the candidate was generally known to the voters at the time of the voting, and those cases where such ineligibility was not known. We have no occasion to deal with that distinction in the present case.

In cases where the candidate died upon election day, the authorities also seem to be uniform. If, in such a case, the majority or plurality of the voters vote for the dead candidate, such candidate cannot thereby be deemed elected. But such casting of the majority or plurality vote is nevertheless effective to prevent the election of the candidate having the next highest number of votes. State ex rel. Sheets v. Speidel, 62 Ohio St. 156, 56 N. E. 871; Howes v. Perry, 92 Ky. 260, 36 Am. St. Rep. 591, 17 S. W. 575. No case is brought to our attention holding otherwise on this question, and appellant concedes such rule as here stated. The general reason underlying the foregoing decisions is that, though the vote of the majority cannot be given effect to the extent of electing an ineligible or dead candidate, because such election is legally impossible, yet that such majority vote is effective as an expression of the will of the voters, such will being thwarted by the unforeseen contingency, and that it is sufficient to negative a claim of election as against the minority candidate. The rule is a logical and reasonable one, at least where the voters are in ignorance of the disability. Under our present statutes, the voter receives the official printed ballot at the hands of public officials. He has a right to presume that the purported candidates are eligible and living. If the fact be otherwise, it presents a case analogous to fraud, accident, or mistake in civil transactions, and furnishes quite as persuasive a reason why the attempted election of a candidate in such a case should be deemed a nullity. We see no logical reason why the same rule should not be held fairly applicable to such a case as the one before us. It tends to the protection of majority rule, which is one of the fundamentals of our form of government. The appellant relies at this point upon State ex rel. Bancroft v. Frear, 144 Wis. 79, 140 Am. St. Rep. 992, 128 N. W. 1068. In that case the validity of a nomination at a primary election was involved. The purported candidate, who received a majority of the votes, had died several days before the election was held. The fact of his death was universally known. The statutes of that state provided for the manner of filling the vacancy upon the primary ballot. No attempt was made to comply with these statutes. It was held that, under the provisions of the Wisconsin statutes, the candidate having the next highest number of votes was entitled to the nomination. We think the case is not sufficiently in point as to its decisive features to warrant us in deeming it as an authority to be followed in the case at bar. The conclusion reached therein was based upon the expressed terms of the Wisconsin statute, and upon the further fact that such statutes were knowingly ignored by the party officials, and that the votes were cast with knowledge of the voters that the purported candidate was not living. We have no occasion, therefore, to agree or disagree with its reasoning or its conclusions. The closeness of the question presented in that case is indicated by the fact that the decision was by a divided court, 51 L.R.A. (N.S.)

four to three. If in the case at bar it appeared that the fact of Shirck's death was generally known to the voters, and especially if it appeared that there had been sufficient time since the death to comply with the statutory provisions as to filling vacancies in such cases, a materially different question might be presented. For our present purposes, we give that phase of the question no consideration, and therefore reach no conclusion thereon.

The conclusion which seems to us the rational one in the case at bar has definite support in State ex rel. Herget v. Walsh, 7 Mo. App. 142; Howes v. Perry, supra. The following excerpts from State v. Walsh will indicate the general nature of the holding: "Yet, unless we depart from the principle upon which the only sound rule rests, we must hold that the ballots upon which was the name of Mr. Miltenberger are properly counted, not for himself, for he was not in existence, but against his opponent, so far as to render a new election necessary. The relator had no plurality of votes. The will of the electors was declared against him. He is not 'the person having the highest number of votes,' to whom the certificate must, under the statute, be given; for these words imply that the successful candidate shall be the choice of the majority of voters who vote. Thus, the case contemplated by the statute is not met. Through the death of one of the candidates immediately before the polls are open, an exigency arises not contemplated by the law, and the obvious consequence is a new election. It is not the accidental death of his opponent, but the votes of electors, which should give the certificate to a candidate. If it is true that a majority vote operates only to elect, and, failing of that, goes for nothing, then the most innocent mistake of fact on the part of the majority—as, the age of a person voted for—might avail to elect a candidate who had received only a few scattering votes. It is said, on the other hand, that, if the American doctrine is correct, votes cast for a fictitious person avail to defeat an eligible candidate; that, if the voters choose to stay away, or, what is the same, throw away their votes, those votes should not be counted as against valid votes. The force of this argument lies in the assumption of an intent to throw away the vote. If the voter can make his vote effective only by voting in a certain way, and if the result of his voting in this way is to secure a new election, at which the majority can elect, how can it be assumed that the voter intended to throw away his vote? If the death of a candidate of a political party takes place, as here, immediately before the election, there is no time for organization or for preparing new ballots. Not only do our laws recognize primary organization, and minutely describe what ballots shall be legal, but the modes of selecting candidates for political offices are parts of the customs of the country. If the sudden death of a candidate renders the votes of electors ineffective for some purpose, it is not therefore to deprive the voter of his vote. The majority are not obliged to fold their hands, nor are the minority entitled, because of the death, to prevail over the majority. Yet this would be the result if the majority vote is not to be counted against the minority candidate. But the majority of voters, so far from desiring or intending to throw their votes away, wish to use them to their utmost effect; and it is only by a fiction, raised, if at all, by the law, that the majority in such cases throw their votes away. This presumption of an intent on the part of the voter that his vote should not, for any purpose, be effectual, any more than if it were blank paper, is, indeed, to a great extent, a fiction of the English courts, and political considerations have probably contributed to produce it."

Without fully committing ourselves to the reasoning above quoted, we are in accord with the conclusion reached, so far as applicable to the fact in the case at bar. The cited case was later followed by the same court in Sheridan v. St. Louis, 183 Mo. 25, 81 S. W. 1082, 2 Ann. Cas. 480.

Our citation of the foregoing Missouri cases is made with the reservation already indicated, viz.: These cases treat the question of knowledge by the voters of the death or ineligibility of the candidate as not material. On this phase of the question we withhold opinion.

What we hold herein is that, where the death of a candidate before the day of election is so recent as to render it practically impossible to properly fill the vacancy, and where a plurality of the votes are cast for the deceased candidate without knowledge on the part of the voters generally that he is deceased, the plurality vote thus cast will be effective to prevent the election of another candidate for the same office having a lesser number of votes. The appellant herein was therefore not entitled to claim election, and his petition was properly dismissed.

Such order of the District Court is therefore affirmed.

KENTUCKY COURT OF APPEALS.

SECURITY TRUST COMPANY, Trustee of Mrs. Annie B. Barclay, et al., Appts.,
v.

COMMONWEALTH OF KENTUCKY et al.

Succession tax — proceeding to determine liability.

1. Where, under the inheritance tax law, the duty of collecting such tax is imposed upon all administrators, executors, and trustees, and the sheriff of each county, a trustee or administrator cannot relieve himself from liability for the tax by stating a case in general terms, and calling upon the sheriff to show affirmatively why the commonwealth is entitled to the tax.

Same — property liable — conveyance to trustee.

2. Personal property which has been conveyed to a trust company under a contract by which it undertook to manage and control it during the owner's lifetime, paying her the net income therefrom, and at her death to distribute it among her heirs at law under the statute of descent and distribution then in force in the state, comes to the heirs of such owner by the inheritance laws, and is therefore subject to the inheritance tax, although the owner was a non-resident.

APPEAL by plaintiff and certain defendants from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Fayette County in favor of the Commonwealth in an action for the settlement of the estate of Annie B. Barclay, deceased. Affirmed. The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Hunt, Bullock, & Hunt and S. M. Wilson, for appellants:

Appellants are not liable for inheritance taxes on amounts paid to them under the deed of trust.

1 Cooley, Taxn. 3d ed. p. 452.

An inheritance tax is a special and peculiar burden imposed not upon property, but upon the right of succession to property, and should be construed strictly, and where any doubt exists as to the meaning of the law, or as to the applicability of the law to a particular case, such doubts should

Mr. D. Gray Falconer for appellees.

Nunn, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In September, 1911, the Security Trust Company of Lexington entered into a written contract with Mrs. Annie D. Barclay, who, according to the contract, was a resident of Chicago, Illinois. By the contract the trust company agreed to act as trustee for Mrs. Barclay, and as such trustee acknowledged that it had possession of her entire estate, and undertook to manage and control the same during her lifetime. Until her death it would pay her the net income therefrom, and upon her death it would distribute the same "among the heirs at law of the party of the first part [Mrs. Barclay], under the statute of descent and distribution then in force in Kentucky," or, in the event she left a will, same to be paid the beneficiaries named in the will, and which will "may be probated as such by the courts of the commonwealth of Kentucky."

Mrs. Barclay died intestate about a year later, and left an estate of about $28,000, consisting of personalty only. The question presented here is to the application of inheritance tax law provided in article 19 of the Kentucky Statutes (§§ 4281a-4281s). Her only heirs at law are the appellants, who are brothers and sisters, and some children who are descendants of two deceased sisters. It is conceded that this class of kindred do not come within the exceptions provided in the inheritance tax law, and, if the estate is taxable, then such taxes should be deducted from the estate before distribution.

The trustee brought this action in equity for a settlement of the estate. The only excuse for it, and in fact its avowed purpose, is to have the lower court guide and direct it in the payment of inheritance taxes, and to that end it makes the sheriff of Fayette county a party defendant, and asks that he be required to assert any claim which the commonwealth may have against the estate for inheritance taxes. The heirs at law, including appellants, are also made parties defendant. The petition states that Mrs. Barclay died in Kentucky, that it has in possession all of her estate, and the clear inference is that all of it is in Kentucky. It is true the trust company "states that said estate in its hands is not liable for any inheritance taxes to the commonwealth of Kentucky, as it is advised." This is simply a conclusion of the pleader. Subsequently, the trust company qualified as administrator of the estate, and in that capacity made itself a party to the action, praying for the advice of the court upon the same matter suggested in the original petition.

Under the state of facts presented by the record, it is immaterial where Mrs. Barclay resided or was domiciled at the time of her death. The actual situs of her property was in Kentucky, and that fact governs the application of the inheritance tax law. Section 4281a of the Kentucky Statutes provides: "All property which shall pass, by will or by the intestate laws of this state, from any person who may die seized or possessed of the same while a resident of this state, or if such decedent was not a resident of this state at the time of death, which property, or any part thereof, shall be within this state, . . . shall be, and is, subject to a tax," etc.

Under the inheritance tax law all administrators, executors, trustees, and the sheriff are made servants of the commonwealth, and the duty is especially imposed upon them of collecting taxes due upon inheritances. There is no right or authority in either one to shift this duty upon the other. The trustee has no right to state a case in general terms, and call upon the sheriff to show affirmatively why the commonwealth is entitled to the taxes. If the sheriff by lax pleading, or no pleading at all, should fail in the performance of his duty, the trustee or administrator could not be excused of liability for the taxes if, by an incomplete statement of the facts, it secured direction from the court to distribute the estate among the heirs. However, the appellants, heirs at law, are in no position to complain of the faulty pleadings of either the sheriff or trustee. These appellants were parties from the beginning, and they never filed any answer or pleading of any sort, and never asserted any claim for relief or exemption from the inheritance taxes.

It is insisted that this property does not come to the appellants by the inheritance laws, or by any deed, grant, sale, or gift made in contemplation of the death of the grantor. It comes to them by the deed above referred to, upon the death of the grantor. If they are not entitled to it by the laws of descent and distribution of this state, then they are not entitled to it at all, for by the very terms of the deed the trust company, upon the death of Mrs. Barclay, is to distribute it, and to only those who are her heirs at law "under the statute of descent and distribution then in force in Kentucky."

In our opinion, the lower court properly charged this estate with inheritance taxes, and its judgment is therefore affirmed.

Petition for rehearing denied.

MICHIGAN SUPREME COURT.

LAKE FARM

v.

DISTRICT BOARD OF SCHOOL DISTRICT NO. 2, TOWNSHIP OF KALAMAZOO, Plff. in Certiorari.

(— Mich. —, 146 N. W. 115.)

School — right of children in institution.

Children of nonresident parents who are committed to a charitable institution within the limits of a school district, which has

Note. — What constitutes residence entitling child to the privileges of public schools.

This note supplements notes on the subject to Sherlock v. Stuart, 26 L.R.A. 581, and Stanford Graded Common School Dist. v. Powell, 36 L.R.A. (N.S.) 341.

In LAKE FARM v. DISTRICT BOARD the holding of the court that neglected boys committed to a private corporation for support, care, and education, which was untaxed because a charitable institution, were not entitled to free admission to public schools of the district in which the corporation was located, was in part based upon the fact that the institution to which these boys were committed did not pay any school tax in the district.

In Black v. Graham, 238 Pa. 381, 44 L.R.A. (N.S.) 693, 86 Atl. 266, under a somewhat similar state of facts, except that dependent and incorrigible children were committed to the care of different persons who were residents of a school district, and who were compensated either by the county or by other persons legally responsible for the support of the particular child, the conclusion was also reached that such children were not legally residents of the school district of the persons with whom they lived, within the meaning of the statute, but were residents of the school districts of their respective parents or guardians, or of the persons sustaining parental relation to them at the time the juvenile court took charge of them. The court said that these children were not in any sense members of the family to which they were committed; that the relation established by order of the juvenile court and the contract made thereunder was really penal in its nature, and was not permanent.

In State ex rel. Halbert v. Clymer, 164 Mo. App. 671, 147 S. W. 1119, a boy was held, to all intents and purposes, a resident of the school district of his grandfather, with whom he lived as a member of the 51 L.R.A. (N.S.)

undertaken to furnish them with support and education, are not entitled to the benefits of a statute providing that all persons of certain age, residents of any school district, shall have equal right to attend any school therein.

(March 26, 1914.)

CERTIORARI to the Circuit Court for Kalamazoo County to review a judgment granting a writ of mandamus to compel respondents to allow certain boys, inmates of the plaintiff institution, to attend school in their district. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Lynn B. Mason, for plaintiff in certiorari:

Children of school age, to entitle them to free admission to the public schools, must be bona fide residents of the district in family under an agreement made with his father, who resided in another district, by which the grandfather agreed to care for and educate him, where the contract was not made for the sole purpose of permitting the boy to attend the public school located in the district of the grandparent's residence, there being no claim that the contract was not made in good faith, or that it was not being strictly performed by the parties thereto. And hence the boy was held entitled to enjoy the public school facilities of the district of the grandfather's residence without payment of tuition. The court said that the policy of the state "is to educate and furnish free of charge good schools for all children of school age, and even to compel the attendance of children thereto." And the court quotes approvingly from State ex rel. School Dist. v. Thayer, 74 Wis. 48, 41 N. W. 1014, to the effect that, "to secure these ends, laws relating to public schools must be interpreted to accord with this dominant controlling spirit and purpose in their enactment, rather than in the narrower spirit of their possible relations to question of pauperism and administration of estates."

In Board of Education v. Crill, 149 App. Div. 407, 134 N. Y. Supp. 311, reversing the same case as reported in 73 Misc. 472, 133 N. Y. Supp. 394, which is referred to in the note to Stanford Graded Common School Dist. v. Powell, 36 L.R.A. (N.S.) 343, it is held that where the parents of children lived in the country and this country place constituted the father's permanent place of residence, and was his domicile, and he was assessed there as a resident taxpayer, and he registered and voted there after he moved to another district, and was elected to the office of supervisor, and qualified and acted as such while he was living in the other district, the children were not entitled to the public school facilities of the latter district without the parent paying tuition therefor. A. G. S.

which they seek to attend school, and mere sleeping, eating, and physical presence in the district, of themselves, and independent of the conditions, circumstances, and purposes of their presence there, are not sufficient to constitute a "residence" for common school purposes.

Kuhn, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The relator is a private corporation organized under the laws of this state. Its purposes, as expressed in article 2 of its articles of association, are the "support, care, and education of homeless and needy boys, and the promotion of their moral and material needs." It is maintained solely by private subscriptions and donations, and its principal office and place of business is in the city of Kalamazoo. For the purposes as above stated it maintains a farm in the 51 L.R.A. (N.S.)

township of Kalamazoo, a part of which, including the building in which the boys are kept, is situated within the boundaries of school district No. 2 of the township of Kalamazoo, the respondent herein. Being a charitable and benevolent institution within the meaning of § 9, subdiv. 1, act No. 309, of the Public Acts of 1909, and § 7, subdiv. 4, act No. 174, of the Public Acts of 1911, its property is exempt from taxation for any purpose, and is not assessed nor taxed for any purpose whatsoever. It further appears that some fourteen boys were being kept and cared for on this farm. Among them were Claude Diamond and Frederick Millen, both of the age of fourteen years. Claude Diamond, in April, 1909, being found to be a neglected child, was committed to Lake Farm by an order of the juvenile division of the probate court of Kalamazoo county, and prior to that time he had lived with his mother and stepfather in the city of Kalamazoo. Frederick Millen was likewise committed to Lake Farm in July, 1910, by said probate court, and both of his parents also resided in the city of Kalamazoo. None of the parents of these two boys were residents of school district No. 2, the respondent. Neither of the boys had ever attended the school in this district, and during a part of the school year of 1912 they attended the public schools in the city of Kalamazoo, and during the remainder of the school year had a private tutor provided for them at Lake Farm. At the beginning of the present school year, the two boys were sent to the school maintained in district No. 2, to enroll and attend. The district board, having theretofore duly determined not to receive nonresident pupils into its school, refused admission to the boys. Relator applied to the circuit court of Kalamazoo county for a writ of mandamus, and the order granting this writ is brought here by certiorari for review.

Section 4683, Comp. Laws 1897, provides as follows: "All persons residents of any school district, and five years of age, shall have an equal right to attend any school therein; and no separate school or department shall be kept for any persons on account of race or color: Provided, that this shall not be construed to prevent the grading of schools according to the intellectual progress of the pupil, to be taught in separate places as may be deemed expedient."

The sole question here involved is whether or not the inmates of an institution chartered for the support, care, and education of homeless and needy children, by their presence in such an institution for the purposes of education and maintenance, shall become entitled to free admission to the schools of the district in which it is located, the same as resident children. The circuit judge held that, as the Lake Farm stood in loco parentis to the boys, they were entitled to admission, because to deny them that right would not be in accord with the liberal educational policy of the state, and would be contrary to public policy. This conclusion must necessarily be based upon the proposition that, as the institution was in loco parentis to the children, mere physical presence is all that is necessary to constitute a residence, within the meaning of the language of the statute. We are of the opinion, however, that in construing this language some consideration must be had of the occasion and purposes of such presence. The parents of these children were not residents of the district, and the children were brought to the farm for the very purpose of giving them proper support and education, which the institution under its charter had agreed to do. Can it be said that, after having assumed this obligation, the institution can shift this responsibility and undertaking to the school district, and oblige the school district to do what it has undertaken to do? If it can send two of its boys to the district school for free tuition, it can with equal right increase the number, being limited only by the extent of its facilities to accommodate them on the farm. The injustice and unfairness of thus forcing onto a school district the education of the inmates of such an institution can readily be seen. It might easily result in the denial to the children actually residing in the district, and whose parents sustain the school, of the facilities they would otherwise have therein. This state has from its beginning maintained a liberal educational policy, and it is one of the glories of its people that free education has always been provided for children. The purposes of this institution are indeed laudable and should be encouraged; but if it finds that it cannot fulfil its undertaking, it should decline to receive more than it can properly support and teach in conformity with its charter, and not attempt to place additional burdens upon others who are under responsibility to provide school facilities for the children who are legally dependent upon them. While we have been unable to find that this question has been raised in this state, our attention has been called to two Pennsylvania cases in which the facts were very similar to the case under consideration. See Com. ex rel. Fry v. Upper Swatara Twp. School Dist. 164 Pa. 603, 26 L.R.A. 581, 30 Atl. 507; Com. ex rel. Parris v. Brookville School Dist. (Com. ex rel. Parris v. Balmer) 164 Pa. 607, 26 L.R.A. 584, 51 L.R.A. (N.S.)

30 Atl. 509; also State ex rel. Orphan Asylum v. School Dist. 10 Ohio St. 448.

The principal case relied upon by appellee is State ex rel. School Dist. v. Thayer, 74 Wis. 48, 41 N. W. 1014. In that case the question was the relationship between the child and the person in whose family it was living. The child had a mother residing in another part of the state, and the school district attempted to apply the doctrine that its legal residence followed that of its mother. We do not decide in this case that if these boys become bona fide members of a family who resided in the school district, and who were in the position of loco parentis to them, that would not give them a residence so as to entitle them to school privileges. What we do decide is that non-residents of a district do not acquire a residence therein for school purposes by becoming inmates of an institution whose purpose, as expressed in its charter, is the support and education of children, and which does not contribute to the support of the schools in that district.

The writ of mandamus should not have issued. The order and judgment of the Circuit Court is reversed, and the petition of relator for the writ of mandamus is dismissed.

(October 27, 1911.)

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the District Court for Hennepin County refusing to award to it as damages the necessary expense of building a bridge to carry its tracks over a canal, the right of way for which was sought to be acquired under the power of eminent domain. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. F. W. Root for appellant.

Mr. C. J. Rockwood, for respondent:

Where a railroad intersects a land highway, without regard to priority in time of establishment, the duty rests upon it to do whatever is necessary to make the crossing reasonably convenient and safe to the public, including the separation of grades and the erection of bridges when necessary.

it could not make a difference in the constitutional rights of the railway company that the way was not constructed entirely or chiefly of solid earth; that it was the fact, and not the mode, of public passage, that was controlling.

As to the power to compel a railroad to establish or maintain at its own expense overhead or underground crossing, as affected by the fact that the street or highway is opened subsequently to the construction of the railroad, see note to State ex rel. Mr. Daniel Fish also for respondent.

Simpson, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an appeal from a judgment of the district court of the county of Hennepin in a controversy submitted on an agreed statement of facts, pursuant to § 4286, Rev. Laws, 1905. The stated facts are substantially as follows:

Within the corporate limits of the city of Minneapolis, the respondent herein, are three meandered lakes,—Lake Calhoun, having an area of 460 acres; Lake of the Isles, having an area of 107 acres; and Cedar lake, having an area of 150 acres. Each of these lakes is adapted for use by the public for pleasure boating, ice boating, skating, the railway company without denying the due process of law guaranteed by the Federal Constitution, which requires that compensation be made when private property is taken for public use.

For the analogous question as to the necessity of making compensation, and measure thereof, upon laying out a street across railway, see note to New York, C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Rhodes, 24 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1225.

As to power to lay out streets or highways across railway property or rights of way, see note to Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Louisville, 24 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1213.

The duty of a railroad company to construct bridges at its own expense over public drainage districts is treated in the note to Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Appanoose County, 31 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1118.

For canal as navigable water, see note to State ex rel. Lyon v. Columbia Water Power Co. 22 L.R.A.(N.S.) 435. G. H. P.

and other like uses, and is actually used by the public for such purposes. The city of Minneapolis has acquired, for park and parkway purposes, all the lands constituting the shores of Lake Calhoun and Lake of the Isles, as well as a portion of the shores of Cedar lake, also large tracts of land located near to said lakes, and such lands are used for park and parkway purposes. The city of Minneapolis has determined to construct, and is now constructing, two canals for public use, one connecting Cedar lake with the Lake of the Isles, and one connecting the Lake of the Isles with Lake Calhoun. The construction of such canals will greatly enhance the usefulness of said lakes to the public for pleasure boating, ice boating, skating, and like purposes. Lake Calhoun and Lake of the Isles are separated by a narrow strip of land of varying width, at its narrowest point some 600 feet wide. The natural surface of this strip of land where the canal is being constructed is about 2 feet above the level at which the waters are maintained in Lake of the Isles and Lake Calhoun. There is between these two lakes a small natural water course in which water flows from Lake of the Isles to Lake Calhoun.

The appellant railway company is the owner of a right of way, a strip of land 100 feet in width, extending lengthwise along and near the center of the land between Lake Calhoun and Lake of the Isles. Along this right of way the appellant, long before any steps were taken by the respondent city to construct the proposed improvement, had constructed an embankment which, at the point where the canal will intersect it, is about 16 feet in height above the surface of the ground, and about 18 feet in height above the established surface level of the water in the lakes and in the proposed canal. Upon the surface of this embankment the company laid its rails, and has operated and still operates a commercial railway over and along its said right of way.

To enable it to construct the proposed improvement, consisting of a waterway or canal, with walks upon either side thereof, the city seeks to condemn and take an easement in a strip of land 100 feet wide, extending across the right of way of the appellant. The taking of this land is for a public purpose, and the city's right to so acquire this strip is conceded by the appellant railway company for the purposes of this appeal. The location of the proposed canal at the point where it crosses the railway tracks is immediately west of the natural water course between Lake Calhoun and Lake of the Isles; the center line of the proposed canal being 59 feet west of the point where the waters flowing in such natural course are carried through the embankment of the railway company in a pipe about 3 feet in diameter. The canal, when constructed, will take the place of, and permit the closing of, this natural channel.

The construction and maintenance of the waterway and walks through the embankment of the railway company will necessitate the construction of a bridge to carry the railway tracks over the same. The agreed value of the strip of land 100 feet wide taken from the appellant for the public way is $10, and the cost of the construction of an adequate bridge over the canal and walks is $15,969. To such cost of the bridge is added, for purely ornamental features contained in the plans adopted by the parties hereto, the sum of $2,544. This added cost for ornamental features is assumed by the city. By further agreement of the parties, the city is authorized to take the land involved and construct the proposed improvement. The railway company is to construct the bridge as planned, waiving no claim, however, for damages or compensation to which it is entitled under the law by virtue of such taking as in condemnation proceedings, and the city is obligated to pay all such damages and compensation. Upon trial of the matters so submitted, the court, upon the admitted facts, assessed the appellant's compensation for the taking and damaging of its property for the construction and operation of the public way in the sum of $2,554, being $10, the value of the land taken, and $2,544, the cost of the ornamental features of the bridge, and disallowed the railway company's claim for the cost of constructing an adequate bridge.

By its appeal the railway company presents for consideration and decision the question whether it is entitled to have included, in the assessment of its damages for the taking and injuring of its property for a public use, the cost of constructing a sufficient bridge made necessary by such use. The contention of the appellant is that the taking of its property for this public use, without making compensation, including not only the value of the land taken, but as well the resulting expense of the construction and maintenance of a bridge, will be a taking, destruction, and damaging of private property for public use without just compensation, in violation of § 13, art. 1, Const. (Minn.), and will constitute as well a violation of the 14th Amendment to the Constitution of the United States. This contention is based on the claim that the bridge is made necessary solely through the exercise of the right of eminent domain by the city, and that—because no question of safety of the crossing of the railway tracks and the public way is involved—the railway company cannot be required, by an exercise of the police power, to bear the uncompensated burden of building the bridge.

In considering the question thus presented, there is no difficulty in determining the nature of the way here involved, established by the city between the lakes and between the surrounding parks and parkways. Such nature clearly appears from the stated facts. Lake Calhoun and Lake of the Isles are public navigable waters, and the proposed waterway connecting them will, when established, be a public navigable waterway. Such connecting waterway will enhance the usefulness of the lakes in affording opportunity to the public for recreation and pleasure. Such waterway will thereby directly tend to promote the health, happiness, and welfare of the public. When this waterway is established, the fact that it is artificial does not distinguish it, as to the law applicable thereto, from a natural water course. Nor does it differ in nature and applicable rules from a landway. The landway, like this waterway, is artificial, laid out and established to meet the public need and promote the general welfare.

The proposed way has on each side walks, and the bridge in question in part is necessary to permit the establishment and use of these walks crossing under the tracks. By the concession of the right of the city to condemn the railway's property for this use, the reasonable necessity and convenience to the public of these footways, as well as of the waterway, are admitted for the purpose of this appeal.

Nor does the fact that the waterway and walks will be used in connection with the lakes and parkway for pleasure and recreation distinguish, as to the legal principles applicable, this way from a road or canal devoted to the movement of goods or other commercial purposes. The desirability of conserving, extending, and maintaining reasonable opportunities for wholesome public recreation is continually gaining in general recognition, because such opportunities and the use thereof concededly tend to promote the general health and welfare of the people. This court has said, speaking of inland lakes: "We are satisfied that, so long as these lakes are capable of use for boating, even for pleasure, they are navigable, within the reason and spirit of the common-law rule." Lamprey v. State, 52 Minn. 181, 18 L.R.A. 670, 38 Am. St. Rep. 541, 53 N. W. 1139. The same view is expressed by another court in the state—ment: "Its navigability for pleasure is as sacred in the eye of the law as its navigability for any other purpose." Grand Rapids v. Powers, 89 Mich. 94, 14 L.R.A. 498, 28 Am. St. Rep. 276, 50 N. W. 661.

The way sought to be established,—a canal or waterway, with walks along each side,—being clearly a public way, subject to the rules governing public ways, we are concerned with the nature of the property rights and duties of the railway company involved in crossings of railroads and public ways. The general principle applicable to such crossings has been determined and announced in this state and applied to one kind of crossing. The same general principle has been applied in other jurisdictions to other crossings, until the law relating to establishing and maintaining public ways and improvements across railway tracks, including the incidental questions of the resulting duty of the railway company and just compensation for its property taken or injured, seems clearly settled. The general rule so established is that, where the safety, convenience, or welfare of the public requires that a railway company carry its tracks over a public way, or the public way over its tracks, by a bridge, the uncompensated duty of providing such bridge devolves upon the railway company. The basis of this rule is the superior nature of the public right inherent in the reserved or police power of the state. A railroad, though constructed first in time, is constructed subject to the implied right of the state to lay out and open new highways crossing its right of way. If the operation of the railway upon a particular surface or with a particular form of support for its tracks interferes with the public safety, convenience, or welfare in the exercise of the public right to the use of such highway, then upon the railway company is placed the burden of making such necessary and reasonable readjustment of its tracks as will permit the exercise of the superior public right. In State ex rel. Minneapolis v. St. Paul, M. & M. R. Co. 98 Minn. 380, 28 L.R.A. (N.S.) 298, 120 Am. St. Rep. 581, 108 N. W. 261, 8 Ann. Cas. 1047, and State ex rel. Duluth v. Northern P. R. Co. 98 Minn. 429, 108 N. W. 269, this court announced these general principles, and applied them to crossings of city streets and the tracks of railway companies, and held that where railway tracks cross a city street, the uncompensated burden of constructing and maintaining a bridge to carry its tracks over the street, or to carry the street over its tracks, is upon the railway company, if such bridge is necessary to make such crossing reasonably safe for use by the public; and this, though the railway company acquired its property and operated its road over the place involved before the street was established.

Counsel for the appellant railway company contends that the instant case on its particular facts should be distinguished from the above cases, because in this case of a waterway crossing railway tracks, a grade crossing is impossible, the dangers incident to a grade crossing do not arise, and hence the uncompensated burden of building a bridge cannot be placed upon the railway company under the police powers of the state. We think this contention could be sustained only by placing an unreasonable limitation on the doctrine announced in the crossing cases, and by considering as controlling superficial facts about the proposed way rather than its conceded nature. The opinion in State ex rel. Minneapolis v. St. Paul, M. & M. R. Co. supra, discusses and affirms the right of the state in the exercise of the police power to require safety devices or bridges at crossings, so that the public using the street will not be subjected to danger. The danger in grade crossings was the particular thing in that case calling for an exercise of the police power. But it was not the announcement of the safety device rule that made this case a leading and important one in this state. The safety device rule had been announced in earlier decisions. The important rule announced in the later case is: "A railroad company receives its charter and franchise subject to the implied right of the state to establish and open such streets and highways over and across its right of way as public convenience and necessity may from time to time require. That right on the part of the state attaches by implication of law to the franchise of the railroad company, and imposes upon it an obligation to construct and maintain at its own expense suitable crossings at new streets and highways to the same extent as required by the rules of the common law at streets and highways in existence when the railroad was constructed." And further that "cases where one railroad crosses another have no application, because both stand on an equality respecting rights and obligations, while in cases like that at bar the rights of the public are superior."

The doctrine thus announced does not limit the power of the state to require railways to adapt their tracks to the use by the public of highways, to cases where the use of the highway as laid out and used involves danger to the public. The police power of the state is concerned with the convenience and welfare of the public, as 51 L.R.A. (N.S.) well as its safety. Nor on principle could the general doctrine so announced be limited to streets and highways, as distinguished from other necessary public improvements crossing the company's right of way. In State ex rel. St. Paul, M. & M. R. Co. v. District Ct. 42 Minn. 247, 7 L.R.A. 121, 44 N. W. 7, a distinction is made between necessary planking and safety devices at street crossings. Such distinction, as was pointed out in State ex rel. Minneapolis v. St. Paul, M. & M. R. Co. above, is not recognized by the authorities sustaining and applying the broad rule announced in the later Minnesota case. These authorities do not limit the application of the rule to the requirement of safety devices.

In Cincinnati, I. & W. R. Co. v. Connersville, 170 Ind. 316, 83 N. E. 503, the court passed upon the question of the compensation to which the railway company was entitled in condemnation proceedings instituted by the city to open a street across the railroad right of way. The tracks of the railway company were on an embankment 15 feet above the natural surface of the ground. The proposed street extended across the right of way below the tracks through this embankment, thus making necessary a bridge to carry the tracks over the street. No compensation was allowed to cover the cost of the erection and maintenance of this bridge. It is apparent that in the Indiana case the dangers of a grade crossing were in no way involved. The only street proposed passed under the railway tracks. In denying the claim of the railway company for such compensation, it is stated: "Appellant's counsel overlook the fact that there are two distinct principles of law that operate upon the question we have under consideration, namely, 'eminent domain,' which implies a taking by the sovereign for some public benefit, and the 'police power,' which implies a regulation by the sovereign of private property for the preservation of the public safety, health, and general welfare."

This case being taken to the United States Supreme Court, the decision of the state court was affirmed in this language: "The question as to the right of the railway company to be reimbursed for any moneys necessarily expended in constructing the bridge in question is, we think, concluded by former decisions of this court.

. . . The railway company accepted its franchise from the state subject necessarily to the condition that it would conform at its own expense to any regulations not arbitrary in their character, as to the opening or use of streets, which had for their object the safety of the public, or the promotion of the public convenience, and which might, from time to time, be established by the municipality, when proceeding under legislative authority, within whose limits the company's business was conducted. This court has said that 'the power, whether called police, governmental, or legislative, exists in each state, by appropriate enactments not forbidden by its own Constitution or by the Constitution of the United States, to regulate the relative rights and duties of all persons and corporations within its jurisdiction, and therefore to provide for the public convenience and the public good.'" Cincinnati, I. & W. R. Co. v. Connersville, 218 U. S. 336, 54 L. ed. 1060, 31 Sup. Ct. Rep. 93, 20 Ann. Cas. 1206.

Under this rule as applied in the Indiana case,—and this is clearly the same rule as that announced in this state in State ex rel. Minneapolis v. St. Paul, M. & M. R. Co. supra,—if the city of Minneapolis were opening a street under the tracks and through the embankment of the appellant railway company, the company would not be entitled to compensation for the necessary bridge. It is clear that no distinction in law exists between such supposed improvement and the one actually proposed to be made. Each is a public way opened below the tracks through the embankment of the railway company, making necessary a bridge to support the tracks. It would be no more possible for the railway company to reconstruct its railway across such a street without a bridge than it is to carry its railway over the proposed canal without a bridge. No property right of the railway company can be interfered with by the removal of its supporting embankment for a waterway, that is not interfered with to the same extent by the removal of the embankment for a landway. Even the superficial facts concerning the two ways differ little. The proposed way here involved has two walks under the tracks through the embankment, the reasonable necessity of which is conceded. These walks make necessary a bridge. The fact that the public has determined that it will be better served by a portion of the way being water instead of land cannot, on any legal principle, shift the burden of a required bridge from the railway company to the public. The railway company is not vested with a property right that can discriminate between public travel passing under its tracks on wheels and in boats. The superficial differences could be further lessened by assuming that a driveway had been laid out along the canal crossing the right of way, or that a waterway was extended to each side of the right of way with a portage beneath the tracks.

Nor is the general rule requiring railway companies to adjust their tracks to public improvements when the public convenience or welfare requires limited in its application to traveled ways. In Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Illinois, 200 U. S. 561, 50 L. ed. 596, 26 Sup. Ct. Rep. 341, 4 Ann. Cas. 1175, was involved the question of the right to compel a railway company to enlarge a bridge, without compensation, to permit the passage down a natural waterway of waters collected by a system of drainage. The railway company had for years, at a point where its tracks cross a creek, maintained a suitable culvert sufficient to allow the passage of the waters naturally flowing in the creek. Drainage commissioners, having determined to drain a large district into and through the creek in order to reclaim and make tillable wet lands, notified the railway company to enlarge and widen the culvert through its right of way. The company refused to comply with this requirement unless compensated for the expense incurred. The court, in holding that the company might be required to construct the abutments and bridge without compensation, stated: "The learned counsel for the railway company seem to think that the adjudications relating to the police power of the state to protect the public health, the public morals, and the public safety are not applicable, in principle, to cases where the police power is exerted for the general well-being of the community, apart from any question of the public health, the public morals, or the public safety. Hence, he presses the thought that the petition in this case does not, in words, suggest that the drainage in question has anything to do with the health of the drainage district, but only avers that the system of drainage adopted by the commissioners will reclaim the lands of the district, and make them tillable or fit for cultivation. We cannot assent to the view expressed by counsel. We hold that the police power of a state embraces regulations designed to promote the public convenience or the general prosperity, as well as regulations designed to promote the public health, the public morals, or the public safety. . . . If the injury complained of is only incidental to the legitimate exercise of governmental powers for the public good, then there is no taking of property for the public use, and a right to compensation, on account of such injury, does not attach under the Constitution. Such is the present case."

In Chicago & E. R. Co. v. Luddington, 175 Ind. 35, 91 N. E. 939, 93 N. E. 273, it is held that the rule applicable to highways is also applicable to public ditches established across the right of way of a railway company, and that compensation need not be made to the railway company to cover the cost of a bridge made necessary to carry its tracks over the ditch. In Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Appanoose County (8th C.) 104 C. C. A. 573, 31 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1117, 182 Fed. 291, it is held: "In proceedings to condemn right of way for a public drainage ditch across a railroad, the company is not entitled to be awarded as damages the expense of building a new bridge over the ditch, but its damages are confined to the value of the easement across its right of way, regardless of whether or not the ditch follows a natural water course over its right of way."

In West Chicago Street R. Co. v. People, 214 Ill. 9, 73 N. E. 393, Id., 201 U. S. 506, 50 L. ed. 845, 26 Sup. Ct. Rep. 518, and in Union Bridge Co. v. United States, 204 U. S. 364, 51 L. ed. 523, 27 Sup. Ct. Rep. 387, the duty of a railway company to adapt, without compensation, its tracks to changes made in navigable streams, is affirmed. In the latter case this language is adopted: "The duty of a railroad to restore a stream or highway which is crossed by the line of its road is a continuing duty; and if, by the increase of population or other causes, the crossing becomes inadequate to meet the new and altered conditions of the country, it is the duty of the railroad to make such alterations as will meet the present needs of the public."

In New Orleans Gaslight Co. v. Drainage Commission, 197 U. S. 453, 49 L. ed. 831, 25 Sup. Ct. Rep. 471, another application was made of the same general rule. A gas company had laid its pipes in the streets of the city, under a franchise, at the place indicated by the public authorities. Afterwards the city established a drainage system, the construction of which required a change in the location of the gas pipes. It was held that the company property was not taken or injured by the requirement of such change, for the reason assigned, among others: "When it located its pipes it was at the risk that they might be, at some future time, disturbed, when the state might require for a necessary public use that changes in location be made. . . . In complying with this requirement at its own expense, none of the property of the gas company has been taken, and the injury sustained is damnum absque injuria."

It appears from these cases—and many other similar cases might be referred to—that the principle announced by this court in State ex rel. Minneapolis v. St. Paul, M. & M. R. Co. 98 Minn. 380, 28 L.R.A. (N.S.) 298, 120 Am. St. Rep. 581, 108 N. W. 261, 8 Ann. Cas. 1047, while there applied to the 51 L.R.A. (N.S.)

requirement of a safety device at a street and railway crossing, is not limited either to the requirement of safety devices or to crossings of streets and railway tracks, but is broadly applicable to public improvements crossing the railway tracks whenever, to permit such crossing, the convenience or welfare, as well as the health or safety, of the public, requires a reasonable readjustment by the company of the means for supporting its tracks. Under modern conditions railway companies are pioneers in development. Railroads are constructed usually in advance of the public ways and improvements made necessary by subsequent settlements. The railroad is thus first constructed making provision for existing land and water ways, but without reference to subsequent improvements. By such construction natural conditions are changed. Solid embankments may be erected across lowlands, or deep cuts made through higher lands. But it is now clearly established in this state, as in most states, that the company so builds its road subject to the reserved right of the public to lay out highways, locate drains, or establish or improve waterways across the company's right of way when the necessity therefor arises. For the property taken in making such improvements compensation must be made, but for the incidental expense in making reasonable changes in the method of carrying its tracks over such improvements, when public safety, health, convenience, or welfare requires such change, no compensation can be claimed by the railway. Such change is required under the reserved or police power of the state.

In the instant case the railway company constructed and placed its rail on a 16-foot embankment along a strip of land 600 feet wide separating two navigable lakes, confining a natural water course between the lakes in a pipe through such embankment. The company, by such construction, did not acquire such a property right in maintaining its tracks on the embankment that it is entitled to compensation for the cost of a necessary bridge to carry its tracks over a public way thereafter duly established across its right of way. The public right to lay out such way, though asserted subsequent in time to the construction of the road, is so far the prior and superior right that the company is required to make such reasonable readjustment of its tracks as is necessary to permit of the safe and convenient use of the public way. The requirement of such readjustment is not a taking or injuring of property, but rests on the exercise of the reserved or police power of the state. The proposed way is made up of a waterway and walks on each side. The waterway takes the place of the existing natural water course, and becomes, like the lakes it connects, public navigable water. A bridge to carry the railway tracks over this way is a necessary incident of its use by the public, and is required by public convenience and welfare. These facts clearly bring the instant case within the general principle announced in State ex rel. Minneapolis v. St. Paul, M. & M. R. Co. supra, and within the applications of that principle as repeatedly made by the authorities in the Federal and state courts.

It follows that the trial court properly refused to include in the compensation allowed the railway company the item of the cost of a bridge—exclusive of ornamental features—required to carry the tracks of the railway company over the newly established public way.

Judgment affirmed.

Start, Ch. J., dissenting:

I dissent. The short facts are these: Lake Calhoun and Lake of the Isles, meandered lakes within the territorial limits of the city of Minneapolis, are separated by a narrow strip of land 600 feet in width at its narrowest point. The appellant owns a strip of land 100 feet wide along the entire length of the strip separating the lakes, whereon it has constructed its railroad bed and embankment, which are some 16 feet in height, and laid its track thereon. The respondent city has acquired the shores of the lakes for park purposes, and seeks to acquire, by the exercise of the power of eminent domain, the right to construct a canal and a walk on each side thereof, through a strip 100 feet in width of such tract, to connect the waters of the lakes. This will materially enhance the public use of the lakes for pleasure and ice boating, skating, and like uses. The taking of appellant's land for the canal will, for all practical purposes, divide it into two parts, and necessitate the construction of a bridge over the canal to connect the separated parts of its land, and thereby restore its roadbed to its original condition of safety and utility. The two lakes are not connected by any natural water course, except that, at a point 59 feet east of the center line of the proposed canal, where it will cross appellant's right of way, there is a small water course, the waters of which, coming from Lake of the Isles, are discharged into Lake Calhoun through a pipe 3 feet in diameter placed under the appellant's railroad bed. When the canal is constructed, this water course and pipe will be useless, and they can be closed.

The question presented by the record is whether the appellant is entitled to have included, in the assessment of its damages for the taking and damaging of its property, so taken for a public use, the necessary cost of constructing a bridge over the canal so as to connect the parts of its roadbed divided by the canal. The contention of the city, which the court sustains, is that the appellant is not entitled to have included in its damages such cost, for the reason that public safety, convenience, and welfare require the construction of the bridge; hence in the exercise of the police power, the uncompensated duty of building the bridge may be imposed upon the appellant. It must be conceded that if the bridge in this case is a necessary safety device, to protect the public from the dangers arising from railway grade crossings over public ways, the uncompensated duty of constructing and maintaining it may, in the exercise of the police power, be imposed upon the appellant. The question, however, is: Do the special facts of this case bring it within the rule stated? How can the bridge in any manner conserve the safety of the public in using the canal? There can, from the very nature of the case, be no grade crossing of a railroad and a canal. Nor can the construction of this bridge promote in any manner public convenience or welfare, for the sole necessity for and function of the bridge will be to connect the parts of the appellant's land which will be separated by the canal, and thereby restore the roadbed to its original condition of safety and utility.

The court in its opinion seem to attach much importance to the fact that there is to be a walk on each side of the canal. I am unable to understand how such fact can be regarded as specially weighty. The walks are a mere incident to the canal, and if the bridge is not essential as a safety device to the canal proper, it cannot be as to the walks on each side of it. Again, the facts of this case do not present any question of the safety of navigation, or of a natural water course to be widened or deepened, or of the obstruction of navigable waters, or of public drainage. We have simply the question whether the state may, in the exercise of its police power, take dry land for the purpose of creating an artificial water course without any compensation except the mere value of the land taken. It is true that, when the right to convert such land into an artificial water course is once secured by the exercise of the power of eminent domain and the payment of just compensation, the waters of the artificial course become public waters, and the right of public navigation thereof paramount, but not before. In the very nature of the case the doctrine of the paramount right of public navigation cannot have any application to dry land in case the state seeks to take it by the exercise of the power of eminent domain, in order to convert it into an artificial water course. Any attempt to assess the appellant's damages for taking its land for the creation of an artificial water course, on the basis of rights and benefits which will accrue to the public after it has secured the right to take the land and convert it into a canal, would violate the plainest principles of natural justice.

I am, therefore, of the opinion that the uncompensated duty of constructing the bridge here in question cannot, upon the particular facts of this case, be imposed upon the appellant in the exercise of the police power of the state, and that the cost of the bridge ought to have been included in its damages. In reaching this conclusion I am not unmindful of the fact that the police power is an essential and beneficent attribute of sovereignty, the exercise of which, pursuant to valid legislative authority, cannot be controlled by the courts. But when, as is too often the case, such power is invoked to justify the confiscation of private property for public use in violation of constitutional guaranties, the courts may and must interfere for the protection of the citizens' constitutional rights. The police power cannot be used as a mask for removing private property from the protection of the Constitution.

STATE OF MINNESOTA, Resp't.,

MINNEAPOLIS MILK COMPANY et al.,
Appts.

(Two Cases.)

(124 Minn. 34, 144 N. W. 417.)

Indictment — matters of description.

1. Matters of description or inducement

Headnotes by BROWN, Ch. J.

Note. — Necessity or beneficent purpose as excuse or justification for combination to raise price of commodity.

The foregoing question has apparently not been raised, at least in this exact form, in any other case.

In Com. v. Bavarian Brewing Co. 112 Ky. 925, 66 S. W. 1016, for reasons very similar 51 L.R.A. (N.S.)

need not be stated with the same particularity in an indictment charging the commission of a crime, as the facts constituting the essential elements of the crime itself are required to be stated.

Same — combination.

2. An indictment under § 5168, Rev. Laws 1905, charging that defendants, several persons and corporations, were "jointly and severally" engaged in a certain occupation, and in violation of the statute formed a combination for the purpose of increasing the price of their products, construed, and held to charge that defendants were to some extent independent dealers, and not jointly associated in business as one concern.

Statute — construction — rules.

3. The language of a statute is to be construed in harmony with the ordinary rules of grammar, except only when such construction will lead to a result obviously contrary to the intention of the legislature.

Conspiracy — monopoly — penalty.

4. For the violation of §§ 5168 and 5169, Rev. Laws 1905, by entering into a combination with others to raise the price of commodities offered for sale by those forming the combination, the domestic corporation is not subject to the penalty imposed by § 5168, but only to the penalty of forfeiture of its charter as prescribed by § 5169.

Same — forfeiture of charter.

5. The original statute, chapter 359, Laws 1899, imposed both fine and forfeiture of charter, but the Revision of 1905 (§§ 5168, 5169) changed the statute in that respect, thereby making the penalty of forfeiture of the charter the exclusive punishment as to domestic corporations.

Same — justification.

6. A violation of the statute by the formation of a combination to do the acts prohibited cannot be excused by facts tending to justify the act, and which would have been proper and legal had the members thereof acted independently of the combination.

Same — raising price — necessity.

7. A combination of several persons and corporations, all independent dealers in milk and cream, to raise and increase the price thereof, is a violation of the statute, though the increased price was necessary to afford them a profit.

Trial — cross-examination — discretion.

8. The credibility of an expert witness is ordinarily to be tested by his cross-examination, and, though it may be proper to do so by the testimony of another expert specially qualified in respect to the subject-matter, the

to those set forth in STATE v. MINNEAPOLIS MILK Co., the court holds untenable the claim that the combination of brewing companies was not an unlawful monopoly under the Kentucky statute, because the purpose was to raise the price of beer, and, since beer was harmful and injurious, the object was a laudable one, for there would be less beer consumed if it sold at a higher price extent to which the examination of such other expert may be carried rests, as in the case of cross-examination, in the sound discretion of the court.

Evidence — sufficiency.

Messrs. Lyndon A. Smith, Attorney General, James Robertson, Mathias Baldwin, and John F. Bonner, for the State:

A corporation is subject to indictment under § 5168, Rev. Laws 1905.

Brown, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Defendants, with other persons and corporations, were jointly indicted by the grand jury of Hennepin county, and thereby charged with a conspiracy to raise the price of milk and cream in violation of § 5168, Rev. Laws 1905. A separate trial was had as to defendants Ruhnke and the Minneapolis Milk Company, a corporation, a verdict of guilty was returned by the jury, and defendants appealed from orders denying their separate motions for a new trial.

The assignments of error present the questions: (1) Whether the indictment states facts constituting a public offense; (2) whether the defendant corporation is indictable under the particular statute, and subject to the fine imposed by § 5168; (3) whether there were any errors in the admission or exclusion of evidence on the trial below, or errors in the instructions or refusals to instruct the jury; and (4) whether the evidence is sufficient to sustain than if it were sold for a less amount. The court said that the statute prohibiting any combination for the purpose of regulating, controlling, or fixing the price of any merchandise, manufactured articles, or property of any kind, made no exceptions, and the court would likewise refuse to make any exceptions thereto.

In International Harvester Co. v. Missouri, 234 U. S. 199, 58 L. ed. —, 34 Sup. Ct. Rep. 859, affirming 237 Mo. 369, 141 S. W. 672, it is held that, although it is found as a fact that the combination complained of is a benefit, and not an injury, to the public, this fact constitutes no defense where the statute makes unlawful all combinations, the purpose of the statute being to secure competition, and preclude combinations which tend to defeat it. The court said that it is too late in the day to assert against statutes which forbid combinations of competing companies, that a particular combination was induced by good intentions, and has had some good effect.

W. 844, holding that an organization of farmers for the purpose of creating a live stock market at a certain shipping point, was an illegal combination within the Iowa anti-trust statute, although the object of the combination was apparently to obtain, as far as possible, for the producer the full price paid by the consumer, thereby eliminating the profit of the middle man.

In Kentucky a statute making lawful combinations or pools among farmers for the purpose of disposing of their produce at a price not above its actual value, is held to be valid. Owen County Burley Tobacco Soc. v. Brumback, 128 Ky. 137, 107 S. W. 710.

And, accordingly, a combination of farmers is held valid, although one of the purposes is to form a selling agency in order to secure remunerative prices for their products. Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Burley Tobacco Co. 147 Ky. 22, 143 S. W. 1040.

And combinations among other concerns for the purpose of securing the actual value of their products are likewise valid. Com. v. International Harvester Co. 131 Ky.

the conviction of either defendant. We dispose of these questions in the order stated.

1. The statute upon which the indictment is founded, speaking generally, provides that any person or association of persons who enter into any pool, trust, agreement, or combination, with any person or association, corporate or otherwise, in restraint of trade, which tends in any way or degree to limit, fix, control, maintain, or regulate the price of any article of trade bought and sold within the limits of the state, or which limits and prevents competition in the sale or purchase thereof, or which tends or is designed so to do, shall be guilty of a felony and punished by fine or imprisonment as therein provided. Rev. Laws 1905, § 5168.

Six separate corporations and eight individuals were accused by the indictment of the violation of the statute. It is charged by the indictment that on the 29th day of September, 1912, at Minneapolis, this state, the defendants controlled and did a large percentage of the trade in milk and cream in said city, and that they "jointly and severally" bought and sold large quantities of such milk and cream, and were able to limit, control, and regulate the price of said commodities, and for a long time prior to the date named were selling and disposing of the same at the prices stated; that on said date defendants wilfully and unlawfully entered into a pool, trust, agreement, and understanding, each with all the others, for the purpose of preventing competition in the sale of milk and cream, as well as to limit and fix the price thereof, and did then and there, in pursuance of such conspiracy, raise the price of milk and cream from the price theretofore demanded for the same. The indictment contains other allegations, but the foregoing is sufficient to an understanding of the question whether a public offense is stated therein.

The contention of defendants is that, since the indictment charges that all the defendants on and prior to the date named therein were "jointly" engaged in the sale of milk and cream, they cannot be held to have violated the statute by raising the price of the articles so jointly sold. If the indictment be construed in harmony with defendants' claim, the contention made is sound; for if all these parties were jointly engaged in a common enterprise, and were not independent dealers, they were at perfect liberty to demand such prices for their products as they pleased, and for so doing, even though they raised the price, no charge of violating the statute could be made against them. But we are of opinion, and so hold, that the indictment should not be construed as charging that defendants were jointly engaged in the particular business. It alleges that they were "jointly and severally" so engaged, and from this the conclusion naturally follows that they were to some extent at least independent dealers, and for the purpose of regulating and limiting prices that they formed the conspiracy charged. Though indictments are construed strictly and no intendments indulged in support thereof, a reasonable interpretation of the language employed in stating the offense is always permissible, particularly in respect to matters of de-

551, 133 Am. St. Rep. 256, 115 S. W. 703; American Seeding Mach. Co. v. Com. 152 Ky. 589, 153 S. W. 972.

But if the purpose is to increase the price beyond its actual value, the combination is unlawful. International Harvester Co. v. Com. 147 Ky. 564, 144 S. W. 1064, International Harvester Co. v. Com. 148 Ky. 572, 147 S. W. 1199.

This Kentucky statute was held unconstitutional by the Supreme Court of the United States in International Harvester Co. v. Kentucky, 234 U. S. 216, 58 L. ed. —, 34 Sup. Ct. Rep. 853, on the ground that making the formation of combinations for the purpose of increasing the price of a product beyond its actual value, the test of legality, rendered the statute too uncertain in its application, since the statute offered no standard of conduct that it was possible to know. The court points out that the elements necessary to determine the imaginary ideal are uncertain, both in nature and degree of effect, to the acutest commercial mind, and it is said that "the very community, the intensity of whose wish relatively to its other competing desires determines the price that it would give, has to be supposed differently organized and subject to other influences than those under which it acts. . . . If business is to go on, men must unite to do it, and must sell their wares. To compel them to guess, on peril of indictment, what the community would have given for them, if the continually changing conditions were other than they are, to an uncertain extent; to divine prophetically what the reaction of only partially determinate facts would be upon the imaginations and desires of purchasers, is to exact gifts that mankind does not possess." To render more effective combinations among farmers and producers, it was provided by statute that persons entering into such a combination should not dispose of their crop without the consent of the agents of the combination, and the violation of this provision was made an offense punishable by fine. A conviction under this statute, sustained in Collins v. Com. 141 Ky. 564, 133 S. W. 233, was reversed by the United States Supreme Court, 234 U. S. 634, 58 L. ed. —, 34 Sup. Ct. Rep. 924, on the ground of the illegality of the statute, pointed out in International Harvester Co. v. Kentucky, supra.

scription or inducement. 2 Dunnell's Dig. 29; 22 Cyc. 300; State v. Mayberry, 48 Me. 218. The allegations of the indictment relative to the nature of the business conducted by defendants, and that they were "jointly and severally" engaged therein, are matters of description or inducement, and properly construed as charging that they were to some extent independent dealers, and not all jointly associated together as one concern. So construing the allegations, the indictment is sufficient and charges a violation of the statute.

2. The question whether a domestic corporation joining in the violation of the statute is subject to the penalty imposed by § 5168, a fine or imprisonment, is presented for the first time. Proceedings against corporations heretofore have been conducted under § 5169, for the forfeiture of their charters. State v. Duluth Bd. of Trade, 107 Minn. 516, 23 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1260, 121 N. W. 395; State v. Creamery Package Co. 110 Minn. 415, 136 Am. St. Rep. 514, 128 N. W. 126, 623. In the case at bar the defendant corporation was proceeded against under § 5168, and the contention of the state is that corporations are subject to the double penalty of a fine of $500 to $5,000, under § 5168, and forfeiture of their corporate existence under § 5169. While the defendant milk company insists that it is not subject to criminal prosecution under § 5168, and that the only penalty that may be imposed upon it for a violation of the statute is a forfeiture of its charter. The question is one of legislative intention, to be gathered from the two sections of the statute construed together, and in connection perhaps with the prior statutes of which those referred to are a revision.

It is not contended that a corporation is not indictable for a violation of penal laws, or that it is exempt from that sort of prosecution and punishment because it is not included in the word "person" in statutes declaring that any person violating the law shall be punished; and it is conceded that, generally speaking, corporations are included within the scope of such statutes. But it is claimed that by the revision of the particular statutes, the intention of the legislature to exclude corporations from the penalty prescribed by § 5168 is clear and manifest. In this we concur. By this we are not to be understood as holding that a corporation may not be indicted and convicted under the statute, and the conviction made the basis of proceedings under § 5169 for the forfeiture of its charter. In fact, that would seem an orderly and proper procedure. But we do hold that the corporation may not be proceeded against under that section for the purpose, if found guilty ty of a violation thereof, of imposing the fine there prescribed. In our view of the matter, §§ 5168 and 5169 are perfectly clear and unambiguous, and there is no room for construction. If they were the original enactment, no doubt could arise as to the intention of the legislature in respect to the penalties imposed, and the conclusion would necessarily follow, from the language thereof, that separate penalties were intended. The only doubt in the matter arises when reference is made to the prior statutes. The new statute is clear; it becomes ambiguous or doubtful only by referring to the original of which the new is a revision. In construing a revised statute a doubt or ambiguity in its meaning cannot be thus raised. Hamilton v. Rathbone, 175 U. S. 414, 44 L. ed. 219, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 155; State v. Stroachein, 99 Minn. 248, 109 N. W. 235. But, applying the rule that the old statute may be referred to, a consideration thereof in connection with the new only confirms the view stated, and leaves no fair doubt that the legislature by the last enactment intended to impose separate penalties upon persons and corporations. The original statute (chap. 359, Laws 1899) covered the entire subject in detail. Section 1 thereof prohibited generally the formation of trusts and combinations by persons and corporations, and declare them unlawful. Section 2 provided that "every person" who shall enter into any such prohibited trust or combination shall be punished by a fine of not less than $500 nor more than $5,000 or by imprisonment in the state prison for not less than three nor more than five years. Section 3 provided that "any corporation" organized under the laws of the state, found guilty of a violation of the statutes, should, "in addition to the penalty prescribed by § 2 of this act," forfeit its charter, rights, and franchises. This, as just stated, imposed upon the domestic corporation double punishment for a violation of the statute. The same section imposed as punishment upon the foreign corporation banishment from the state only. Section 7 provides that the word "person" as used in the act should include corporations.

If these various provisions of the statute had been carried forward unchanged into the Revision of 1905, there could be no question of the correctness of the position of the state, for it is clear that double punishment for the guilty corporation was therein intentionally provided for. They were not, however, carried forward in the form as originally enacted, but substantial changes were made which point to but one conclusion, namely, a purpose, as already suggested, to change the law. The original statute contained several sections and covered the subject of trusts and combinations in some detail. The whole of that act was reduced by the revision and included in two comprehensive sections, 5168 and 5169, which embrace every element of the prior statute. The first section provides that every person violating the statute shall be punished by fine or imprisonment. The next section provides that every domestic corporation violating the act shall, "in addition to the penalties imposed upon the members thereof" by § 5168, forfeit its charter, rights, and franchises. The important change in the language of this section is found in this: The prior statute imposed upon domestic corporations, as a penalty for a violation of the statute, forfeiture of their charters, "in addition to the penalty prescribed in § 2 of this act," which was fine or imprisonment. This was modified by the revision so as to impose a forfeiture of the charter, "in addition to the penalties imposed upon the members thereof." This change was significant and suggestive only of a purpose to relieve the corporation of double punishment. The contention of the state that the words "members thereof," found in the clause last quoted, has reference to members of the unlawful combination, is clearly not sound. The subject-matter of the section is the punishment of domestic corporations, and the reference to "members thereof" refers, and clearly was intended to refer, to members of the corporation with respect to which the section deals. This harmonizes with the grammatical analysis of the language of the section; and it is elementary that, in construing a statute, the ordinary rules of grammar will be applied, except when a manifest injustice will follow, or a result reached which is obviously at variance with the legislative intent. This particular statute does not come within the exception. The language thereof is clear. And while a change in the language of a revised statute does not necessarily indicate an intention to alter the law, and the presumption is that no such purpose was intended, where a change as clear and significant as the one here involved in fact modifies the statute in point of substance, the presumption that no change was intended must yield to the fact. Farmers' Co-op. Elevator Co. v. Enge, 122 Minn. 316, 142 N. W. 328. Corporations act only through their officers and members, and such officers and members for a violation of the statute are punishable as individuals under § 5168. The former statute, in so far as it imposed double punishment upon the corporation, was undoubtedly deemed by the revision commission too severe, and the legislature evidently adopted that view in accepting and enacting the statute as revised. In other words, it was thought that the statute was a little drastic in providing for the punishment of the members of the corporation by fine, imposing the same punishment upon the corporation, and then as a climax declaring that the corporation be put to death. Such was the situation before the revision, and we are satisfied that the intention was to change the law, on the theory that to impose a fine upon a corporation was more or less an idle ceremony, and that a forfeiture of its charter would more effectively prevent further violations of the law by the guilty corporation. Our view of the amended statute is sustained by Standard Oil Co. v. State, 117 Tenn. 618, 10 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1015, 100 S. W. 705, where a similar statute was construed as not to authorize both a fine and dissolution of the corporation.

3. A number of the assignments of error may be disposed of together and without extended discussion. The statute condemns and prohibits the formation of trusts and combinations in restraint of trade, or for the purpose of controlling the market, or raising the price of commodities of sale. The law was enacted to prevent the same, and to punish those guilty of its violation. In a case like that at bar, where the charge is the formation of a combination between several persons and corporations to increase the price of products sold and dealt in by each, it would seem unimportant that an increase of price was justified, either in view of the cost of production or other circumstances which might justify the individual to demand more for his goods. The statute was not designed as means for the regulation of the public market, nor as an attempt to control the price of goods offered for sale, but rather to check the tendency toward monopolization, and to prohibit several dealers from combining together, the effect of which is the organized stifling of competition; and the aim of the statute was to remedy or prevent that evil. And in this case the first and important issue was whether a combination was formed by the defendant as charged in the indictment, and for the purposes therein alleged. Evidence tending to show that defendants theretofore had been selling their milk and cream at a loss, or that other dealers more favorably situated occupied an advantageous position in the trade, or that defendants had valid and sufficient reasons for raising the price, would not constitute a defense or justify the wrongful combination. Malice is not an essential element in a prosecution for the violation of the statute. The sole inquiry is: Was the combination formed for a purpose prohibited by the law, and whether the parties intended to violate the law is immaterial. 1 Dunnell's Dig. 3409; State v. Quackenbush, 98 Minn. 515, 108 N. W. 953; State v. Sharp, 121 Minn. 381, 141 N. W. 526. And though defendants, acting independently, could have raised prices without subjecting themselves to a charge of violating the statute, their act in combining together to do so is prohibited, and evidence which only tended to justify or excuse the combination was properly rejected. This covers a number of alleged errors which we do not consider separately.

4. That defendants held a meeting at the time charged in the indictment, either for the purpose of forming a milk dealers' association in Minneapolis, or for the purpose of forming the alleged unlawful combination, is clear from the evidence. In fact, the meeting is not disputed by defendants. They claim, however, that it was for the sole purpose of organizing the association, and with no purpose to combine in an agreement to raise prices. While the state claims that the organization of the Milk Dealers' Association was a mere incident to the main purpose of the meeting, which was to form the unlawful combination charged in the indictment. In some way the public authorities learned of the contemplated action of the milk dealers of the city, and detectives were employed to discover and bring to light the facts. The detectives were informed that the dealers were to hold a meeting at a certain place on the afternoon of September 29, 1912. Prior to the meeting the detectives gained entrance to the room in which it was to be held, and installed therein a dictograph properly connected by wires with a receiver placed in a closet adjoining the meeting room. The detective concealed themselves in the closet and remained there during the meeting, and subsequently reported the information gained by them. One of the detectives was a stenographer and made shorthand notes of things heard over the dictograph, while the other detective listened at the door leading from the closet to the meeting room. Both were produced as witnesses on the trial below. The stenographer testified to the contents of the notes made by him in the manner stated, from which the jury was justified in finding that the meeting was one called and held by the members thereof for the purpose of entering into an agreement to raise the price of milk and cream, and incidentally to form a milk dealers' association. The testimony of the witness was corroborated by the other detective who overheard what took place and what was said by the members of the gathering 51 L.R.A. (N.S.)

by listening at the door leading into the room. The stenographer's original notes were received in evidence, and several erasures and interlineations appear to have been made therein. These the witness fully explained, and the verity of his explanation was for the jury. Defendant called R. A. Mabey, a court reporter of long experience, and attempted to show by him the incompetency of the detective as a stenographer, or the inaccuracy of his notes, and that they were unreliable. Much of his testimony upon the subject was received, and other portions excluded by the court on objection by the county attorney. Complaint is made of these rulings. We have examined the record with care and find no sufficient reason for holding that any prejudice resulted to defendants, if it be conceded that some of the rulings were technically error. Why the county attorney persisted in interposing objections to the testimony of this and other witnesses produced by defendants is not made clear by the record. Many of them might well have been omitted. We fail to see, however, wherein defendants were substantially prejudiced. The whole testimony of witness Mabey related to the qualifications of the detective as a stenographic writer, the verity of his stenographic notes, and in point of substance was the opinion of the witness respecting the ability of the detective to make an accurate report of the proceedings; and also his opinion concerning the erasures and changes appearing upon the face of the notes. The credibility of a witness is ordinarily to be tested by cross-examination, and though it may be proper to do so in the manner here attempted, by the testimony of an expert especially qualified in respect to the subject-matter, the extent to which the examination of the expert may be carried for this purpose, where he does not speak from personal knowledge, rests, as in the case of cross-examinations for the same purpose, in the sound discretion of the court, no abuse of which appears. Witness Mabey did not profess any personal knowledge of the qualifications of the detective. People v. Holmes, 111 Mich. 364, 69 N. W. 501; Laros v. Com. 84 Pa. 200; Lawson, Expert Ev. 275 et seq.

5. The charge of the learned trial court was a comprehensive and complete statement to the jury of the issues in the case and the rules and principles of law applicable thereto. We discover therein no error of which defendant can complain. It is well-settled law in this state that the trial judge in criminal cases may review the evidence in his instructions to the jury, and may state to them that it tends to prove certain facts. State v. Rose, 47 Minn. 47, 49 N. W. 404. The only restriction upon the right is that the review shall be fair and impartial, and not in a manner naturally to confuse the jury, or to lead them to a particular result. State v. Yates, 99 Minn. 461, 109 N. W. 1070; Dunnell's Dig. 3479. If the charge in the case at bar may, by close analysis, be said to be inaccurate in any substantial respect, we are clear that such inaccuracy was not of a nature to mislead the jury. They were expressly informed that the increase in the price of milk, though made by all the defendants on the same day, was not a violation of the statute, and that no conviction could be had unless it appeared that the defendants jointly entered into an agreement for that purpose. And further that if such agreement was entered into the statute was violated. The rules of law applicable to the issues were clearly stated, and the requests presented by defendant were all sufficiently covered by the general charge. We find no error of a nature to require reversal.

6. The question whether the county attorney was guilty of misconduct in delivering an interview to the newspapers at the close of the trial, of an inflammatory nature, was peculiarly one for the trial court to determine. While the county attorney practically conceded the fact that he made certain statements to newspaper reporters, and that such statements were published and probably reached the jurors, who were not in charge of an officer pending the trial, yet it was for the trial court to determine the effect thereof upon the jurors, and whether prejudice therefrom resulted. The act of the prosecuting attorney in this respect, even though his remarks were not intended for publication, and he so informed the reporters, is not to be commended.

This covers all that need be said. We have considered all the assignments of error not specially treated by the opinion, with the result that no error as to defendant Ruhnke appears, the evidence sustains the verdict, and the order denying his motion for a new trial is affirmed. And since defendant milk company is not subject to the penalty prescribed by § 5168, the court erred in imposing it, and the order denying its motion for a new trial is reversed.

The following Per Curiam modification of the opinion was handed down December 15, 1913:

Our attention has been called by the attorney general to the fact that the order remanding the cause is perhaps indefinite and should be corrected. In view of the conclusion that the corporation might be proceeded against by indictment, and conviction and the judgment rendered thereon made the basis for dissolution proceedings, the order remanding the cause should have been with directions to the court below to modify its judgment by eliminating the fine, leaving the judgment stand as one of conviction of the crime charged. The former order is therefore modified accordingly, and the reversal of the order denying the motion of the corporation for a new trial is withdrawn.

Hallam, J., dissenting:

I cannot concur in the portion of the foregoing opinion which holds that under §§ 5168, 5169, Rev. Laws 1905, domestic corporations offending against the provisions of § 5168 are not liable to the general penal provisions of that section, but that such corporations are liable only to punishment by forfeiture of charter.

It appears to me that the general penal provisions of § 5168, Rev. Laws 1905, apply to corporations to the same extent as to individuals.

Section 5168 makes it an offense to "enter into any pool, trust, agreement, combination, or understanding" in restraint of trade, or to limit, fix, control, maintain, or regulate the price of any article of trade, manufacture, or use, or to limit the production thereof, or to prevent or limit competition in the purchase or sale thereof, and it contains the general penal clause that every person violating any provision of that section shall be punished by fine or imprisonment.

If this section stood alone, it would concededly be broad enough to cover corporations, for the word "person" includes corporations. Rev. Laws 1905, § 4748, ¶ 11. The trouble arises from the language of § 5169. This section provides that every domestic corporation violating any provision of § 5168, "or which shall in any way assist in carrying out any of the purposes of such illegal pool, trust, agreement, combination, or understanding, in addition to the penalties imposed upon the members thereof by said section, shall forfeit all its corporate franchises."

It is contended that the term "members thereof," as here used, means members of the corporation, and that the use of the language quoted, taken in connection with all of the provisions of these sections, indicates an intention to impose punishment by § 5168 only upon natural persons, and by § 5169 to impose upon domestic corporations only the additional punishment of forfeiture of charter, to the exclusion of the punishment imposed by the general penal provisions of § 5168.

I cannot concur in this construction. It appears to me that § 5168 was intended, as its language imports, to impose the punishment therein prescribed upon all participants in the prohibited combinations, including corporations so participating; that the term "members," used in § 5169, means members of the combination, not members of the corporation; and that the provision of § 5169, imposing the penalty of forfeiture upon domestic corporations participating in any illegal combination, "in addition to the penalties imposed upon the members thereof" by § 5168, means that such punishment is in addition to the penalties imposed upon all members of the combination by that section. This use of the term "members" is consistent with the language of both sections. The preceding section does impose penalties upon the members of the combination. It does not impose penalties upon the members of the corporation as such. It does not impose a penalty upon members of the corporation at all, unless they may be active participants in the combination, and then only as such participants.

If it is not clear that this is the correct view, then it must at least be said that the language is ambiguous, and in such case resort may be had, in interpreting its meaning, to the history of this legislation and to the terms of the statute in force prior to the revision. It is conceded that, under the statute in force prior to the revision, the general penal provisions now embodied in § 5168 did apply to corporations as well as to individuals, and that the penalty of forfeiture of charter imposed upon domestic corporations was in addition thereto. Changes in language made by a revision of statutes are not to be regarded as altering the law, unless it is clear that such was the intention. Becklin v. Becklin, 99 Minn. 307, 109 N. W. 243; Odegard v. Lemire, 107 Minn. 315, 119 N. W. 1057.

That the construction of the word "members," above indicated, is the correct one, is, it seems to me, made clear by reference to the language of the various statutes which were incorporated in the revision.

The first of these statutes was chapter 10, Gen. Laws 1891. This act made it an offense to "create, enter into, become a member of or a party to," any pool, trust, agreement, combination, or confederation to regulate or fix prices of, or control the output of, certain commodities. This language was carried forward into Gen. Stat. 1894, §§ 6955, 6956.

ground, and more. Instead, however, of using the terms "create, enter into, become a member of or a party to" any such pool, it used only the words "entering into" such combination.

Chapter 194, Laws 1901, prohibits pools, trusts, or combinations, and prohibits the boycott of any other person or corporation because "not a member of or a party to" any such combination.

All of these acts were before the revisers when they compiled the Revised Laws of 1905, and it appears to me that in drafting § 5169, when they used the term "members" in the provision that domestic corporations engaging in any illegal pool, trust, or combination should be subject to forfeiture of charter in "addition to the penalties imposed upon the members thereof," they used it as it was used in the act of 1891, the General Statutes of 1894, and the act of 1901, and that the legislature had the same intent when it adopted their revision. If such is the case, then the prior statute was not changed by the Revised Laws of 1905, and corporations are now, as before, subject to the same penalties as individuals.

It should also be noted that the revisers in their report upon the whole Criminal Code say: "Only one material change has been proposed, and that not a change of law, but of definition," introducing the term "gross misdemeanor" as defining a certain class of offenses. Revisers' Report, p. 37. This, while not conclusive, is entitled to some force.

SAM KAHN.

Sale — condition — effect of reclaiming property.

1. In a so-called conditional sale contract by which the seller retains title to the property and the right to recover it on default of the buyer, when the seller exercises this right and retakes the property, he cannot thereafter maintain an action to recover unpaid instalments of the purchase price.

Headnotes by BUNN, J.

Note. — Sale: right of purchaser on conditional sale to recover payments where the seller retakes the property.

This note is supplemental to Pfeifer v. Norman, 38 L.R.A. (N.S.) 891.

The cases considering the question raised since the note referred to sustain the rule

Same — forfeiture of payments.

2. Whether partial payments made by the buyer are forfeited, in the absence of language to that effect in the contract, when the seller recovers the property, is not decided.

Replevin — for property sold on condition — return of payments.

3. It is not a condition precedent to the maintenance by the seller of an action in replevin to recover the property, that he return or tender to the buyer partial payments made or notes given for unpaid instalments.

Same — demand — necessity.

4. Where, in an action of replevin, the answer demands the restoration of the property to defendant, a demand before suit is not necessary.

(January 30, 1914.)

APPEAL by plaintiff from an order of the District Court for Scott County granting a motion to dismiss, and denying a motion for new trial, in an action therein stated, that the seller of property on conditional sale, upon default of the buyer, is entitled to retake the property, and by so doing he does not render himself liable to repay the amount received on the purchase price.

Thus, in Pfeifer v. Norman, supra, it is held that, in the absence of any statutory provision affecting the matter, where a conditional sale contract provides for the termination thereof on default by the buyer, and the resumption by the seller of the possession of the property wherever situated, and forfeiture of all payments theretofore made upon the purchase price, and the seller retakes the property because thereof, upon the default of the buyer, the latter is not thereafter entitled to maintain an action to recover instalments paid by him on the purchase price.

And in Bray v. Lowery, 163 Cal. 256, 124 Pac. 1004, the rule is stated that a defaulting purchaser of property on conditional sale may not usually demand a return of money paid by him on account of the sale.

And where the buyer of property on conditional sale agrees that, upon his default in complying with any of the conditions of the contract, such default shall operate as a rescission of the contract and a forfeiture of any instalment paid by him on the purchase price, such forfeiture will be enforced by the court for the benefit of the seller, where the buyer has made default. Klock v. Molsons Bank, Rap. Jud. Quebec 39 C. S. 435.

Where a contract for the sale of personal property contains a reservation of title in the seller, and also a provision that the contract is not binding upon the seller until it has been accepted and approved by him, and it does not appear that he ever accepted or approved it, the contract is not enforceable because lacking in mutuality, and be- 51 L.R.A.(N.S.)

brought to recover possession of certain brick-making machinery. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Peck & Moriarty for appellant.
Mr. F. C. Irwin for respondent.

Bunn, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Action in replevin to recover possession of certain brick-making machinery. At the close of plaintiff's case, the trial court granted a motion of defendant to dismiss the action, and afterwards denied a motion for a new trial. Plaintiff appealed.

The ultimate question here is whether or not the trial court was right in dismissing the action. The facts, as they appeared from the evidence and the admissions of the parties, are as follows: On March 4, 1910, defendant ordered in writing of plaintiff a brick-making machine, dies, and end cutting table, for which he agreed to pay $850 and freight from the factory. Of this fore the seller can maintain replevin for the property delivered thereunder, he must show a demand on the purchaser for the property, a refusal of the latter to surrender it, and the refunding of the purchase money paid. Bent v. Jones, 172 Ill. App. 62.

Where a contract for the sale of property, reserving title in the seller, contains a provision authorizing the seller to retake the property and resell it on default by the buyer, the seller is liable to the buyer for the amount paid by the latter on the purchase price, where upon default by the latter, the seller retook the property and resold it, but in making the resale did not follow the requirements of the contract. Sawyer-Massey Co. v. Dagg, 4 Sask. L. R. 228.

In Scott v. Vulcan Iron Works Co. 31 Okla. 334, 122 Pac. 186, it is held that the buyer who is defending an action of replevin for property, brought by the seller thereof on conditional sale, is not entitled to an instruction to the jury requiring as a condition precedent to the right of the seller to maintain replevin for the property, that he shall tender or repay the amount paid by the buyer on the purchase price, where at the time of the commencement of the suit the latter was in default.

Where the seller of property reserves title thereto in himself until payment of the purchase price, and the contract also contains a provision that the buyer shall return and deliver the property to the seller if requested at any time before the sale is completed by payment of the purchase price, where the buyer defaults, it is not a condition precedent to the right of the seller to maintain replevin for the property, that he allege and prove a return of, or tender of the note given by the buyer to represent, the purchase price. Zederman v. Thomson, 17 N. M. 56, 121 Pac. 609. A. G. S.

sum, $200 was to be paid in cash with the order, $150 in cash at the time of delivery, $250 in three months from the date of shipment, and $250 in six months from such date. The last two payments were to be evidenced by negotiable promissory notes made by defendant, and dated on the day of shipment. The order recited that it was agreed that all of the articles specified were to remain the property of plaintiff and subject to its order until paid for in full, and that the giving of notes, or any payments on account, should not divest plaintiff of the title to the property until the purchase price was paid in full. The order further provided that, in default of payment as agreed, the plaintiff might take possession of and remove the property without legal process. Plaintiff accepted the order in writing. The machinery was delivered to defendant in April. He paid the $200 cash with the order, and the $150 cash at the time of delivery, and he gave the two notes for $250 each called for by the contract, payable respectively three and six months from the date of the order. He failed to pay these notes when they became due or thereafter, and this action in replevin was brought in July, 1911, to recover possession of the machinery.

Defendant answered, claiming the right to possession, and damages for breach of warranty. The reply was a general denial. On the trial plaintiff proved the contract, the delivery of the machinery, the giving and nonpayment of the notes, which it was admitted were in the possession of plaintiff, and rested. The motion to dismiss was granted on the ground that plaintiff was not entitled to recover the possession of the machinery, because it had not returned or offered to return to defendant the cash payments he had made, or the two promissory notes.

Was it a condition precedent to plaintiff's right of recovery that it return or tender to defendant the cash payments made and the notes? The question is a new one in this state, and of considerable importance, in view of the great volume of business done under conditional sale contracts like the one here. The contract in this case clearly provided that the title to the property remained in the seller until the notes were paid, and as clearly gave the seller the right to take possession on the default of the purchaser. But it did not provide that the payments made should be forfeited.

1. It is thoroughly well settled in this state that, after retaking or recovering the property under a contract of this kind for a default of the buyer, the seller cannot thereafter maintain an action to recover a balance due on the purchase price, or on notes given therefor. The seller has the election: (1) To reclaim the property; (2) to treat the sale as absolute and sue to recover the debt; (3) to bring an action to foreclose his lien. But the assertion of either right is the abandonment of the others. When the property is retaken by the seller, no further rights exist under the contract against the purchaser. Minneapolis Harvester Works v. Hally, 27 Minn. 495, 8 N. W. 597; C. Aultman & Co. v. Olson, 43 Minn. 409, 45 N. W. 852; Keystone Mfg. Co. v. Cassellius, 74 Minn. 115, 76 N. W. 1028; Alden v. W. J. Dyer & Bro. 92 Minn. 134, 99 N. W. 784; Nelson v. International Harvester Co. 117 Minn. 298, 135 N. W. 808. It follows that plaintiff in the case at bar, having elected to retake the property, could not thereafter maintain an action on the notes given by defendant. These notes being negotiable, defendant would be entitled to have them delivered up and canceled. Whether their delivery or tender to defendant is a condition precedent to plaintiff's maintaining an action to recover the property is a different question, which we will determine later.

2. The question whether the vendor, on recovery of the property, must account to the vendee for all or any part of the payments made, is not necessarily involved in this appeal, but it may become involved on the trial of this or some other action between the parties. We do not determine the question, but will refer to some of the authorities.

Mr. Tiffany, in his work on Sales, states that it is generally held that the seller need not, in an action against the buyer in replevin, refund partial payments made, and that, although the seller reclaims the goods, the buyer cannot recover for payments made. Tiffany on Sales, 140. It is stated in Cyc. that as a general rule the seller need not, in an action to recover the goods, allow for or refund partial payments, such payments being regarded as forfeited. 35 Cyc. 704. See also 6 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 438, where this is said to be the prevailing doctrine. The cases supporting this rule of absolute forfeiture are cited in the text-books referred to. But the authors recognize that other authorities hold that the partial payments may be recovered, while still others hold that the buyer, against the amount he has paid, should be charged with the reasonable value of the use of the property and its depreciation in value. We do not decide that all partial payments made by the buyer are forfeited when the seller recovers the property. We do decide that, if not forfeited, the seller should be credited with whatever is determined to be the value of the buyer's use of the property and the amount of its depreciation.

3. In either case it follows that the return or tender by the seller to the buyer of partial payments made is not a condition precedent to the recovery of the property in an action of replevin. The title is in the seller, and the contract gives him a right to take possession of the goods on default of the buyer. When he does so, he does not, accurately speaking, rescind the contract. He acts under it. The contract is executory, rather a contract to sell than a sale. The rule requiring one who rescinds a contract to put the other party in statu quo should not apply. Otherwise, the buyer may have the use of the property for a long time, and it may greatly deteriorate in value, and still the seller, to exercise his undoubted right to retake it for a default of the buyer, must pay back all the payments he has received, as well as cancel the unpaid indebtedness of the buyer. This rule seems as harsh against the vendor, as the rule forfeiting all payments seems harsh against the vendee. The following cases, among others, hold distinctly that the return or tender to the buyer of partial payments made, or of notes given, is not a condition precedent to maintaining an action in replevin: Fleck v. Warner, 25 Kan. 492; Duke v. Shackelford, 56 Miss. 552; Tufts v. D'Arcambal, 85 Mich. 185, 12 L.R.A. 446, 24 Am. St. Rep. 79, 48 N. W. 497; Kirby v. Tompkins, 48 Ark. 273, 3 S. W. 363; National Cash Register Co. v. Ferguson, 25 Misc. 363, 55 N. Y. Supp. 592; Latham v. Sumner, 89 Ill. 233, 31 Am. Rep. 79.

There are cases to the contrary: Segrist v. Crabtree, 131 U. S. 287, 33 L. ed. 125, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 687, where it is said in the course of the opinion that "the court below properly held that they could not retake the cattle while they retained the notes." Latham v. Davis (C. C.) 44 Fed. 862, where it is said that the better rule is that in reclaiming the property the seller rescinds the contract of sale so far as it has been executed, and is therefore bound to restore to the buyer anything he may have received. It is not expressly held that such restoration is a condition precedent. Ketchum v. Brennan, 53 Miss. 597, which distinctly so holds, but was overruled in Duke v. Shackelford, supra. Fairbanks v. Malloy, 16 Ill. App. 278, which is not in line with Latham v. Sumner, supra. Shafer v. Russell, 28 Utah, 444, 79 Pac. 559, where it is simply stated that it is not correct that the buyer forfeits payments already made. Deering Harvester Co. v. Donovan, 82 Minn. 162, 83 Am. St. Rep. 417, 84 N. W. 745, is not at all in point.

better rule, fairer to both parties; that is, that the return by the vendor, or offer to return, partial payments, is not a condition precedent to retaking the property, or to maintaining an action in replevin for that purpose. And we do not base this on the ground that such partial payments are forfeited. What the rights of the parties are in regard to the adjustment of the accounts between them may be determined, if not in the replevin action, in some other proceeding. As to how these rights affect the final determination of the replevin action, if at all, we do not decide. We call attention to two cases bearing upon the question. Commercial Pub. Co. v. Campbell Printing Press & Mfg. Co. 111 Ga. 388, 36 S. E. 756; Thirby v. Rainbow, 93 Mich. 164, 53 N. W. 159.

As to the notes given for the unpaid instalments, it is clear under our decisions, as already stated, that they should be returned to the buyer. But we think such return or offer to return is not a condition precedent to maintaining the replevin action. If defendant demanded it, the court could protect his rights fully by ordering plaintiff to return the notes before judgment.

4. It is claimed that the dismissal of the action can be sustained on the ground that there was no demand before suit for delivery of the property. But the answer demanded the return of the property to defendant. Under our decisions this showed that defendant would not have complied with a demand, and it was therefore unnecessary. Guthrie v. Olson, 44 Minn. 404, 46 N. W. 853; Dunnell, Dig. § 8409.

Our conclusion is that the trial court should have denied the motion to dismiss, and tried the case on the merits.

Order reversed, and new trial granted.

a written contract by the terms of which plaintiffs agreed to find a purchaser for a 6,000-acre tract of land, and were to receive as commission all of the price received in excess of $10 per acre. Plaintiffs introduced a proposed purchaser to defendants, and they sold to such purchaser some 2,500 acres of the tract, at $13 per acre, the purchaser not being willing to take the entire tract. The issue of whether the contract was entire or severable was properly raised by the answer.

Broker — contract to sell land — divisibility.

2. The contract construed, and held entire, and not to authorize plaintiffs to sell or find a purchaser for any part of the tract less than the whole.

Same — partial performance — commissions.

3. Plaintiffs, not having performed their contract, are not entitled to recover commissions on the sale made on a pro rata basis; it not appearing that performance was prevented by defendants, or that the contract was modified.

Contract — services — quantum meruit — pleading.

4. The complaint declaring on the express contract, and there being no pleading or proof of the reasonable value of plaintiffs' services, there can be no recovery on a quantum meruit. Whether, under proper pleadings and evidence, plaintiffs could recover the reasonable value of their services, notwithstanding they did not perform the contract, is not decided.

Generally, as to performance of contract by a real estate broker to find a purchaser or effect an exchange, see note to Lunney v. Healey, 44 L.R.A. 593.

And as to effect upon right of real estate broker to commission of fact that owner sells to broker's customer at reduced price, see note to Ball v. Dolan, 15 L.R.A. (N.S.) 272.

I. Recovery on express contract.

a. In general.

Most of the actions for commission for procuring a purchaser for part only of the property have apparently been, as in BENTLEY v. EDWARDS, on the contract; and the decision in that case that there can be no recovery in such actions because the contract has not been performed is in accord with the weight of authority, where the broker is authorized only to procure a purchaser for an entire tract and procures one willing to buy on the terms offered only a materially smaller portion thereof. In some instances, however, the broker's contract has been held severable, so as to permit recovery on the contract of commission for the part of the property sold; and in other instances recovery has been allowed on quantum meruit. On principle, it would appear that where the purchaser procured by the broker is unwilling or unable to buy the entire property on the terms offered, and the broker's contract of employment is entire, there is ordinarily no implied contract to pay the broker the reasonable value of his services, even though the owner thereafter sells a part of the property to the purchaser, and that in such instances there 51 L.R.A. (N.S.) should be no recovery on quantum meruit. In few cases, however, does this point seem to have been considered.

The question whether a written contract of employment is entire or severable is, of course, one for the court. Crawford v. Surety Invest. Co. 91 Kan. 748, 139 Pac. 481.

b. When recovery is denied.

It has been held that a broker authorized to sell an entire tract at a certain price per acre cannot recover commission for procuring a purchaser willing to pay the price per acre for only a part of the tract. Martin v. Crumb, 158 App. Div. 228, 142 N. Y. Supp. 1096, motion for reargument denied in 158 App. Div. 939, 143 N. Y. Supp. 1130.

And under the following circumstances it was held that a broker authorized to sell an entire tract could not recover commission where he failed to procure a purchaser willing to take the entire property on terms acceptable to the owner, and the latter subsequently sold to the purchaser part only of the property:

—where a broker having authority to sell a lot at a certain price found a purchaser who made a lower offer, which the owner refused, but the owner subsequently sold the customer for a lower price the half of the lot on which the buildings were located, it being held also that the fact that the portion sold by the owner was the more valuable by reason of having the improvements, and was sold for $5,250, whereas the price for the entire property was $6,500, did not render the completed transaction such a substantial performance of the broker's contract as to affect the rule that he was not entitled to commission because he had not made a sale of the entire property. Yerkes v. Osborne, 42 Pa. Super. Ct. 253;

—where a broker was authorized to sell a certain tract consisting of two parcels, and a sale was made of only one of the parcels, recovery being denied on the ground that the broker was not the procuring cause an amount alleged to be due as commissions for procuring a purchaser for certain land. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. John Ott for appellants.

Messrs. O'Brien, Young, & Stone, for respondents:

The contract was entire for the sale of both tracts, or all of either one of them. No commission could be earned by selling a part only of either tract.

of the sale, and that the contract was indivisible and there had not been complete performance. Cone v. Keil, 18 Cal. App. 675, 124 Pac. 548;

—where a broker having authority to sell a lot entered into negotiations with a purchaser which failed and were dropped because the terms were too high, and the owner subsequently, without further effort on the part of the broker, sold half of the lot to the purchaser. Frenzer v. Lee, 3 Neb. (Unof.) 69, 90 N. W. 914;

—where a broker was able to find purchasers for only two portions of a tract of land, and after the lapse of a reasonable time the owner, independently of the broker, sold the two portions to the purchasers which the broker had found. Carpenter v. Atlas Improv. Co. 123 App. Div. 706, 108 N. Y. Supp. 547, before court on another point in 132 App. Div. 112, 116 N. Y. Supp. 454.

—where a broker employed by a trustee to sell an entire property, only part of which belonged to the trustee, procured a purchaser, but the deal failed because the owner of the balance of the property refused to sell, and the trustee sold that part of the property which he owned to the broker's customer. Diamond v. Wheeler, 80 App. Div. 58, 80 N. Y. Supp. 416;

—where the agent's contract to sell real estate provided for a commission of a certain per cent on a sale of at least 200 acres, and after procuring a purchaser for 150 acres, the agent with others became joint purchasers of another 150 acres, and paid therefor, but the contract of sale was rescinded and the purchase money returned at the request of the purchasers, including the agent. Shinn v. Boyd, 34 Tex. Civ. App. 151, 77 S. W. 1027;

—where a broker's contract for the sale of four houses entitled him to receive a commission of one third of all realized above $44,000, and only one of the houses was sold, it being held, however, simply that the broker was not entitled to recover a commission of one third of the amount realized in excess of the $11,000 received for the sale of the one house, and not that the broker was barred from recovery of any 51 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Bunn, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This action was brought to recover the sum of $7,705.80 alleged to be due from defendants as commissions for procuring a purchaser for certain Montana land. At the close of the evidence the trial court directed a verdict for defendants. This appeal is from an order denying a new trial.

The complaint alleged in substance that defendants, who were engaged in the land business at St. Paul, on September 3, 1912, employed plaintiffs to find and procure a purchaser for a certain 6,000-acre tract of land, commonly known as the "Frear Tract," situate in Sweetgrass county, Montana, and agreed with plaintiffs that they should have as their commission all sums commission. Mayer v. Haaren, 25 Jones & S. 574, 5 N. Y. Supp. 436;

—where a contract entitled the broker to a commission of $100 if he found a purchaser for a farm of 200 acres, and the broker found a purchaser for only 117 acres. Weber v. Clark, 24 Minn. 354;

—where the contract authorized the broker to sell a certain tract for one fourth of the profit of resale, and only 831 acres out of 1,167 acres had been sold, and another tract of 200 acres, which had been taken in exchange as part of the consideration, was still unsold, it being held that the action for a share of the profits was prematurely brought, as the contract employment was indivisible. Crawford v. Surety Invest. Co. 91 Kan. 748, 139 Pac. 481.

A broker who finds a purchaser for an entire property, to whom the owner sells only a part of the property, is not entitled to recover the stipulated commission as for a sale of the entire property, unless the customer was able and willing to pay the price at which the broker was authorized to sell. Ball v. Dolan, 18 S. D. 558, 101 N. W. 719.

Under a contract entitling the broker to a certain commission upon his procuring for the principal a deed to an undivided half interest in certain land, the broker is not entitled to commission pro tanto upon the principal's securing a deed to a one-third interest in the property. Witte v. Taylor, 110 Cal. 224, 42 Pac. 807.

In the headnote to Fletcher v. McMillan, 132 Ga. 477, 64 S. E. 268, the court stated that if one undertook to purchase for another a body of timber including several tracts, to be paid for in an entire amount, and received a certain sum which he agreed to repay if he failed "to procure the timber from the owner," the contract was entire, and was not performed by the procuring only of a portion of the timber.

A contract authorizing a broker to sell land belonging to three parties as tenants in common was construed in Johnson v. Sirret, 153 N. Y. 51, 46 N. E. 1035, as entitling the broker to commission only on a joint sale by all the tenants in common, in excess of $10 per acre; that plaintiffs thereafter procured a purchaser for part of the land, and so notified defendants, who thereafter communicated with and sold to such purchaser 2,568.18 acres of said land for $13 an acre. Judgment was demanded for the excess of $3 per acre, or $7,705.60. The defendants answered separately. The answer of defendant Felthous was a general denial, with a specific denial of an allegation of the complaint that he and defendant Edwards were copartners. The answer of defendant Edwards, in addition to such denials, alleged that the contract of employment on which the complaint was based consisted of two letters written by defendant Edwards to plaintiff Cronan, and the latter's assent thereto. These letters, which admittedly constituted the contract between the parties, were as follows:

August 31, 1912.

Mr. William Cronan,
Palace Building, Minneapolis, Minn.

Dear Sir:—

We herewith hand you checkings and blueprint showing one tract of 6,000 acres and one tract of 9,515 acres of land in Sweetgrass county, Montana. If you have any clients looking for tracts of land of the size of these either one of them will surely suit them. Price of the two tracts together or either separately is $10 per acre net to us. Whatever commission you desire to make will have to be added to this price.

and not on a transfer by only one of the tenants of an undivided interest in the property.

c. When recovery is allowed.

In some instances it has been held that a contract to sell real estate was severable, so that the broker was entitled to commission upon a sale or exchange of part only of the property. An illustration of a severable contract to exchange real estate is shown in Goodspeed v. Miller, 98 Minn. 457, 108 N. W. 817, where a broker offered to exchange hotel property for land, and subsequently wrote a letter to the landowner in which, after referring to the hotel deal, he stated that he had also a stock of dry goods to exchange for land, and that "both deals had to be right now." The deal for the merchandise was never consummated, but recovery was allowed on a note given for an amount which, estimated at the stipulated rate of $1 per acre, would equal the number of acres exchanged for the hotel property.

Also, under the following circumstances it was held that the broker's contract to sell real estate was severable, so as to entitle the broker to commission upon the sale to one procured by him of a part only of the property:

—where the owner of three parcels of land agreed to pay a broker for his services if he would furnish an acceptable trade, stating in the contract, "I would trade a portion or all," and the broker procured one who agreed to exchange certain property for the three parcels, but the deal as concluded omitted one of the parcels because of a lien on the other party's land. Blair v. Slosson, 27 Tex. Civ. App. 403, 66 S. W. 112;

—where the broker's contract to sell certain oil property provided that the negotiations were to be carried on by the owner, and that the broker should receive as commission a certain per cent of the amount received for the property, no price being fixed in the contract. Bowman v. Hartman, 27 Ohio C. C. 309;

Mr. William Cronan,
Minneapolis, Minn.

Dear Sir:—

In putting the 6,000-acre tract of land in Sweetgrass county, Montana, up at $10 per acre net to us, it is understood that there is 50 cents per acre to be divided equally between you and ourselves in case you sell at that price. On the 9,515 acres, if you sell it at $10 net, it is understood that there is $.40 per acre to be equally divided between us. In addition to this whatever you get above $10 per acre you are to retain.

Yours very truly,
J. G. Edwards Land Co.,
by J. G. E.

The reply admitted the writing and delivery of the two letters to plaintiff Cronan. The evidence showed that the letters and acceptance were intended to be the sole evidence of the contract of the parties, and that plaintiffs Bentley and Parsons were jointly interested in the venture with Cronan. Plaintiffs testified that, on the day the letters were delivered, they gave to defendant Edwards the names of certain Montana men who were in the market for a tract of land. The 6,000-acre tract was not owned by Edwards or Felthous; but they or one of them had the exclusive

II. Recovery on quantum meruit.

Where suit was brought by a broker upon the contract, and the proof showed only partial performance by sale of only part of the tract, recovery upon quantum meruit was denied in Veatch v. Norman, 109 Mo. App. 387, 84 S. W. 350. It was said that, having elected to stand upon a special contract, the broker could not recover upon quantum meruit, though the proof might otherwise warrant a recovery upon that theory.

Recovery by a broker of the reasonable value of his services was also denied in Boyd v. Big Three Ranch Co. 22 Cal. App. 108, 136 Pac. 623, where a broker was given authority to sell a ranch consisting of a number of separate tracts, and procured a purchaser for only one of the tracts, to whom the owner made a sale.

But a broker employed by the defendant to sell an undivided half interest in real estate was held in Burdon v. Briquet, 125 Wis. 341, 104 N. W. 83, entitled to recover on quantum meruit the reasonable value of his services, where the price for the property and the amount of commission were not agreed upon in the contract of employment, and the defendant and his cotenant, with whom the broker had had negotiations for the property, made a deal by which the cotenant bought the defendant's interest in the larger part of the tract, and the balance was divided between them.

And where a broker employed to purchase an entire estate was unable at once to obtain title to the whole property, as it belonged to different parties, but there was evidence tending to show that he did obtain a conveyance of an undivided third, which his principal accepted, and that the latter finally obtained the title to the whole estate, it was held in Giles v. Swift, 170 Mass. 461, 49 N. E. 737, that the broker was entitled, in an action for commission, to go to the jury on the question whether the principal did not accept partial performance under such circumstances 51 L.R.A. (N.S.)

as to bind him to pay what the broker's services were reasonably worth.

III. Miscellaneous.

A complaint alleging that the defendant employed the plaintiff to sell certain forest land for a commission of 5 per cent in case of a sale of the property for a sum not less than $500,000, and in addition thereto the excess received for the property over that amount, and that the plaintiff negotiated "a sale of said premises" to a certain party, who, as a result of the negotiations, purchased "the said property," and that the amount to be paid "for the timber alone" was $550,000, and the "fee of the land with timber removed" was and is worth $100,000, and that therefor the plaintiff is entitled to $175,000 commission, is not subject to demurrer on the ground that it alleges a sale only of the timber, whereas the plaintiff's contract was for sale of the entire property. Ostrander v. Blandin, 211 Fed. 733.

In Stiewel v. Lally, 89 Ark. 195, 115 S. W. 1134, and Stewart v. Mather, 32 Wis. 344, on facts not within the scope of this note, it was said that where the terms of sale are fixed by the vendor, in accordance with which the broker produces a purchaser, and in negotiations between the purchaser and the vendor, the latter voluntarily reduces the price or the quantity, the broker is entitled to commission at the rate specified in his contract of employment.

In Blake v. Stump, 73 Md. 160, 10 L.R.A. 103, 20 Atl. 788, it was held that where a real estate broker undertook to sell a house and lot, and succeeded only in disposing of the house and leasing the lot upon a reserved ground rent, he was entitled to commission only on the cash actually received, and not on the value of the whole property, unless the owner contracted expressly or by implication to pay more.

sale thereof under contract with the owner. Plaintiffs told Edwards that the Montana people had been dealing for a 9,000-acre tract for which they were to pay $60,000 as a down payment, but that the deal had fallen through, and that he thought Edwards could get "about $30,000 together there;" this sum presumably referring to a down payment.

Late in September, 1912, defendants Edwards and Felthous went to Milbank, Montana. J. C. Felthous & Company, a corporation, had purchased the 6,000-acre tract, and Edwards was equally interested with Felthous in the profits of the transaction. They had negotiations for the sale of the tract to Milbank Montana Land Company, a corporation in which the men whom plaintiffs claimed to have mentioned to Edwards as possible purchasers were interested. These negotiations culminated on October 24th in a sale by the Felthous Company to the Montana Company of 2,568.18 acres of the 6,000-acre tract, at a price of $13 per acre. The rest of the tract was not sold, and still remains the property of the Felthous Company. Defendants claimed on the trial that plaintiffs were in no way instrumental in procuring the purchaser or purchasers to whom this sale was made; but this question was on the evidence for the jury.

The verdict was directed on the ground that the contract upon which plaintiff seeks to recover was never performed; that is, that plaintiffs agreed to find a purchaser for the 6,000-acre tract as a whole, while the purchaser procured by them was ready, able, and willing to take but a fraction of the tract.

1. Plaintiff contends, in the first place, that the issue of entirety of contract was not raised in the answer of either defendant, and therefore that such a defense was waived. There is nothing in this point. Plaintiff sued on a contract, but did not set it out verbatim. The answer of defendant Edwards set out in full the writings constituting the contract sued on. Whether this contract was entire or severable appeared from the writings themselves, and it was neither necessary nor proper to plead the legal conclusion that defendant drew therefrom. There was nothing by way of new matter in the nature of confession and avoidance, nor was it claimed that the contract alleged in the complaint was invalid by reason of extrinsic facts, or that the services of plaintiff were performed under any other contract.

2. Was the contract entire or severable? That is, were plaintiffs obliged, in order to perform their agreement, to find a purchaser for the entire tract, or would it be a performance pro tanto, if they found a purchaser for any number of acres of the tract less than the whole? This question, one of the intention of the parties, must be determined from the language of the letters, construed in the light of the surrounding circumstances. The first letter (dated August 31st, but written and delivered with the second letter on September 3d) says: "If you have any clients looking for tracts of land of the size of these, either one of them will surely suit them. Price of the two tracts together or either separately is $10 per acre net to us." The second letter says: "In putting the 6,000-acre tract . . . up at $10 per acre net to us . . . there is 50 cents per acre to be equally divided between you and ourselves in case you sell at that price. On the 9,515 acres, if you sell it at $10 net . . . there is 40 cents per acre to be divided equally between us." At the time the contract was entered into, the 6,000-acre tract was owned in its entirety by one individual, and defendants were agents for its sale. It is clear, in our opinion, that the contract was entire, and not severable. The mere fact that the price named was so much per acre is not important, any more than would be the sale of a lot or lots on a city street at so much per front foot. It is quite usual to name the price of a tract of land at so much per acre, whether the precise acreage be known or not, just as it is customary to ascertain the value of a thing sold by weight or measure. "The mere fact that the subject of the contract is sold by weight or measure, and the value is ascertained by the price affixed to each pound or yard or bushel of the quantity contracted for, will not be sufficient to render the contract severable." 2 Parsons, Contr. 8th ed. 636. See also Johnson v. Fehsefeldt, 106 Minn. 202, 20 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1069, 118 N. W. 797. We think that the letters contain no authority to plaintiffs to sell any part of either tract less than the whole.

3. The contract being entire, can it be apportioned? On principle there is but one answer to this question. There can be no apportionment of an entire contract. As stated by Parsons, the question of apportionment always addresses itself to a contract which has already been ascertained not to be single and entire. Such question can never arise when it is once determined that the contract is entire. It is pretty well-settled law that, in case of an entire contract, part performance does not entitle a party to pro rata compensation, unless full performance is prevented by the other party. And this principle is applicable to a claim of commissions by a broker. Where his compensation is to be paid by commissions, the whole services or duty must be performed before any right to commissions arises, unless the act of the principal has prevented performance. Hyams v. Miller, 71 Ga. 608. See note to Lunney v. Healey, 44 L.R.A. 593.

The model opinion of former Chief Justice Gilfillan in Weber v. Clark, 24 Minn. 354, seems conclusive of the question here. We quote it in full, as it is impossible to otherwise state the decision: "Defendant owned a farm of 200 acres, and agreed to pay Weber $100 if he would find a purchaser for it. Weber found a purchaser for 117 acres of the farm, who purchased that quantity from defendant. Weber sued for $100. Clearly he was not entitled to recover anything. The contract was entire the Weber should find a purchaser for the whole farm, and that for doing so defendant should pay him $100. Weber was not entitled to anything until he performed his part of the contract, and found a purchaser willing to buy the whole farm. This he did not do. Judgment affirmed."

It is urged that Weber v. Clark was wrongly decided and should be overruled. We think the decision is sound and should be followed. The case has been cited with approval by text-books and courts. 1 Notes on Minn. Rep. 1156. The principle involved is elementary. A broker is not entitled to compensation until he has performed the undertaking assumed by him. 19 Cyc. 240. The undertaking assumed by plaintiffs was to procure a purchaser for the entire 6,000-acre tract. This they did not do. There was nothing in the contract that authorized a sale of a portion of the tract, nor was there any subsequent modification of the contract either in writing or by parol. The mere fact that defendants sold to the purchaser brought to them by plaintiffs a portion of the tract does not, in the absence of a new contract, or conduct of the parties that would justify the inference that the original contract was modified, show performance by plaintiffs of their agreement. The rule of Weber v. Clark was applied in Illingsworth v. Slosson, 19 Ill. App. 612; Carpenter v. Atlas Lumber Co. 123 App. Div. 706, 108 N. Y. Supp. 547; Veatch v. Norman, 109 Mo. App. 387, 84 S. W. 350. Plaintiffs cited Woods v. Stephens, 46 Mo. 555, as holding otherwise. The case is distinguishable in that the broker fulfilled his contract so far as he was permitted by the owner, and the contract was modified. They further rely on a class of authorities holding substantially that, where a broker introduces a purchaser, and the seller conducts negotiations with him and finally sells the property for a less sum or on 51 L.R.A. (N.S.) different terms than named in the contract of employment, the broker is entitled to a commission. Hubachek v. Hazzard, 83 Minn. 437, 86 N. W. 426; 19 Cyc. 249, and cases cited; Ball v. Dolan, 15 L.R.A. (N.S.) 272 note. But where, as in the case at bar, the broker is to have as his compensation all in excess of a certain named price, and the purchaser he finds is unwilling to pay anything in excess of the price named, a sale to such purchaser at such price or a less sum will not entitle the broker to compensation. Holcomb v. Stafford, 102 Minn. 233, 113 N. W. 449; 19 Cyc. 241, note 78. This is because the broker's right to compensation is by the contract made conditional on the price received. In case of a sale at a less price he has not performed his contract, or earned his compensation. The principle of the line of cases of which Hubachek v. Hazzard is an example is that the contract does not make the broker's right to compensation dependent upon a sale at a net price to the owner, but leaves the price and terms of the sale subject to modification by the owner. The distinction is obvious. The principle of Hubachek v. Hazzard is not in point here, while the rule of Holcomb v. Stafford is mainly important as an application of the general rule that, to entitle the broker to compensation, he must perform his agreement.

4. The contention of plaintiffs that has the most merit, as far as natural justice is concerned, is that they should be paid the reasonable value of the services they performed, although they did not perform their contract. Of course, the doctrine of substantial performance or that of part performance has no application here. Defendants did not prevent performance by plaintiffs. So far as appears, plaintiffs might still have earned their commission by finding a purchaser for the rest of the tract. Whether there can be a recovery on a quantum meruit except in cases where a recovery is warranted under the principles of substantial performance, or part performance, is a question that is not presented by the pleadings or the evidence, and we do not decide it. Plaintiffs are not seeking to recover on an implied promise or quantum meruit. They declare in their complaint upon an express contract, and make no mention of the reasonable value of any services they performed. As a question of pleading, they could not recover on a quantum meruit if objection had been made seasonably. 1 Dunnell, Dig. § 1904. And no attempt was made to prove the reasonable value of plaintiffs' services.

Our conclusion is that the trial court was right in directing a verdict for the defendants.

Order affirmed.

NEBRASKA SUPREME COURT.

ANNA SCHMIDT

v.

WILLIAMSBURG CITY FIRE INSURANCE COMPANY OF BROOKLYN, NEW YORK, Appt.

Trial — directed verdict — propriety.

1. Unless plaintiff and defendant at the close of the evidence each request a directed verdict in his favor, the district court is not authorized to determine disputed questions of fact. If such a request is made by one party alone, it is only when the testimony on behalf of the other party will not support his cause of action or his defense that the court may direct the jury to render a verdict in favor of the moving party.

Headnotes by LETTON, J.

Note. — Does failure of the insurer to speak or act after notice of breach of policy constitute a waiver thereof.

The early cases upon the question considered in the present note are covered in the note to Phenix Ins. Co. v. Grove, 25 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1, and this note is merely supplementary to that.

For a note on return of premium as condition of cancellation of insurance, see Davidson v. German Ins. Co. 13 L.R.A. (N.S.) 885.

As to waiver of return of unearned premium as a condition of cancellation of insurance, see note to Buckley v. Citizens' Ins. Co. 13 L.R.A. (N.S.) 889.

As to right of insured to return of premium where policy is void or voidable because of misrepresentation on his part, see note to Metropolitan L. Ins. Co. v. Freedman, 32 L.R.A. (N.S.) 298.

As to effect of fraud of an applicant for membership in a benefit insurance society on the obligation of the society to return what has been paid as assessments or dues before it can claim the contract unenforceable, see note to Taylor v. Grand Lodge, A. O. U. W. 3 L.R.A. (N.S.) 114.

As to waiver of provision as to change of occupation by continued receipt of dues, see note to Johnson v. Modern Brotherhood, 27 L.R.A. (N.S.) 446.

Knowledge acquired after loss.

The rule stated in the early note, that where notice of the breach of a condition of a policy before loss does not reach the insurer until after loss, mere silence or non-action on the part of the latter will not 51 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Insurance — vacancy — notice to agent — effect.

2. Notice and knowledge of the existence of a vacancy in the insured premises, or of the occurrence of a fire in the same to such an extent as to make them uninhabitable, communicated to the local agent of the defendant, authorized to issue policies and transact the usual business of a recording agency, is the knowledge of the insurance company.

Same — return of premium — surrender of policy.

3. Where a policy provides the policy "shall be void . . . if a building herein described, whether intended for occupancy by owner or tenant, be or become vacant or unoccupied and so remain for ten days," and also provides: "If this policy shall . . . become void or cease, the premium having been actually paid, the unearned portion shall be returned on surrender of this policy or last renewal, this company retaining the customary short rate"—the company is not bound to return any unearned premium, unless the policy is surrendered.

Same — offer for policy — waiver of surrender.

4. Where, under such policy, the insurer operate to bind it, has been applied in subsequent cases.

Thus, it has been held that an insurer is not estopped in an action on a fidelity bond from setting up a breach of a condition binding the insured to require its employee to furnish certain reports and statements, because of its failure to return the premiums, where it had no knowledge of the breach of the condition until after the loss. Marion Iron & Brass Bed Co. v. Empire State Surety Co. — Ind. App. —, 100 N. E. 882.

And a forfeiture by reason of a breach of the condition against encumbrances is not waived, nor is the insurer precluded from setting it up in defense of a suit on the policy by the failure to return the premium before suit was instituted, where it had no knowledge of the breach until after the loss occurred. Capital F. Ins. Co. v. Shearwood, 87 Ark. 326, 112 S. W. 878; and to the same effect is Home F. Ins. Co. v. Wilson, — Ark. —, 159 S. W. 1113.

So, where the insurer has no knowledge, prior to the loss, of a violation of the "iron safe" clause, and there is nothing in the contract of insurance requiring a payment of the premium after it ceases to be a continuing insurance by reason of a loss, before it can set up a breach of its conditions, the insurer may claim a forfeiture and at the same time retain the unearned premium. Robinson v. Aetna F. Ins. Co. 135 Ala. 650, 34 So. 18.

And to the same effect is Security Ins. Co. v. Laird, — Ala. —, 62 So. 182, where there was a breach of the additional insurance clause.

And in Benanti v. Delaware Ins. Co. 86 Conn. 15, 84 Atl. 109, Ann. Cas. 1913D, 826, under a policy providing that it should be has no notice or knowledge of the breach of a condition in the policy making it void in case the premises are vacant or unoccupied for more than ten days, and did not learn until after the premises were totally destroyed that the building had been so damaged by previous fires as to be uninhabitable, and had so remained for several weeks before the loss occurred, the fact that the adjuster for the company, while declaring that the policy was void, and that the insurer was not liable, offered a larger sum than the unearned premium for a surrender of the policy does not of itself constitute a waiver of the forfeiture.

void if the insured misrepresented his interest in the property, it was held that if the insurer retains the premium prior to a loss after it knows of a breach of the condition, the right to avoid the policy is waived; but that if the knowledge of the breach comes to the insurer after the loss, its retention of the premium after such knowledge will not amount to a waiver.

But in Rhodus v. Kansas City L. Ins. Co. 156 Mo. App. 281, 137 S. W. 907, there was held to be a waiver of a provision that the contract should be null and void unless the application was passed upon and the policy delivered during the applicant's lifetime and while in good health, where the insurer's agent, after notice of the applicant's death, received payment of the premium note and forwarded it to the insurer, which received and kept it after knowledge of the facts. (Generally as to waiver of stipulation in policy that it shall not become binding unless delivered to insured while in good health, see notes in 17 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1149, and 43 L.R.A.(N.S.) 727.)

And the insurer is estopped from setting up a violation of a provision that a fire policy shall be void if other insurance is obtained on the property without its consent where its agent, after a loss occurred, with knowledge that there was other insurance in force which the insurer had not consented to, collected and remitted the premium and delivered the policy, and the insurer failed to return the premium. Rogers v. Connecticut F. Ins. Co. 157 Mo. App. 671, 139 S. W. 285.

And in Manning v. Connecticut F. Ins. Co. 176 Mo. App. 678, 159 S. W. 750, there was held to be a waiver of a breach of the unconditional ownership clause where the insurer received and retained the premium with full knowledge on the part of its agent, on the day of the fire, of the breach.

And the retention of premiums after knowledge of a breach of a condition as to the insured's health, apparently obtained after loss, ratifies the contract, although it provides that it shall be void in case of a breach of such condition, and also provides that the premiums shall be forfeited to the County in plaintiff's favor in an action on a fire insurance policy. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

In Brashears v. Perry County Farmers' Protective Ins. Co. 51 Ind. App. 8, 98 N. E. 889, where a policy provided that vacation of the insured property should suspend the risk, but that it should be revived upon notice of reoccupation, and a by-law required the insurer to affirmatively signify its intention to terminate the policy by giving notice in case of a breach of its conditions, it was held that a breach of the condition mentioned was waived by the insurer's failure upon notice thereof after loss to give notice of its intention to terminate its liability and offer to return the unearned premium.

Knowledge acquired before loss—breaches rendering policy voidable.

In Western Ins. Co. v. Ashby, — Ind. App. —, 102 N. E. 45, where the policy upon which suit was instituted provided that it should be void if the insured obtained other insurance, and there was a breach of this provision, the court held that the evidence, which showed knowledge of the breach before a loss occurred, warranted a finding of waiver, saying: "The doctrine is well established in this state that a provision in such policy, rendering it void upon certain conditions, means voidable at the option of the insurer; and that to render it void, upon discovery of the facts by which liability may be avoided, it must act with reasonable promptness, must notify the insured of its election to avoid the policy, tender back, or in some appropriate way restore, or offer to restore, the unearned premium received, and upon failure so to do will be deemed to have waived the right to so declare the policy void, and to have elected to treat it as a valid contract of insurance."

And a like result was reached in the following Indiana cases: State L. Ins. Co. v. Jones, 48 Ind. App. 186, 92 N. E. 879 (where

There could be no forfeiture of the policy on account of vacancy during thirty days next after the fire of March 20, 1910, during which time the company had a right to exercise its option to repair.

On a violation of the vacancy clause there must be affirmative action on the part of the company, and it must declare a forfeiture; or, the condition being for its benefit, a failure to declare a forfeiture is a waiver of this condition.

And in Farmers' Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. Hill, 45 Ind. App. 605, 91 N. E. 361, an answer alleging a violation by the insured of the rules and regulations of the association forbidding the insuring of certain buildings having stoves in them was held insufficient in failing to aver a rescission of the contract, or any tender or offer to return the premiums paid.

And in Shutts v. Milwaukee Mechanics' Ins. Co. 159 Mo. App. 436, 141 S. W. 15, the change of location of the insured property without the insurer's consent was held merely to render the contract voidable, and the insurer's right to declare a forfeiture was held to have been waived where, after knowledge of the removal by its agent, it retained the premium and remained silent until a loss occurred.

So, where a policy stipulates that it shall become void if the property is subsequently encumbered, it has been held that the provision is waived and the policy continued in force where the insurer, before loss, has notice of a breach of the condition, but fails to cancel the policy. Kelley v. People's Nat. F. Ins. Co. — Ill. —, — L.R.A.(N.S.) —, 104 N. E. 188.

And the decision in Phenix Ins. Co. v. Grove, 25 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1, was followed in Hollstrom v. Forest City Ins. Co. 168 Ill. App. 214, where the policy provided that if any encumbrance were executed on the insured property, or any change of title should take place, the contract would be void; a breach of this condition by the insured in mortgaging the property was held to be waived where the insurer's agent had notice of the fact before loss, but took no action to avoid the policy. 51 L.R.A.(N.S.)

And where an insurer, after full knowledge before loss of a breach of a condition as to the insured's health, continues to collect and retain the premiums, it waives the right to take advantage of the breach, although the policy provides that it shall be void in case of such breach, and stipulates that all premiums shall be forfeited to the insurer, the provision that the policy shall be void being construed to mean voidable only. Metropolitan L. Ins. Co. v. Johnson, 49 Ind. App. 233, 94 N. E. 785.

And the receipt for over two years of assessments, and the retention of them after knowledge of the falsity of the insured's statement in his application as to his health, estops the insurer from asserting the falsity as a defense. Kidder v. Supreme Assembly, A. S. E. 154 Ill. App. 489.

There is also a dictum in Rogers v. Home Ins. Co. 155 Mo. App. 276, 136 S. W. 743, that if the insurer's agent knows of a violation of a provision that the policy shall become void if additional insurance is obtained, and he makes no move to cancel the policy, but treats it as a subsisting contract, he waives the provision.

—breaches rendering policy void.

Supplementing note in 25 L.R.A.(N.S.) 16.

As stated in the earlier note, where the policy provides that a breach of its conditions shall render it void, and the forfeiture is deemed to be self-executing, mere silence or nonaction will not estop the insurer from taking advantage of the breach.

Thus, in a subsequent case where a policy provided that it should be void if the insured procured other insurance without the insurer's consent, the policy was held to be avoided ipso facto by the obtaining of such insurance, and it was held that the mere failure to cancel the policy after knowledge of the breach by the insurer before loss would not justify a conclusion that the insurer had elected to continue the policy in force. Coppoletti v. Citizens' Ins. Co. 123 Minn. 325, 143 N. W. 787.

It is held that, on receipt of notice from the insured of the vacancy of the insured premises, and a request for a vacancy permit, the insurer is bound to act with reasonable despatch and either issue a permit or cancel the policy and return the unearned premium; and that a failure to do so waives a forfeiture under a provision of the policy that, in the event of the premises becoming vacant, the policy shall be null and void. *Patterson v. W. 618; Jobst v. Hayden Bros. 84 Neb. 735, 50 L.R.A. (N.S.) 501, 121 N. W. 957.

Letton, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Action to recover upon an insurance policy for the total destruction of a house in South Omaha on April 17, 1910. The defense relied upon is that the premises were vacant or unoccupied at the time of the fire, and had been so for more than ten days, and a provision in the contract that the policy "shall be void if the building herein described, whether intended for occupancy by owner or tenant, be or become vacant or unoccupied and so remain for ten days." The reply pleads that the property was partially destroyed by fire within thirty days before April 17, 1910, avers that this rendered the premises uninhabitable; that defendant had the option within thirty days to rebuild or to repair; that it had knowledge of the fire of March 20, 1910, and had not, on April 17th, exercised the option. It further pleads that defendant had not declared a forfeiture of the policy on account of the vacancy, nor returned or tendered the unearned premiums. It also pleads an offer of $150 for the surrender of the policy, and in payment of the loss before suit, and that by this offer defendant waived any breach of the conditions of the policy.

The insured property was occupied as a rooming house. A fire occurred on March 20, which damaged the property to some extent. On March 30, another fire occurred. In extinguishing these fires the contents of the building were materially damaged, and the occupants moved out, leaving one or two old mattresses and a portion of a bedstead in the basement and lower floor. The testimony on behalf of plaintiff is to the effect that the local agent who wrote the policy was notified of the loss by the fire of March 20th, within a day or two after it happened, and that he said he "would look after the matter." The agent, however, unequivocally denies that he had any knowledge or notice of this fire. Nothing was done by the insurance company with respect to repairs, and the plaintiff's agents, Gallagher & Nelson, procured repairs to be made which were finished on the 10th day of April. Proofs of loss were sent in after the fire of April 17th, and soon afterwards Mr. Wilken, the adjuster for the defendant, went to the office of Gallagher & Nelson. Wilken testifies that he then told Gallagher & Nelson the building had been vacant nineteen days or more; that the policy was void, and the company not liable thereon. The policy contained a mortgage clause "loss or damage, if any . . . payable to Lion Bond & Surety Company . . . as interest may appear."

Defendant objected all through the trial that plaintiff was not the real party in interest. The petition alleged that the surety company had given its consent to the action being brought in the plaintiff's name, and the president of that company testified to the same effect. This, we think, was sufficient to show authority to bring the suit. At the close of plaintiff's case, and after the testimony of defendant had been received, defendant moved the court for a directed verdict: First, because from the pleadings judgment must be for the defendant; second, because the action is not brought by the real party in interest; third, because the vacancy condition of the policy was violated, and the policy was not in force on April 17, 1910. The court overruled this motion. Apparently upon its own motion the court then instructed the jury, in substance, that the defendant was not in a condition to claim that the policy had become without force until it had returned or tendered the return of the unearned premium, and therefore the insurance contract was still in force, and recognized at all times afterwards, as being in force, between the parties, and further directed it to return a verdict in favor of plaintiff for $844.38, being the face of the policy, with interest.

The plaintiff argues that the judgment of the district court was right for two reasons: First, that where one party moves for a directed verdict, the district court is thereby invited to settle and determine any questions of fact in the case necessary to a determination of the motion, relying upon certain cases in the state of New York; second, that, having determined that the company had notice of the fire of March 20th and failed to exercise its option to repair, it could not take advantage of the fact that the house was vacant and uninhabited by reason of the damage caused by the former fire. In the latter contention she relies upon the opinion in the case of Lancashire Ins. Co. v. Bush, 60 Neb. 116, 82 N. W. 313. The principle of that case cannot apply unless the court was entitled to decide, as a matter of fact, that proper notice was given to the company on the occurrence of the former fire, so that it might exercise the option of either paying the amount of the loss or making the repairs itself, and that such a fire rendered the building untenable. We have decided that where plaintiff and defendant each request the court to direct a verdict, this amounts to a submission of the case to the court upon the questions of both law and fact. Davison v. Land, 89 Neb. 58, 130

N. W. 848; Adler v. Royal Neighbors, 90 Neb. 56, 132 N. W. 716, Ann. Cas. 1912D, 974. We have never held that a request for a directed verdict by one party alone has the effect of submitting all questions of fact in the case to the court for its determination. On the contrary, we have uniformly held that, "if there be any testimony before the jury by which a finding in favor of the party on whom rests the burden of proof can be upheld, the court is not at liberty to disregard it, and direct a verdict against him. And the converse of this is true." Grant v. Cropsey, 8 Neb. 205; Hunt v. State Ins. Co. 66 Neb. 125, 92 N. W. 921, and cases cited. And also, that this "court will regard as conclusively established every fact favorable to the unsuccessful party which the evidence proves or tends to establish." Preston v. Stover, 70 Neb. 632, 97 N. W. 812. We prefer to adhere to the rule adopted in this state rather than to announce a new one. It seems clear that it was the province of the jury to determine whether the testimony of the witness Dickey that he notified Mr. Gibson, the local agent who issued the policy, of the fire of March 20th, established the giving of the notice, or whether the absolute denial by Gibson of the giving of any such notice proved that no notice was ever given. Unless, therefore, the case is determined upon other grounds, we think this question should have been submitted to the jury. Of course this error would not be prejudicial if we should take the view the learned district court did, that since no offer was made to return the unearned premium, the policy was still in force at the time of the fire, although the company had no notice or knowledge that the property was vacant.

Plaintiff argues that it was the duty of the company, in order to avoid liability, to declare a forfeiture, and that a failure to do this waived the condition. Plaintiff relies upon the cases of Home F. Ins. Co. v. Kuhlman, 58 Neb. 488, 76 Am. St. Rep. 111, 78 N. W. 936; Hunt v. State Ins. Co. supra, and Farmers' & M. Ins. Co. v. Bodge, 76 Neb. 31, 106 N. W. 1004, 110 N. W. 1018. In the Hunt Case "the evidence tended to show that the local recording agent of the defendant had full notice and knowledge of the change of occupants and of the vacancy at the time of such change, long prior to the loss, and that after he had such notice the defendant treated the policy as in force by indorsing a mortgage clause thereon. With respect to the alleged vacancy at the time of the loss, the evidence showed that the tenant in possession of the premises had been ordered to move, and had moved out the day of the loss; the fire occurring at night, not many hours thereafter." The 61 L.R.A.(N.S.)

court held that under these circumstances notice to the local agent was notice to the insurer, and that the indorsement of the mortgage clause upon the policy with such notice was inconsistent with an intention to insist upon a forfeiture.

In the Kuhlman Case the facts were that the fire occurred on April 11th, and on April 13th the secretary of the insurance company sent a letter to Mrs. Kuhlman, inclosing a draft for the return premium under the policy, reciting: "Said policy being this day canceled on our books, and our liability terminating thereunder from and after this date." This letter being written after the fire, the court held "it was written for the express purpose of terminating the contract, and on the assumption that the contract was then in full force and effect," and sustained the recovery. Of course, if the policy was not canceled until two days after the fire, it was in force on that day, and was so recognized by the company in this correspondence.

In the Bodge Case the insurance company became aware of the vacancy after the loss; it thereupon returned the unearned premium and canceled the policy. The court first held (76 Neb. 31, 106 N. W. 1004, 110 N. W. 1018) that under a vacancy provision the policy does not become absolutely void upon a violation of the conditions, unless the insurer chooses to take advantage of the forfeiture, and where, after loss, the insurer, with information of the loss, as well as breach of the conditions, cancels the policy and retains the premium, it will be held to be a waiver of the breach. On rehearing (76 Neb. 35, 110 N. W. 1018), however, this opinion was vacated, and it was held that "the cancellation of a policy of insurance after loss and notice of facts occurring before loss, constituting a forfeiture, coupled with the return of unearned premium from date of forfeiture, does not constitute a waiver of the forfeiture." In that case, as in this, at the time the policy was issued the building covered by the insurance was occupied by a tenant. It later became vacant, and was vacant at the time of the loss. The court cited Sexton v. Hawkeye Ins. Co. 69 Iowa, 99, 28 N. W. 462, and Republic County Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. Johnson, 69 Kan. 146, 105 Am. St. Rep. 157, 76 Pac. 419, 2 Ann. Cas. 20.

In Eagle Fire Co. v. Globe Loan & T. Co. 44 Neb. 380, 62 N. W. 895, also relied upon by plaintiff, the insured violated the policy by procuring additional insurance without the knowledge or consent of the insurer. The court held that the insurer was entitled on discovering the violation to cancel the policy, the cancellation to take effect from and after the date of the violation. "But the insurance company did not do this. By its own act it canceled the policy on the 24th of November, . . . the day after the date of the loss." The facts, it will be seen, are substantially the same as in the Kuhlman Case, and hence the company was properly held to have waived the conditions. We hold, therefore, that any insurance company, if without knowledge of the breach of a condition against vacancies until after a fire has occurred, may, if it has not waived the forfeitures, insist upon the same.

Plaintiff's argument that it was never intended the policy should become void by the premises standing vacant for a reasonable time for change of tenants, we think is not tenable. The policy does not show the property was to be occupied by a tenant, and it is provided that the policy shall be void, whether intended for occupancy by the owner or tenant, if remaining vacant or unoccupied for ten days. That empty dwellings are ordinarily extrahazardous—to use an insurance term—as compared with those occupied either by owners or tenants is a matter of common knowledge, and conditions avoiding the policy if such vacancy continues for more than ten days may be enforced at the election of the insurer. The clause relating to the tenancy was evidently inserted to cover the very point contended for by the plaintiff. Moreover, the vacancy was not caused by a change of tenants, but by the premises being out of repair.

As to the contention that the company recognized the policy as being in force by failing to return the unearned premium. We held, in Farmers' Mut. Ins. Co. v. Home F. Ins. Co. 54 Neb. 740, 74 N. W. 1101, in a case where the insured had violated the provisions of the policy by procuring additional insurance without the knowledge or consent of the insurer, and the action was brought to recover unearned premiums for the unexpired term of the policy, that the insurance company had the right to treat the policy as void when it ascertained the breach, "but Penner's violation of his insurance contract did not invest him with a right of action against the home company to recover the premium which he had paid the company therefor, or any part of that premium. The contract of insurance did not provide that, if the insurer declared it to be at an end because of Penner's violation of its provisions in procuring additional insurance on the insured property without the consent of the home company, it would repay Penner the unearned premium: nor is this the meaning of the statute constructively incorporated into and made a part of the policy."

51 L.R.A. (N.S.).

Perhaps as clear a statement of the legal principles as we have found is the case of Pearlstone v. Westchester F. Ins. Co. 70 S. C. 75, 49 S. E. 4, in which that court says: "Where, however, the premium is paid, and in consideration of it the company contemporaneously issues its policy, which is a contract to insure on certain conditions therein mentioned, and the insured violates those conditions in a material particular without the knowledge of the insurer, in case of loss the insurer is not bound to return the consideration of the policy before standing upon its terms. The consideration has been paid, not for an absolute promise, but for a promise of the insurer to hold itself liable for loss on certain conditions. The company does not fail in its promise by insisting on its conditions; not having broken its contract, it has a right to retain the consideration. The insured has received all he contracted and paid for,—conditional insurance,—and he has no right to demand a return of the price paid from the insurer, on pain of liability for unconditional insurance. After the loss occurs as to the property destroyed, the policy is no longer current, but has become matured by reason of the fire, and no question of good faith is involved in retaining the premium, because the rights of the parties are then fixed." The following cases are in accordance with the principles announced: Phoenix Ins. Co. v. Stevenson, 78 Ky. 150; Robinson v. Aetna F. Ins. Co. 135 Ala. 650, 34 So. 18; Smith v. Continental Ins. Co. 6 Dak. 433, 43 N. W. 810; Houdeck v. Merchants' & B. Ins. Co. 102 Iowa, 303, 71 N. W. 354; Harris v. Royal Canadian Ins. Co. 53 Iowa, 236, 5 N. W. 124; A. M. Todd Co. v. Farmers' Mut. F. Ins. Co. 137 Mich. 188, 100 N. W. 442; Alabama State Mut. Assur. Co. v. Long Clothing Sign & Shoe Co. 123 Ala. 667, 26 So. 655; Shuggart v. Lycoming F. Ins. Co. 55 Cal. 408; 2 Clement, Fire Ins. rule, 52, p. 431.

Braschars v. Perry County Farmers' Protective Ins. Co. 51 Ind. App. 8, 98 N. E. 889, cited by plaintiff, relates to a farmers' mutual company. The vacancy condition in the policy did not by its terms render the policy absolutely void, and the ruling of the court seems to be based upon the existence of a by-law requiring affirmative notice of the cancellation to be given by the insurer. We think it is not an authority in opposition to the above cases.

Mr. Gallagher testifies that Mr. Wilken, the plaintiff's adjuster, came to his office and said that he had viewed the property and made an offer of $150; "that he would give $150 if we would surrender the policy to him. I told him we would not consider it; that the policy was not then in our possession; held by the Lion Bonding Company." Mr. Wilken testifies with reference to this conversation with Gallagher and Nelson: "I told them that I had investigated the loss, and had found that the property was vacant at the time the fire occurred, and had been for something over nineteen days, and that the company was not liable, but that it would probably cost—I don't know exactly what we figured it—from $125 to $250 to have it determined by the courts, and that I preferred to pay it to the insured." We are unable to see that this conversation amounted to a waiver of the condition of the policy, especially considering the fact that the policy itself contains the provision, "if this policy shall . . . become void or cease, the premium having been actually paid, the unearned portion shall be returned on surrender of this policy or last renewal, this company retaining the customary short rate."

A similar contention was made in the case of Norris v. Hartford F. Ins. Co. 55 S. C. 450, 74 Am. St. Rep. 765, 33 S. E. 566. That court said: "Nor can we ascribe any potency to the position that defendant is estopped from raising its defense because no part of premium was restored. It is time enough to do this when policy is returned for cancellation; such is the language of the policy itself."

It is contended that the proofs of loss informed the company before it sent the adjuster that the premises were "not occupied pending change of tenants." This is a fact, but the proofs of loss failed to show that the premises had been unoccupied since shortly after the fire of March 20th until April 17th, and less than ten days' vacancy, without the knowledge of the company, would not be a breach of the conditions of the policy. We think no waiver could be based upon knowledge of this statement in the proofs.

We think the case should have been sent to the jury to pass upon the question of fact, presented as to whether notice of the former fire was given to the agent of the defendant. We are also of opinion that the district court erred in instructing the jury as a matter of law that "the insurance contract . . . was still in force, and recognized at all times afterward as being in force between the parties," and in directing it to return a verdict for the plaintiff.

The judgment of the District Court is reversed.

TEXAS SUPREME COURT.

RIGHT OF WAY OIL COMPANY et al.,
Plffs. in Err.,

v.

GLADYS CITY OIL, GAS, & MANUFACTURING COMPANY et al.

(— Tex. —, 157 S. W. 737.)

Railroad — right of way — right to take oil.

1. Where an easement only is conveyed by a grant of right of way, the insertion in a right of way deed of a provision permitting the grantee to take and use all timber, earth, stone, and mineral that may be found within the right of way, does not include the right to take oil found there.

Damages — conversion of oil — cost of production.

2. The owner of the fee from which mineral oil is taken by the owner of a right of way across property may recover what the latter receives from a sale of the oil, in the absence of any evidence showing the cost of bringing it to the surface.

If the railway holds the right of way by voluntary grant, for a consideration, then the words "right of way" are used as descriptive of the land conveyed, and the conveyance serves to vest a fee simple title, subject to whatever limitations and conditions as may be shown in the paper title.

Where a deed is shown to have been prepared by the grantee, and is on a printed form used by the grantee in securing rights of way for a railroad, the ordinary rule in construing deeds, that the same will be construed to pass the greatest estate that the language is susceptible of, to the grantee, does not obtain.

Brown, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This statement will be sufficient for the decision of the question submitted to this court:

The plaintiffs in error are the Right of Way Oil Company, the Texas & New Orleans Railroad Company, and Oswald S. Parker, trustee. The Gladys City Oil, Gas, & Manufacturing Company, the J. M. Guffey Petroleum Company, and the Gulf Pipe Line Company are defendants in error.

We copy from the well-prepared application for writ of error the following clear and comprehensive statement of the case:

"This suit was filed in the district court of Jefferson county, Texas, November 24, 1909, by the Gladys City Oil, Gas, & Manufacturing Company and J. M. Guffey Petroleum Company, as plaintiffs, against the Right of Way Oil Company, Texas & New Orleans Railroad Company, the Gulf Pipe Line Company, and Oswald S. Parker, trustee, being a suit by plaintiffs to establish their ownership and right of possession of a tract of land part of the John A. Veatch survey in Jefferson county, Texas, and for the title and possession of all oil produced therefrom, and for an injunction restraining the defendants, Texas & New Orleans Railroad Company, Right of Way Oil Company, and Oswald S. Parker, trustee, from drilling oil wells on said land and taking oil therefrom, and from asserting any right or claim thereto, and against the Gulf Pipe Line Company for the oil taken from said land by the other defendants and by them run into its pipe line. Pleadings of the parties are voluminous, and are contained in transcript, pages 2 to 40, inclusive; but it was alleged by both plaintiffs and defendants below, and admitted, that defendants below, plaintiffs in error here, held under a deed from S. H. Veatch to East Texas Railway Company, the Texas & New Orleans Railroad Company having succeeded to the title conveyed by said deed to East Texas Railway Company, and having made an operating contract for the developing of oil on the tract of land conveyed by said deed, with Oswald S. Parker, trustee, and the Right of Way Oil Company having developed oil upon said land under the assignment of said operating contract. The effect of said deed is controlling in the case; plaintiffs in error contending that, under said deed, they have the right to develop, take, and use oil from the strip of land described in said deed, and defendants in error contending that no such right exists, but that the title and right to said oil is in them. The facts, as well as the pleadings, are quite fully stated in the opinion filed herein by the court of civil appeals, and will not be restated here; however, the case depending upon the meaning of the deed from S. H. Veatch to East Texas Railway Company, we deem it proper to set same out in full, same being as follows: 'State of Texas, Sabine county. Know all men by these presents: That I, being the owner in fee of the following described tract of land lying in Jefferson county, Texas, to wit: An equal undivided one third of a tract of land containing 19,481,003 square varas, originally granted and titled by the government of Mexico to John A. Veatch as a colonist of Zavalla's Colony, near a place called Sour Springs in said county, and lying between the J. W. Bullock and Pelham Humphries league surveys, except 177 acres in the N. W. corner of said Veatch survey heretofore conveyed by my father, John A. Veatch. For the consideration of $1 to me in hand paid, and the further consideration of the benefits and advantages that will accrue to me by the construction of a railway over said tract of land, have and do hereby grant, sell, and convey unto the East Texas Railway Company, for the purpose of constructing, operating, and maintaining its railroad, the right of way, 200 feet in width, over and upon the above-described tract of land; together with the right to take and use all the timber, earth, stone, and mineral existing, or that may be found, within the right of way hereby granted. To have and to hold to said East Texas Railway Company and its successors, so long as the same or any part thereof may be occupied and used for the purpose of constructing, operating, or maintaining its said railway. In witness whereof, I hereby sign my name, the 29th day of July, 1881. S. H. Veatch. Witness: James B. Nerrew.' (Acknowledgment follows.)

"Trial was had before the court without a jury, and judgment rendered on January 12, 1910, in the district court of Jefferson county in favor of the defendants, who are plaintiffs in error here, quieting them in their title and possession of the 200-foot right of way strip of land described in the above deed, in accordance with the terms thereof, and establishing their right to take and appropriate all of the minerals, including oil, extracted therefrom, etc. (Tr. pp. 40 to 42.) Plaintiffs in the court below appealed to, and the judgment of the trial court was reversed by, the court of civil appeals for the first supreme judicial district at Galveston, and judgment therein rendered, as set forth on pages 25 to 26 in the opinion of the court of civil appeals, as follows, to wit: 'First, that the Texas & New Orleans Railway Company have a right of way across the Veatch survey of 100 feet in width, except that part thereof through the Gladys City tract, as to which it has a right of way 200 feet in width. Second, that the Gladys City Oil, Gas, & Manufacturing Company has the fee simple title to this land, subject to the easement, as aforesaid, of the Texas & New Orleans Railway Company, so long as the same may be used by it as and for railway purposes. Third, that the Texas & New Orleans Railway Company has no right to the oil or other minerals beneath the surface of said strip comprising its right of way as aforesaid, nor to sink wells and extract the same, but that such oil is the property of the Gladys City Oil, Gas, & Manufacturing Company, and of its lessee, the J. M. Guffey Petroleum Company. Fourth, that the said Gladys City Oil, Gas, & Manufacturing Company and the said J. M. Guffey Petroleum Company have no right to go upon said right of way, and occupy the same, for the purpose of sinking wells and extracting the oil. Fifth, that the said appellants recover of the appellees the value, as found by the trial court, of the oil extracted by the Right of Way Oil Company through the well bored by it on the right of way aforesaid. And, sixth, that the Gulf Pipe Line Company have judgment over against the Right of Way Oil Company for whatever amount it may be required to pay under judgment against it. Let the judgment be so entered. Reversed and rendered. [Signed] Reese, Associate Justice.'

"Motion for a rehearing was duly filed in said court by the appellees therein, who are plaintiffs in error here, which motion 51 L.R.A. (N.S.) was overruled by said court of civil appeals on, to wit, May 4, 1911.

"First Ground of Error.

"The honorable court of civil appeals erred, to the prejudice of appellees, in sustaining the first assignment of error of appellants, and in holding, in effect, that the deed from S. H. Veatch to East Texas Railway Company, set out in that court's findings of fact, on page 7 of its opinion, granted merely a right of way for railroad purposes, and did not convey any right to take and use oil or other minerals within said right of way and beneath its surface, and in the adoption and application of the principles of law upon which such conclusion is based, same being the principal issue in this case, and embodied particularly in that part of said court's opinion found on pages 12 to 19, inclusive."

The following articles of the Revised Statutes of 1895 are in these words:

"Art. 4445. If any railroad corporation shall at any time be unable to agree with the owner for the purchase of any real estate or the material thereon required for the purposes of its incorporation or the transaction of its business, for its depots, station buildings, machine and repair shops, or for the right of way, or any other lawful purpose connected with or necessary to the building, operating or running its road, such corporation may acquire such property in the manner provided in this chapter.

"Art. 4446. No railroad company shall enter upon, except for a lineal survey, any real estate whatever, the same being private property, for the purpose of taking and condemning the same or any material thereon, for any purpose whatever, until the said company shall agree with and pay the owner thereof all damages that may be caused to the lands and property of said owner by the condemnation of said real estate and property, and by the construction of such road."

Article 4447 provides the procedure for condemnation. It will be seen, however, that the initiative is placed upon the corporation, and the manner prescribed by law is an agreement with the owner, which necessarily means that the law requires the corporation to proceed by offer to agree upon and pay the damages, and, if the parties cannot agree, then condemnation may be resorted to.

We copy article 4473: "The right of way secured or to be secured to any railroad company in this state, in the manner provided by law, shall not be so construed as to include the fee simple estate in lands, either public or private, nor shall the same be lost by the forfeiture or expiration of the charter, but shall remain subject to an extension of the charter or the grant of a new charter over the same way without a new condemnation."

"The manner provided by law" is either by agreement with the owner or condemnation; therefore, if the owner by agreement conveys the "right of way," it is secured to the railroad company in the manner provided by law, and will be governed by the statute, and cannot be construed to confer a fee simple title to the land.

There are but these questions presented: (1) Did the deed convey the railroad company the oil beneath the surface? (2) If plaintiff is entitled to recover for the oil taken from the ground, did the court err in giving judgment for the value of the oil after it was delivered from the well, or should the cost of producing it have been deducted?

The granting clause of the deed reads, "have and do hereby grant, sell, and convey unto the East Texas Railway Company, for the purpose of constructing, operating, and maintaining its railroad, the right of way, 200 feet in width, over and upon the above-described tract of land." The interest granted in the land is the right of way. What right did the railroad company acquire? As we have seen, by the use of the terms, "right of way," a "grant of the right of way," the company did not acquire the fee in the land. It got but an easement, which would have been the effect of the deed independently of article 4473, copied above. In Calcasieu Lumber Co. v. Harris, 77 Tex. 23, 13 S. W. 453, this court said: "When, therefore, the railroad company under its charter, and the promoter of the private railroad under the act of 1832, were authorized to take private property for the use of their roads, the rights they acquired were a right of way and facilities necessary to the efficient use of that right. They were not empowered to use the exclusive right of way granted to each for any other independent purpose than that for which it was granted. The fee remained in the private owner, and outside of the authorized use, which must be public or incidental to the public use, the proprietary right is in the original owner. . . . The words 'right of way,' if not defined, are expressive of the very nature of the right ordinarily held by railway companies in the lands over which their roads run—a right to use the land only for railway purposes—an easement." The extract clearly defines the terms "right of way," which is but an easement in the land. The authorities are unanimous on this proposition. 3 Elliott, Railroads § 938; Stuyvesant v. Woodruff, 51 L.R.A. (N.S.)

21 N. J. L. 133, 57 Am. Dec. 156; Olive v. Sabine & E. T. R. Co. 11 Tex. Civ. App. 208, 33 S. W. 139. All authorities agree that the grant of a "right of way" confers only an easement in the land. But land to be used as a right of way may be conveyed in fee; therefore the character of the title conveyed must be determined by the words used and the attending facts and circumstances.

Under article 6484, Revised Statutes 1911 (article 4425, Rev. Stat. 1895), a railroad company might appropriate for right of way not exceeding 200 feet in width, of any tract of land, and might appropriate the timber, earth, stone, or other materials on adjoining lands. The same effect is given by the statute whether the land be condemned or conveyed by deed, and in neither case is the "right of way" over the land to be so construed as to secure the fee simple estate in the lands, either "public or private." Rev. Stat. 1911, art. 6532. Thus, it is by statute declared that the railroad company by condemnation could have acquired all that this deed expresses, except what might be derived from the word "mineral." It is significant, and tends to show that the deed was intended to take the place and have the effect of condemnation conferring the same rights under like limitations. The term "right of way" has a definite meaning, which is clearly expressed by Chief Justice Stayton in Calcasieu Lumber Co. v. Harris, supra.

If the word "mineral" be omitted from the deed, there could be no doubt that it vested in the railroad company only an easement, which would not include the mineral,—oil beneath the surface. We must therefore inquire as to the proper construction of the clause with that word in its connection with the other language. The intention of the grantor must prevail, for which we must seek in the language used by him, with any light which may be shed upon the terms used by a full consideration of the entire transaction as shown by the attending facts, giving to the language the construction most favorable to the grantee. We concede this in the present case for the sake of this argument, but we are doubtful of the correctness of its application under the facts in this record.

The rule of construction, ejusdem generis, is thus stated: "General words following particular words will not include things of a superior class." There is this further restriction of general words following particular words, that the general words will not include any of a class superior to that to which the particular words belong.

The sole reliance of the railroad company and the defendant in error for title to the oil is in the use of the words, "and mineral." The particular words, "timber, earth, stone," designate the most common minerals, and are followed by the general word, "mineral," and the latter word should be applied to the same class; that is, such as may be found upon or near the surface, as gravel and the like. It is contrary to all precedent to give it the effect to include the superior class, "mineral oil," which is to be found at great depth and is of much greater value.

That construction is made more certain by the purpose for which the grant was made, which is thus expressed: "For the purpose of constructing, operating, and maintaining its railroad, the right of way, 200 feet in width, over and upon the above-described tract of land; together with the right to take and use all the timber, earth, stone, and mineral existing, or that may be found, within the right of way hereby granted." The "timber, earth, and stone" would be useful in constructing, operating, and maintaining the railroad, and the "mineral," being given for the same purpose, must be construed to include only the same class, and cannot possibly mean petroleum oil.

We conclude that the court of civil appeals properly rendered judgment for the Gladys City Oil, Gas, & Manufacturing Company.

It is claimed by the plaintiffs in error that the burden was upon the plaintiffs to prove the cost of bringing the oil to the surface, in order to establish the sum for which they were entitled to judgment. This is an ingenious argument, but not sound. If it were the law that the plaintiff in such case was entitled to recover only the value of the oil less the cost of producing it, there would be more force in the contention. But the law is that the owner of the soil owned the oil beneath the surface as a part of the land, and his title was made more definite when the oil was lifted to the surface. Bender v. Brooks, 103 Tex. 329, 127 S. W. 168, Ann. Cas. 1913A, 559.

If, however, the person who produced the oil acted in good faith, he would be entitled to have deducted the cost of bringing it to the surface and to the market. The contention of plaintiff in error is in effect that the owner must concede the good faith of the trespasser, and prove that which is known only to his adversary, the cost of producing the oil. The contention is unsound. In the case cited above this court said: "The law will determine the rights of the parties, but equity will adjust the account between them upon the doctrine which applies to innocent purchasers in good faith who make improvements upon land which add to its value. The owner gets his property, and the innocent occupant is remunerated for his labor and money expended in making the improvements."

There was neither pleading nor evidence to authorize the court to deduct the cost of bringing the oil to market; therefore the Court of Civil Appeals did not err in rendering judgment for the sum that defendant received by the sale of the oil, and the judgment of the Court of Civil Appeals is affirmed.

Petition for rehearing denied.

NORTHERN PACIFIC RAILWAY COMPANY, Appt.,

v.

ADAMS COUNTY, Respt.

(78 Wash. 53, 138 Pac. 307.)

Constitutional law — requiring destruction of weeds in highway.

Requiring a landowner to cut, or pay for cutting, the noxious weeds in the abutting highway to the center thereof, does not deprive him of his property without due process of law.

(February 6, 1914.)

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Superior Court for Adams County in defendant's favor in an action for the cancelation of an alleged illegal tax, and to enjoin defendant from attempting to collect the same. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. George T. Reid, J. W. Quick, and L. B. da Ponte, for appellant:

Note. — Right to impose on abutting owner the duty or expense of removing weeds, snow, ice, etc., in the street or highway.

This note deals only with the question of the constitutionality of statutes or ordinances requiring abutting owners to remove weeds, snow or ice, etc., in the street or highway. The question is, of course, different from the one whether owners of abutting property can be required to repair sidewalks, or to make or pay for other improvements of a more permanent character in streets or highways. Such cases are not within the scope of the note. Cases where owners of abutting property are required to pay the cost of street sprinkling or street sweeping are distinguishable, and are not included herein. But for cases of

Although the cases are numerous which deal with the question as to the power to compel a landowner to cut weeds upon his own premises, no case has been found similar to NORTHERN P. R. CO. v. ADAMS COUNTY, as to the validity of a statute or ordinance requiring an abutting owner to cut weeds in the street or highway. Cases of the former class are collected in a note to Wedemeyer v. Crouch, 43 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1090, on validity and construction of statutes in relation to noxious weeds.

As to validity and construction of statutory regulations as to infected orchards, trees, or crops, see note to Balch v. Glenn, 43 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1080.

Generally, as to municipal power over nuisances affecting highways, see note to Hagerstown v. Witmer, 39 L.R.A. 649.

In Osborne v. Kingston, 23 Ont. Rep. 382, it was held that the city was not an "owner" or "occupant," and that a street or highway was not "land," within the meaning of a statute requiring the owner or occupant of land to cut noxious weeds growing thereon.

Compelling removal of ice and snow from sidewalks.

The right to require owners of abutting property to remove snow and ice from the sidewalk has been denied in Illinois and New Hampshire. But in New York, Massachusetts, Connecticut, Montana, and Rhode Island, statutes or ordinances enacted for this purpose have been upheld. The earlier cases on the question are collected in a note in 24 L.R.A. 413. The right to require owners of abutting property to remove snow and ice from the sidewalk is sustained in the following cases, decided since the preparation of the earlier note: 61 L.R.A.(N.S.)

State v. McMahon, 76 Conn. 97, 55 Atl. 591; Clinton v. Welch, 166 Mass. 133, 43 N. E. 1116; Helena v. Kent, 32 Mont. 279, 80 Pac. 258, 4 Ann. Cas. 235; State v. McCrillis, 28 R. I. 165, 9 L.R.A.(N.S.) 635, 66 Atl. 301, 13 Ann. Cas. 701.

In distinguishing the Illinois and New Hampshire cases denying the constitutionality of statutes requiring owners of abutting property to remove snow and ice from sidewalks, the court in State v. McMahon, supra, said that the Constitutions of those states contained provisions not in the Connecticut Constitution, adopting as a fundamental maxim the theory of uniformity and equality in taxation; and that the principle that taxation must be equal and uniform was not so embodied in the United States Constitution as to restrict the power of taxation vested in the state.

To the same effect is State v. McCrillis, supra, where the court distinguished the Illinois and New Hampshire decisions denying the constitutionality of such ordinances, on the ground that those decisions were controlled by constitutional provisions not found in the Constitution of Rhode Island, requiring equality and uniformity in taxation; and held that constitutional provisions that the burdens of state should be fairly distributed, and that private property should not be taken without compensation, were not violated by an ordinance requiring owners of abutting property to keep sidewalks clear of snow and ice.

In Clinton v. Welch, 166 Mass. 133, 43 N. E. 1116, it was contended that a by-law requiring the owner or tenant of an estate abutting upon a brick, concrete, or other curbed or finished sidewalk, to remove or cover the ice or snow thereon, was invalid, in that its operation was partial, and imposed a burden upon particular classes of persons arbitrarily designated, there being but few sidewalks of this kind in the town, while there were many gravel sidewalks, to which the by-law did not apply. But the court regarded the decision in Re Goddard, 16 Pick. 504, 28 Am. Dec. 259, cited in the earlier note on this question, as controlling. The theory apparently was that the by-law

It is the purpose of the law not to raise revenue, but to regulate relative rights, privileges, and duties of individuals.

Mount, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The lower court sustained a demurrer to the complaint in this action. The plaintiff operated equally upon persons in the same class, in that it affected each person as he became the owner of a particular kind of estate, and ceased to affect him when he no longer owned or occupied the property.

It was also held in Clinton v. Welch, supra, that the by-law was not rendered invalid by reason of imposing a fixed penalty for failure to comply therewith, and that the penalty fixed was the maximum allowed by statute.

On the other hand, the earlier Illinois cases, cited in the former note on this question, to the effect that a city cannot compel the owner or occupant of abutting property to remove snow and ice from a sidewalk, were approved in Chicago v. McDonald, 111 Ill. App. 436, an action against the city for injuries sustained by falling on an icy sidewalk.

And in State v. Jackman, 69 N. H. 318, 42 L.R.A. 438, 41 Atl. 347, 11 Am. Crim. Rep. 607, an ordinance requiring owners of abutting property to remove snow from sidewalks was held unconstitutional because imposing unequal burdens upon citizens, denying them the equal protection of the laws, and taking private property for public use without just compensation.

The Illinois courts, however, distinguish between ordinances requiring an abutting owner to clean sidewalks of snow and ice, and those requiring a street railway company to keep the surface of the street between its outer rails clear of dirt and other accumulations, an ordinance enacted for the latter purpose being held valid. Chicago v. Chicago Union Traction Co. 199 Ill. 259, 59 L.R.A. 667, 65 N. E. 243.

A statute requiring the removal of snow or ice from sidewalks by owners or tenants of abutting property was held unconstitutional in Chicago v. Chicago Union Traction Co. 199 Ill. 259, 59 L.R.A. 667, 65 N. E. 243.

electd to stand on the allegations of the complaint, and the action was dismissed. The plaintiff appeals.

The complaint alleges in substance: That the plaintiff owns and operates a line of railroad in the state of Washington extending through Adams and other counties, and occupies therewith a right of way generally of the width of 200 feet. In the year 1912 the defendant, acting through its road supervisor, gave due notice to the plaintiff to cut down and destroy certain noxious weeds growing on one of the public highways in the defendant county parallel to and abutting upon that part of the plaintiff's right of way over and across the N. E. $\frac{1}{4}$ and the N. W. $\frac{1}{4}$ of section 13, township 19 N., of range 35 E. W. M. That the plaintiff having failed and refused to destroy said noxious weeds within ten days, the road supervisor procured the necessary assistance and destroyed the noxious weeds, and thereby incurred the necessary and reasonable expense of \$20.80, and has mailed a statement thereof, including a description of the land, to the plaintiff, requiring it to tional in McGuire v. District of Columbia, 24 App. D. C. 22, 65 L.R.A. 430; but the ground of the decision was the inequality and uncertainty of the particular statute, rather than the lack of constitutional power of Congress to pass such a law.

In People v. Mattimore, 45 Hun, 448, 10 N. Y. S. R. 133, the validity of an ordinance requiring owners of abutting property to remove snow and ice from the sidewalk was upheld, but the question raised was merely as to the legality of the ordinance under the particular city charter. It was said, however, that the ordinance was reasonable as a means to promote the usefulness and safety of the sidewalks, and to protect the city from legal liability for damages.

And in Lincoln v. Janesch, 63 Neb. 707, 56 L.R.A. 762, 93 Am. St. Rep. 478, 89 N. W. 280, a provision of a city charter making it the duty of owners and occupants of abutting property to keep sidewalks in repair and free from snow and ice and other obstructions was held valid. The particular part of the statute in question, however, was that relating to repairs. But the language of the court indicated that it regarded the part relating to removal of snow and ice also as valid.

In Com. v. Cutter, 156 Mass. 52, 29 N. E. 1146, an ordinance was held valid which prohibited under penalty an owner or occupant of land abutting on a private passageway to allow filth or waste matter to remain on that part of the passageway adjoining his premises. It was said that it was for the benefit of the owners and occupants of land abutting on said passageway, as well as to the advantage of the public health, that the way should be kept free from filth; and the fact that, in order pay the same within thirty days. The plaintiff having refused to pay such sum, the claim was presented by the proper officer to the county commissioners, and the same was examined, found correct, allowed, and Adams county paid to the road supervisor the sum claimed, and made an order that such sum should be taxed against the plaintiff's right of way. The county treasurer thereupon entered such sum on the tax rolls of Adams county as a tax for the year 1912 against the right of way, which sum, together with penalties, interest, and costs, now stands as a tax on the rolls of Adams county for the year 1912 against the plaintiff's right of way. That the defendant now claims and pretends that this sum is justly due and owing, that it is a valid lien and tax against the plaintiff's right of way, and it will, unless restrained, endeavor to collect the same by process of law, as prescribed by the general laws of Washington relating to the collection of delinquent taxes. It is also alleged that §§ 3038 et seq., Rem. & Bal. Code, as amended by chapter 60, p. 327, of the Laws of 1911, particularly §§ 3039 and 3040, as so amended, in so far as the same undertake to and do impose a duty upon a landowner to cut noxious weeds growing upon public highways in the state, and in so far as they undertake to make the cost of cutting the same a lien upon lands bordering upon highways, and in so far as they authorize the levy of a tax upon lands bordering on such highways for the cost of cutting weeds thereon, and the sale of such lands for and on account of the cost of cutting such weeds so incurred, are in violation of article 1, § 3, and article 7, § 2, of the Constitution of the state of Washington, and are in violation of the 14th Amendment to the Constitution of the United States, and are null and void. The complaint also alleges that the plaintiff has paid all taxes justly due, including all charges for cutting weeds upon its own land or right of way. The prayer is that the illegal tax be canceled and removed as a cloud on the plaintiff's title to its right of way, and that the defendant be enjoined from attempting to collect the same.

to keep it free, owners and occupants might be obliged to remove matter which they had no agency in depositing, or to do that which they would not be compelled to do if they did not own land abutting thereon, did not render the ordinance unreasonable, or impose duties which could not lawfully be imposed. The ordinance was said to be analogous to one requiring the removal of snow from abutting sidewalks.

The validity of a by-law of a town requiring the tenant or owner of property abutting on a street to remove snow and ice from the sidewalk within a certain time was apparently assumed in Easthampton v. Hill, 162 Mass. 302, 38 N. E. 502, where the owner of a house divided into two tenements, one of which was occupied by a tenant and the other vacant, was held liable for failure to remove snow from the sidewalk in front of the vacant tenement. See also Com. v. Watson, 97 Mass. 562, apparently assuming the validity of an ordinance requiring the tenant or occupant or owner of a building abutting on a street to remove snow from the sidewalk, and construing the ordinance as to liability when there were several tenants of a building, and the owner as a boarder rented and occupied one of the rooms.

And among possibly other cases construing statutes or ordinances requiring the removal of snow and ice from sidewalks by owners of abutting property are the following: Holtzman v. United States, 14 App. D. C. 454 (holding that mere real estate agents having property for sale or rent, without funds of any kind to be used in connection with the property, were not within the provisions of a statute requiring the "owner, agent, or tenant" to remove snow or ice from sidewalks in front of his 51 L.R.A. (N.S.) property); State v. McMahon, 76 Conn. 97, 55 Atl. 591 (holding that a by-law providing that whenever a sidewalk should be "wholly or partially covered" with snow or ice, it should be the duty of the owner or occupant of abutting property to clear the sidewalk within a certain time, or, in the case of ice, to cover with sand "or other suitable substance," was not invalid as vague and indefinite); New York v. Brown, 27 Misc. 218, 57 N. Y. Supp. 742 (defining the term "flagging" as applied to a statute requiring removal of snow and ice by owners of property abutting on "flagged" sidewalks); Moran v. New York, 98 App. Div. 301, 90 N. Y. Supp. 596 (holding that an ordinance making it the duty of persons to see that no snow or ice is permitted to "remain on the sidewalks . . . in front of any house, building, or lot occupied by him," does not apply to cross walks, as for instance a walk in front of an alleyway).

A distinction should be noted between the question as to the constitutionality of statutes and ordinances such as those included in this note, and the question as to the constitutionality of laws enacted for the purpose of requiring abutting owners of property to keep sidewalks or highways free from obstructions which such owners have themselves placed thereon. For instance, in Weed v. Township Committee, — N. J. L. —, 85 Atl. 329, a resolution of a township committee requiring an abutting owner to remove an accumulation of sand from the gutter in front of his premises was held valid; but in that instance, apparently the sand was an obstruction maintained by the owner on the highway. Cases of this kind are not within the scope of the note.

R. E. H.

The appellant first contends that, while §§ 3038, 3040, and 3041 seem to contemplate that the cost of cutting weeds to the center of abutting highways shall be taxed to the abutting land, § 3042, which deals specifically with the matter of assessing the cost, does not so provide; that it merely provides that the county commissioners shall make an order that the amount paid shall be "a tax on the land on which said work was done;" and that § 3039, which provides that the failure to cut noxious weeds on any road or highway to the center thereof shall constitute a misdemeanor, is the only remedy in cases of this kind. But we think the whole chapter should be construed together, and, when so construed, indicates quite plainly that it was the intention of the legislature that the money so paid should be a lien upon the land abutting upon the highway, and that the criminal statute is merely a cumulative remedy.

The principal contention of the appellant is that the statutes above referred to are violative of the constitutional sections above mentioned, for the reason that compelling property owners to cut noxious weeds to the center of the highway is a taking of private property for a public use without compensation; and also is a taking of property without due process, contrary to the Federal Constitution.

It is conceded by the appellant that the statutes referred to, in so far as they impose a duty upon the citizen to keep his own premises clear of noxious weeds, are valid statutes. This court has so held in Wedemeyer v. Crouch, 68 Wash. 14, 43 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1090, 122 Pac. 366. See also Los Angeles County v. Spencer, 126 Cal. 670, 77 Am. St. Rep. 217, 59 Pac. 202, 385; Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. May, 194 U. S. 267, 48 L. ed. 971, 24 Sup. Ct. Rep. 638. So far as we are advised, no state, except this one, has gone to the extent of providing that the owner of land abutting upon a public highway must cut noxious weeds to the center thereof. Other states have only gone to the extent of requiring the owner of land to cut noxious weeds upon his own premises. But this state has required that such owner shall cut noxious weeds to the center of the highway. We said in Wedemeyer v. Crouch, supra, that these statutes are "a strictly police regulation." And it seems to us there can be no doubt upon this question. Requiring the destruction of noxious weeds is a provision for the general welfare of the community, and must rest for validity upon the principle of police regulation. The validity of these statutes, which were considered in Wedemeyer v. Crouch, supra, was based upon the maxim that "one must not so use his own as to injure his neighbor."

While no cases directly in point have been called to our attention, we think the same principle must govern this case as controls those cases where property owners have been required to remove snow and ice from sidewalks in front of their premises. If the legislature of the state may authorize a municipal corporation by ordinance to require property owners to remove snow and ice from sidewalks in front of their property, then it seems clear that upon the same principle the legislature may require property owners within the state to cut noxious weeds to the center of highways in front of their property. We see no reasonable distinction between these classes of cases. While the courts of various states are in conflict on the question of the validity of city ordinances requiring owners or occupants of property to remove snow and ice from sidewalks abutting thereon, we are of the opinion that the better rule is as declared by those states which hold to the rule that such ordinances are a valid police regulation. This rule has been followed in Connecticut, in State v. McMahon, 76 Conn. 97, 55 Atl. 591; in Massachusetts, in Re Goddard, 16 Pick. 504, 23 Am. Dec. 259, and in Clinton v. Welch, 166 Mass. 133, 43 N. E. 1116; in New York, in Carthage v. Frederick, 122 N. Y. 268, 10 L.R.A. 178, 19 Am. St. Rep. 490, 25 N. E. 480, affirming 44 Hun, 625; in Montana, in Helena v. Kent, 32 Mont. 279, 80 Pac. 258, 4 Ann. Cas. 235; and in Rhode Island, in State v. McCrillis, 28 R. I. 165, 9 L.R.A.(N.S.) 635, 66 Atl. 301, also reported in 13 Ann. Cas. 701. The opposite has been held in Illinois, in Chicago v. O'Brien, 111 Ill. 532, 53 Am. Rep. 640; in New Hampshire, in State v. Jackman, 69 N. H. 318, 42 L.R.A. 438, 41 Atl. 347, 11 Am. Crim. Rep. 607, and in the District of Columbia, in McGuire v. District of Columbia, 24 App. D. C. 22, 65 L.R.A. 430. An interesting note to the Montana case will be found in 4 Ann. Cas. 238. In State v. McCrillis, 28 R. I. 165, 9 L.R.A.(N.S.) 635, 66 Atl. 301, 13 Ann. Cas. 701, the authorities both for and against the constitutionality of statutes of this kind are collected and reviewed, and the court concludes, we think rightly, that measures of this kind are regarded as a police regulation, and are not, strictly speaking, laws levying a tax, the direct or principal object of which is to raise revenue, but impose a duty upon a large class of persons directly to their benefit, and are regarded as a police regulation, and are not in conflict with any constitutional provision, either state or Federal, on the ground of inequality of burdens resulting from the operation of the law. We think this is the most reasonable rule, and should control in this state. In Carthage v. Frederick, 122 N. Y. 268, 10 L.R.A. 178, 19 Am. St. Rep. 490, 25 N. E. 480, affirming 44 Hun, 625, the court said: "But how is it possible for the authorities of a large city, with many hundred miles of streets, to remove the snow in time to prevent injury to those who have the right to travel upon the sidewalks, unless they can require the owners and occupants of adjacent property to remove it? Every man can conveniently and promptly attend to that which is in front of his own door, and it is both reasonable and necessary that he should be compelled to do so. We think that the ordinance under consideration is valid, that it conflicts with no provision of the Constitution, and that it is the duty of the courts to enforce it."

So in this case, with many miles of highways in a county, it would be utterly impossible for the county authorities to keep noxious weeds from the highways. It is a comparatively easy matter for the owners of land abutting thereon to destroy these noxious weeds. Their destruction is a benefit principally to the property owners, because, if the property owners are required to destroy the noxious weeds upon their lands, and such weeds are permitted to grow in the highways, the destruction of the weeds upon their lands is of no practical benefit. It is necessary that the weeds upon the highways be destroyed as well as those upon the adjoining lands. It is reasonable, we think, that the owners of lands may be required to destroy noxious weeds to the center of the highways abutting thereon, as a special benefit to their own lands. While, as we have said, no case has been cited or found by us directly in point upon the question under consideration, we are satisfied that the rule relating to snow and ice upon sidewalks is of the same general character as that relating to noxious weeds in highways, and that the rule which permits the abatement of the one nuisance will also permit the abatement of the other.

We think the judgment of the lower court was right, and it is therefore affirmed.

WASHINGTON SUPREME COURT.
(Department No. 2.)

CHARLES CORNELL, Appt.,

v.

E. P. EDSSEN, Respt.

(78 Wash. 662, 139 Pac. 602.)

Limitation of actions — wrongful dismissal of suit — effect of concealment.

1. A cause of action against an attorney for wrongful dismissal of an action which he is retained to prosecute is not, although he conceals his act from his client, within a limitation statute relating to actions for relief upon the ground of fraud, which provides that the action shall not be deemed to have accrued until discovery of the facts constituting the fraud, but the time begins to run from the commission of the act.

Attorney and client — wrongful dismissal of action — liability.

2. Fraud is not necessary to render an attorney liable for wrongfully dismissing his client's action.

(March 26, 1914.)

APPEAL by plaintiff from an order of the Superior Court for King County granting a motion for judgment on the pleadings in an action brought to recover damages for wrongful dismissal of plaintiff's action. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Note. — When statute of limitations begins to run against attorney for negligence or misconduct in performance of professional duties.

Upon this subject, see the notes to Fortune v. English, 12 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1005, and Goodyear Metallic Rubber Shoe Co. v. Carpenter, 17 L.R.A.(N.S.) 667. The search here made has been for subsequent cases within the scope of the former notes.

Action for negligence or misconduct in performance of professional duties.

The earlier cases on this question will be found in the note to Fortune v. English, supra.

Maloney v. Graham, 171 Ill. App. 409, was an action against an attorney, brought to recover damages alleged to have been sustained by his negligence in passing upon the title to certain real estate. The attorney had subsequently defended his client's title in litigation which arose, and had been successful in the lower court; but several years later the decision was reversed upon appeal. It was contended that the cause of action first arose when the damage accrued as a result of the decision of the court of last resort, in ousting the client from possession; but, referring to Fortune v. English, 226 Ill. 262, 12 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1005, 117 Am. St. Rep. 253, 80 N. E. 781,

Mr. R. E. Thompson, Jr., for appellant:

The action is not barred by the statute of limitations.

Wilder v. Secor, 72 Iowa, 161, 2 Am. St. Rep. 236, 33 N. W. 448; Irwin v. Holbrook, 26 Wash. 89, 66 Pac. 116.

Mr. Frank E. Hammond, with Mr. E. P. Edsen, for respondent:

When the acts which are claimed to constitute the fraud are evidenced by public record or by judicial proceedings, it cannot be claimed that there was such concealment as would prevent the operation of the statute.

Mr. Edward Judd also for respondent.

9 Ann. Cas. 253, and Wilcox v. Plummer, 4 Pet. 172, 7 L. ed. 821, the court held that the cause of action was complete when the opinion of title was given, and the statute of limitations began to run from that time, rather than when the damage accrued, as contended.

And so it is held that an action to recover assets paid over to the wrong person by mistake accrues at the time the payment was made. Re Croyden, 55 Sol. Jo. 632 (see Butterworth's Dig. 1911, Limitation of Actions, 329, ¶ 7).

In Kruegel v. Porter, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 136 S. W. 801, affirmed in — Tex. —, 155 S. W. 174, it was held that a cause of action for collusion with the client's adversaries, and for negligent, wilful, and treacherous failure to prosecute a case with due care and good faith, is founded upon a breach of contract, which occurs at the time of the trial and determination of the case in question; and that the period of limitation begins to run from that time.

Action to recover money collected by attorney.

The earlier cases on this question will be found in the note to Goodyear Metallic Rubber Shoe Co. v. Carpenter, supra.

In Ott v. Hood, 152 Wis. 97, 44 L.R.A. (N.S.) 524, 139 N. W. 762, the court held that as to an action to recover money collected upon a note, the statute of limita-

Morris, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Appeal from an order granting judgment on the pleadings. The complaint recites that the respondent is an attorney, and that on December 1, 1904, appellant, having a good cause of action against an insurance company for loss sustained under one of its policies, employed respondent to commence an action against the insurance company; that respondent, as such attorney, commenced such action, and that on May 15, 1905, the same came on to be heard in the superior court for King county; that the trial judge, after hearing the cause upon its merits, continued the same for further advisement, and that while said cause was so being held by the trial judge, and before any decision had been announced, the respondent, without the knowledge or consent of appellant, did on July 20, 1905, dismiss the cause of action with prejudice; that appellant did not obtain knowledge of such dismissal until four weeks prior to the commencement of this action, but at all times believed, as he was led by respondent to believe, that the trial judge had decided his cause of action adversely to him; that his cause of action against the insurance company is now barred by lapse of time; and that, on account of the misrepresentation of respondent, he has suffered a loss tions begins to run from the expiration of a reasonable time within which to pay over the money after its collection; or, if the client has been notified of the collection of the money, then from the time a demand is made; and that, in the absence of a specific statutory provision, ignorance of the cause of action, whether by reason of fraudulent concealment or otherwise, does not postpone the time from which the statute begins to run. But it was also held that where the attorney at some time previous has made false representations that the money is not yet collected, and in reliance upon such representations the client takes no action until the statute has barred his recovery in an action on contract, there is then a good cause of action for deceit, which accrues upon the destruction of the first claim by the expiration of the period of limitation. In the case under consideration, however, a cause of action for false representations was not sufficiently pleaded, and the demurrer was sustained with some pertinent remarks as to the ethics of pleading the statute in such cases, and an observation that "upon a charge of unfitness there is no statute of limitations." The further suggestion was offered that, upon the return of the record, there would be opportunity both for defendant to meet the claim upon the merits and for the plaintiff to amend the complaint to set out a cause of action for the false representations.

of his cause of action, to his damage in the sum of $560, for which judgment is demanded.

Two defenses were set up by answer, but it is evident that the one given effect in the ruling complained of is that which pleads the statute of limitation. Appellant seeks to avoid the statute by asserting that the cause of action is based upon fraud, and the statute would not begin to run until after its discovery, founding his argument upon § 150, subdiv. 4, Rem. & Bal. Code, providing that actions for relief upon the ground of fraud are barred within three years, but that the cause of action in such case shall not be deemed to have accrued until the discovery by the aggrieved party of the facts constituting the fraud. This provision has no application to the case presented, because it is not "an action for relief upon the ground of fraud." We have held that this provision "has reference to suits by parties to contracts who are asking to be relieved from contracts that they were fraudulently induced to make; as where a deed has been fraudulently obtained, and suits of that character where fraud is the substantive cause of the action." Wagner v. Law, 3 Wash. 500, 28 Am. St. Rep. 56, 15 L.R.A. 784, 28 Pac. 1109. To the same effect is Morgan v. Morgan, 10 Wash. 99, 38 Pac. 1054, citing authorities interpreting like statutes. The appellant is not here seeking to relieve himself of the burden of some obligation or liability he was induced to assume or undertake by reason of some fraudulent act on the part of respondent, and which he would not have assumed or undertaken except for such fraudulent act. There is here no prayer addressed to a court of equity for relief because of fraud or misrepresentation. It is cases of this character that come within the meaning of the statute. It is said in Brown v. Cloud County Bank, 2 Kan. App. 352, 42 Pac. 593, in referring to the bar of this statute: "This limitation applies in express terms to 'an action for relief on the ground of fraud.' This cannot be held to apply to every case wherein a fraudulent transaction may be, either directly or incidentally, inquired into. It must be a case where the party against whom the statute is urged as a bar is seeking relief to which he claims himself entitled because of the fraud of the opposite party. In other words, the fraud must be a part of the substantive cause of action on which the right to relief is founded, and without which no cause of action exists."

All that appellant is here seeking is damages claimed to have been suffered because of the wrongful act of respondent. The action is plainly one based upon a breach of duty growing out of the relation existing between the parties,—a contractual relation which calls for a full disclosure; and when by reason of the failure to make a full and complete disclosure, or the withholding or concealment of facts which should have been disclosed, loss is suffered, there is a breach of duty, and for such breach an action will lie. But, like any other action founded upon a breach of duty imposed either by law or contract, the action arises out of the breach, and the statute of limitations begins to run from the time of the breach, and not from the time of its discovery. No action lies for speaking an untruth, unless, by virtue of the relation between the parties, the law imposes the duty of speaking the truth. No action lies for concealment, unless the law imposes the duty of disclosure. In this case the duty is one growing out of the relation between the parties, and that relation is one based upon contract. The relation, it is true, is fiduciary, but that does not disturb the fact that it is contractual, and that a cause of action based upon the breach of the contract accrues when the contract is violated, and not when the violation is discovered.

The supreme court of Kansas, in reviewing an action to recover for the violation of a verbal agreement containing a stipulation against discrimination in transportation rates, where it was sought to treat the action as one for relief upon the ground of fraud, in order to avoid the statute of limitations, says, in Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Atchison Grain Co. 68 Kan. 585, 75 Pac. 1051, 1 Ann. Cas. 639: "In some of the states fraudulent concealment of a cause of action is made to extend the time of bringing the action for the period of limitation after the discovery that a cause of action exists; but the Code of this state makes no such provision, except as to actions for relief on the ground of fraud. So far as actions founded upon agreements or contracts are concerned, the operation of the statute depends upon the nature of the cause of action, and not upon the time that a plaintiff discovers that he has a right of action. The action accrues when the contract is violated, and not at the time when the plaintiff learns that it has been violated. In the absence of a statute making concealment an exception to the statute of limitations, the courts cannot create one, however harsh and inequitable the enforcement of the statute may be." This being the true nature of appellant's cause of action, it added nothing to it to characterize respondent's action as fraudulent.

"When the gravamen of the bill is for a breach of duty, and the action is thereby brought within the adverse effect of the influence of the statute of limitations, the addition of bare averments which call the same acts fraudulent do not convert it into a bill both for a fraud and a breach of duty, or for fraud alone. The alleged acts constituted negligence, and it is useless to escape from the legal consequences of an action to recover damages for such acts by affixing to them the adjective 'fraudulent.' The bill is what it was originally, and the rider in regard to fraud has not altered its character." Frishmuth v. Farmers' Loan & T. Co. 46 C. C. A. 222, 107 Fed. 169.

Neither is it necessary to aver that respondent's action was fraudulent, for an attorney is liable to his client for his failure to perform his professional duty, whether such failure was intentional and fraudulent or not. The charge of fraud or the absence of such a charge neither adds to nor takes from the right of action, since it exists independent of the fraud, and is based upon a breach that gives the right of action, whether that breach was intentional or unintentional, with or without fraud. We find this statement of the rule in 25 Cyc. 1182: "It is generally held that, in order for the running of the statute to be postponed until the fraud is discovered, fraud must be the gravamen of the action; that is, the action must be based on fraud. This is especially true under the statutes which embody the equitable rule, as the greater number of them expressly apply to 'actions for relief on the ground of fraud.' Thus, the running of the statute is not postponed, where the purpose of the action is merely to enforce a contract or recover damages for its breach, . . . or in an action based on a violation of duty imposed by contractual relations, . . . or in cases where the fraud is merely collateral to the cause of action, or where the cause of action is complete without fraud, notwithstanding unnecessary averments of fraud in the complaint. Fraud must be the principal ground on which relief is asked."

For these reasons, we believe the judgment is sustained by the law, and it is affirmed.

WEST VIRGINIA SUPREME COURT OF APPEALS.

SAMUEL H. HUFF

v.

LILLIAN M. HUFF, Appt.

(— W. Va. —, 80 S. E. 846.)

Divorce — violence — sufficiency.

1. Actual violence, to constitute ground for divorce, must be attended with danger to life, limb, or health, or be such as to cause reasonable apprehension of such danger.

Same — vulgar and indecent conduct.

2. Vulgar, indecent, and unnatural conduct on the part of a wife, and her solicitation of the husband to engage in such conduct with her, showing viciousness and degeneracy on her part, are not sufficient grounds for divorce, nor do they justify the husband in breaking off cohabitation with her and treating her as having abandoned or deserted him.

Evidence — adultery — sufficiency.

3. Though circumstantial evidence is admissible and sufficient to prove adultery in a suit for divorce, it must be so clear and strong as to carry conviction of the truth of the charge, and, if it does no more than raise a suspicion of chastity, it is insufficient.

Alimony — allowance without divorce.

4. A wife who has been abandoned and denied support by her husband may have a decree for alimony without a divorce, and such relief may be granted her in a suit for divorce brought by a husband, on a prayer in her answer therefor as affirmative relief.

(December 2, 1913.)

APPEAL by defendant from a decree of the Circuit Court for McDowell County in plaintiff's favor in a suit for a divorce. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Warth & McCullough, for appellant:

The allegations were insufficient to show cruelty that would amount to grounds for a divorce a mensa et thoro.

Carr v. Carr, 22 Gratt. 168; Latham v. Latham, 30 Gratt. 307; Martin v. Martin, 33 W. Va. 699, 11 S. E. 12.

Headnotes by POFFENBARGER, P.

Note. — Degeneracy as ground for divorce.

This note is confined to cases wherein a divorce has been sought on the ground that one of the parties has been guilty of such degrading and revolting conduct as acts of bestiality, acts against nature, and the Scandalous and impertinent matter in the record should have been removed.

14 Cyc. 609; Wood v. Wood, 141 Mass. 495, 55 Am. Rep. 491, 6 N. E. 541.

The hearsay evidence and neighborhood report permitted to be introduced for the purpose of proving the charge of adultery is not sufficient upon which to base a decree for divorce.

Martin v. Martin, 33 W. Va. 695, 11 S. E. 12; Reynolds v. Reynolds, 68 W. Va. 19, 69 S. E. 381, Ann. Cas. 1912A, 889; Bacon v. Bacon, 68 W. Va. 749, 70 S. E. 762.

The decree for divorce is not substantiated by depositions or proof.

Alkire v. Alkire, 33 W. Va. 519, 11 S. E. 11; Latham v. Latham, 30 Gratt. 321.

Messrs. Sanders & Crockett, for appellee:

The decree appealed from is based upon conflicting oral testimony; and where this is so, the appellate court will not reverse the decree except for very cogent reasons.

Smith v. Yoke, 27 W. Va. 639; Bartlett v. Cleavenger, 35 W. Va. 719, 14 S. E. 273; Richardson v. Ralphsnyder, 40 W. Va. 15, 20 S. E. 854; Burrows v. Fitch, 62 W. Va. 116, 57 S. E. 283.

A party in whose favor a decree is rendered cannot claim the benefit of it and at the same time object that it is erroneous.

The allowance of alimony was improper, the decree having been rendered against the appellant.

Harris v. Harris, 31 Gratt. 13; Martin v. Martin, 33 W. Va. 695, 11 S. E. 12; Cariens v. Cariens, 50 W. Va. 113, 55 L.R.A. 930, 40 S. E. 335.

like. Vulgar, abusive, and obscene language, sexual excesses, impotency, and drunkenness, as grounds of divorce, are treated in other notes. See Index to L.R.A. Notes, "Divorce and Separation."

As stated in HUFF v. HUFF, acts of mere degradation and degeneracy in one of the parties to the marriage contract are not grounds of divorce unless made so by statute.

It is held in Wood v. Wood, 141 Mass. 495, 55 Am. Rep. 491, 6 N. E. 541, that the practice of masturbation in the presence of the wife, but without compelling her to remain present, which injures her health by its effect upon her feelings, is not within a statute making "cruel and abusive treatment" a ground for divorce. The court said: "The words 'cruel and abusive treatment' seem to import on their face conduct directed towards the other party and with a malevolent motive. Without deciding that a case could not be imagined which would fall within the meaning of the words without such a motive, it is enough to say that purely self-degrading conduct, not forced upon even the knowledge of the wife otherwise than by the usual intimacy of matrimony, does not constitute the offense, merely because its folly, its disgusting character, or its wickedness disturbs her nerves or conscience, and thus affects her health."

So, lewd and indecent conduct by a stepfather toward his stepdaughter is not a personal indignity to the mother within the meaning of a statute allowing a divorce for "cruel and inhuman treatment or personal indignities rendering life burdensome." Cline v. Cline, 10 Or. 474.

But while the act of sodomy committed by a husband with a beast does not constitute adultery under the laws of Ohio in regard to marriage and divorce, it does constitute extreme cruelty. Anonymous, 3 Ohio S. & C. P. Dec. 450, 2 Ohio N. P. 342, 51 L.R.A. (N.S.)

The court in the above case said that "the act of sodomy charged is legal cruelty within the terms of our statute. Unnatural practices of the kind charged are an infamous indignity to the wife, and would make the marriage relation so revolting to her that it would become impossible for her to discharge the duties of wife, and defeat the whole purpose of the relation. In the natural course of things they would cause mental suffering to the extent of affecting health, and would give rise to serious apprehension of communication to her of disease in case of the continuance of cohabitation."

So it is stated in Bishop, on Marriage, Divorce, & Separation, Vol. 1, § 1831, that at present in England, this offense (sodomy) is an independent ground for divorce,—a heavier matrimonial wrong than adultery. For the statute of 20 and 21 Vict. chap. 85, § 27, while permitting the wife a dissolution of her marriage for the husband's adultery only when committed under aggravated circumstances, or coupled with cruelty or desertion, allows it to her for his mere "sodomy or bestiality."

And according to Bishop, § 1832, sodomy or buggery is in two or three states by name made ground for divorce.

So, evidence that plaintiff had seen her husband in the act of carnal intercourse with a cow was, in Prather v. Prather, 99 Iowa, 393, 68 N. W. 800, held sufficient to justify a divorce on the ground of cruel and inhuman treatment.

So, the crime of pederasty, whether restricted to sodomy or bestiality, is, in Crutcher v. Crutcher, 86 Miss. 231, 38 So. 337, held to be cruel and inhuman treatment within the meaning of the divorce statute.

And in Mogg v. Mogg, 2 Addams, Eccl. Rep. 292, a divorce was granted where a wife charged her husband with cruelty and unnatural practices. J. D. C.

On Petition for Rehearing.

Messrs. Anderson, Strother, & Hughes, also for appellee:

Legal cruelty may consist of other than actual violence.

Goff v. Goff, 6 W. Va. 9, 53 S. E. 769, 9 Ann. Cas. 1083; Myers v. Myers, 83 Va. 810, 6 S. E. 630; Latham v. Latham, 30 Gratt. 321; Gardner v. Gardner, 104 Tenn. 410, 78 Am. St. Rep. 924, 58 S. W. 342; Mosher v. Mosher, 16 N. D. 269, 12 L.R.A. (N.S.) 820, 125 Am. St. Rep. 654, 113 N. W. 99; Grow v. Grow, 134 Ky. 816, 135 Am. St. Rep. 440, 121 S. W. 654; Hooker v. Hooker, 65 Fla. 53, 43 L.R.A. (N.S.) 964, 61 So. 121.

Society will be destroyed if the courts hold to the old, immoral, narrow view that vulgar, indecent, and unnatural conduct and degeneracy cannot constitute cruelty. This is not the present rule.

Poffenbarger, P., delivered the opinion of the court:

On this appeal from a decree of divorce from bed and board, the appellant, the wife, relies upon her demurrer to the bill and each charge made therein, and insufficiency of the evidence to sustain the decree in favor of her husband. The fourth paragraph charges wilful desertion, and the sixth adultery on the part of the wife, specifying the party with whom the act is alleged to have been committed, and the time and place. It is useless to consume time in the demonstration of the sufficiency of these two paragraphs.

As to the fifth and seventh paragraphs, the demurrer should have been sustained. The former makes a general charge of extreme and repeated cruelty, but specifies no facts sufficient to warrant the conclusion set forth. The specifications are that the defendant repeatedly struck and assaulted the plaintiff, used violent and abusive language toward him, falsely charged him with having committed adultery, endeavored to get his employer to discharge him, and resorted to legal proceedings to compel him to support her. These acts do not amount to cruel and inhuman treatment, as it is defined in the law. No imminence or even probability of personal injury by violence or loss of health by reason of annoyance and vexation is in any form alleged. "What merely wounds the feelings, without being accompanied by bodily injury or actual menace, does not amount to legal cruelty." Latham v. Latham, 30 Gratt. 307; Goff v. Goff, 60 W. Va. 9, 16, 53 S. E. 769, 9 Ann. Cas. 1083. "Actual violence to constitute ground for divorce must be attended with danger to life, limb, or health, or be such as to cause reasonable apprehension of danger. It is not every slight violence committed against the wife by the husband, even in anger, which will authorize a divorce. Much less will slight acts of violence by a wife from which the husband can easily protect himself constitute cruelty entitling him to a divorce." 14 Cyc. 602.

The seventh paragraph, charging vulgar, indecent, and unnatural conduct of the defendant, and her solicitation of the husband to engage in such conduct with her, obviously fail to set forth any ground of divorce. Acts of mere degradation and degeneracy in one of the parties to the marriage contract are not grounds of divorce, unless made so by statute, and those charged in this paragraph are not mentioned in it. To obtain a divorce in this state, a party must bring his case within a statutory ground. Chapman v. Parsons, 66 W. Va. 307, 24 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1015, 135 Am. St. Rep. 1033, 66 S. E. 461, 19 Ann. Cas. 463; Cariens v. Cariens, 50 W. Va. 113, 55 L.R.A. 930, 40 S. E. 335.

The charge of desertion is wholly unsustained by proof. The plaintiff himself admits his refusal to cohabit and live with his wife for reasons and causes not constituting grounds for a divorce,—those already described in the disposition of the demurrer to the fifth and seventh paragraphs of the bill. Under some circumstances, the innocent party may, by leaving the other, put the latter in the position of having abandoned him in the legal sense of the term. In other words, the conduct of one of the parties may justify separation from him by the other, and confer right upon the leaving party to obtain a divorce upon the ground of wilful desertion. But, to justify such separation, the conduct of the guilty party must be such as to afford ground for a divorce a mensa et thoro. Alkire v. Alkire, 33 W. Va. 517, 11 S. E. 11; Martin v. Martin, 33 W. Va. 695, 11 S. E. 12.

Nor is there any proof of the charge of adultery. The plaintiff introduced as a witness the party with whom the bill alleges the defendant committed it, and he admitted the failure of his efforts to obtain her consent to sexual intercourse with him, though he does testify that she went with him on two occasions to a secluded place in which the act might have been performed, and with evident intent on her part to engage in it with him. On the first occasion, there was no effort to induce her to do so because of the presence of a third party. On the second occasion, he says she emphatically refused, giving as the reason her belief that he was endeavoring to put her husband in a position to obtain a divorce from her. He charges her with conduct highly improper, lascivious, but not criminal, and was obviously not unfriendly in his testimony to the plaintiff. The defendant emphatically denies the conduct imputed to her by him, and explains her association with him on the occasion to which he refers. She says he had told her on a former occasion he had information to give her, and she met him on the evening to which she refers while walking along the railroad track, and asked him to tell her what it was. Then, for the ostensible purpose of communicating to her some secret, he induced her to walk a short distance up the hill into the woods from the railroad, and, when there, he had nothing to tell her and made an improper proposal which she indignantly rejected. This is the only effort on the part of the plaintiff to prove any act of adultery. Other evidence charges her with having associated with lewd women. She admits having left the two places successively provided for her by her husband, one because the landlady had closed her house, and the other because the inmates of the house had made it unpleasant for her, and gone to a boarding house where she associated more or less with two women of bad repute, but she says she had been so degraded by the conduct of her husband as to make it impossible for her to associate with more desirable persons. The testimony of the manager of the restaurant at which she had a room and where she is said to have associated with the two lewd women, was taken, and, while he testified as to the bad character of the two women and the association of the defendant with them, he does not give any instance of the association of the defendant with men, and he says he never saw anything suspicious in or about her room. He further says the plaintiff was taking his meals at his place when the defendant became an inmate of the house, and shortly thereafter paid his bill and went elsewhere. In view of the persistent efforts of the defendant to renew conjugal cohabitation with the plaintiff, it is not too much to say she probably went there in the first instance because he frequented the place. However that may be, there is no proof of any adultery on her part at that place or elsewhere. If her association with the two women who are said to have been of bad character raises a suspicion of evil-mindedness on her part, that is not enough to prove the charge of adultery. Martin v. Martin, and Latham v. Latham, cited; Throckmorton v. Throckmorton, 86 Va. 768, 11 S. E. 289. To establish it, direct and positive evidence of the criminal act is not required, but the circumstantial evidence must be sufficient to establish it clearly.

In support of the decree, it is said the finding of the trial court rests upon conflicting oral testimony. But there is no conflict in the evidence offered to prove desertion or justification of the act of the plaintiff in separating himself from his wife. As to this, the facts are admitted. The only conflict found in the testimony introduced to prove the charge of adultery relates to the reputation of the defendant for chastity. There is no direct evidence of any adulterous act, as has been shown, and there is conflict as to her reputation. Several witnesses say she obtained a bad reputation by her association with two evil-minded women, but perhaps an equal number deny the aspersion upon her character and reputation. Thus the conflict in the testimony narrows down to facts and circumstances which, if established, do no more than raise a suspicion. The defendant's conflicting evidence as to these matters may be rejected, and still there is lack of sufficient evidence of adultery. Moreover, the trial court evidently did not find her guilty of adultery, since the decree was from bed and board, and adultery would have authorized one a vinculo.

The denials of the answer, putting in issue all the material allegations of the bill, are followed by matter upon which there is predicated a prayer for an allowance of alimony by way of affirmative relief, and the trial court, notwithstanding the decree of divorce in favor of the plaintiff, required him to pay the defendant alimony in the sum of $25 per month for two years. In view of his unjustifiable desertion of her and refusal to support her, she is entitled, upon principles declared in Purcell v. Purcell, 4 Hen. & M. 507, and Almond v. Almond, 4 Rand. (Va.) 662, 15 Am. Dec. 781, to an allowance of alimony for her maintenance, until such time as a reconciliation may be effected, or until the right to it may be barred in some legal way. In our opinion, the monthly allowance decreed by the trial court is large enough under the circumstances. The plaintiff seems to have little or no estate. He is a railroad engineer making good wages, out of which he ought to be able to pay the $25 per month without embarrassment. The defendant herself has considerable property and is not wholly dependent upon her husband for support.

The decree for alimony is erroneous in two respects, however. It limits the period of payment to the 7th day of February, 1912. It further provides that the acceptance by the defendant of any portion thereof shall be an acquiescence in the decree of divorce and bar and preclude her right to an appeal from it, and that an application for an appeal from the decree shall render the provision for alimony ineffectual, inoperative, and void. The latter provisions are coercive in their operation and effect, and unduly restrain the liberty and right of the appellant as a litigant. After the appeal was allowed, the error of the court in the insertion thereof in the decree was confessed here.

As the decree is clearly erroneous in almost every respect, it will be reversed, and a decree will be entered here upon the prayer in the answer for cross relief, requiring the plaintiff to pay to the defendant the sum of $25 per month from the 14th day of September, 1910, the date of the decree appealed from, until the parties become reconciled and renew cohabitation, or the allowance becomes in some way barred by the conduct of the defendant, or until the further order of the circuit court of McDowell county, and the cause will be remanded for execution of the decree.

on a motion for a new trial that false and perjured testimony which the defendant had no fair opportunity to rebut at the trial probably influenced the jury to find him guilty, it is the duty of the court to set the conviction aside, and grant a new trial.

(February 7, 1914.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the District Court for Lyon County convicting him of assault with a deadly weapon with intent to kill. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Huggins & Riddle, H. E. Ganse, and W. S. Kretsinger for appellant.

Messrs. John S. Dawson, Attorney General, S. N. Hawkes, Assistant Attorney General, O. S. Samuel and W. N. Smelser for the State.

Porter, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendant appeals from a judgment convicting him of the crime of assaulting one Ernest Van Sickle with a deadly weapon with intent to kill. A former conviction was reversed and a new trial ordered on account of error in the instructions. State v. Mounkes, 88 Kan. 193, 127 Pac. 637. The facts out of which the prosecution arose are quite fully stated in the former opinion.

On both trials the defendant testified that his brother Arthur, a boy sixteen years of age, was assaulted by a number of young men in the schoolhouse yard, and was overtaken and thrown down, and that he called to the defendant for help and said, "They are killing me." He testified that he started to go to his brother's aid, and took a knife out of his pocket for the purpose of protecting and defending his brother; that he struck Van Sickle, because the latter attempted to prevent his going to his brother, and had stooped to pick up a rock, and was in a threatening attitude, and had used a vile epithet; that he struck to defend himself, and to enable him to go to his brother's assistance. Van Sickle testified that he had said nothing and done nothing to cause the appellant to strike him.

At both trials the defendant testified that on the schoolhouse ground, near the place where the fight occurred, there was a flower bed encircled by pieces of rock, and that when Van Sickle stooped down the defendant believed he had picked up a rock from the ground. On the second trial, at the close of the defendant's testimony, and late in the afternoon, the prosecuting witness, Van Sickle, and one other witness, were called in rebuttal, and both positively denied the existence of any flower bed on the school grounds, or that there were any rocks on the ground near where the encounter took place. The existence of the flower bed surrounded by stones was not disputed at the first trial; and the defendant claims that he was wholly surprised by the rebuttal testimony and was unprepared to meet it. At the former trial the prosecuting witness himself had testified that such a flower bed was there; but this fact was not remembered by the attorneys for the defendant, and in the few minutes that elapsed before the close of the case they were unable to produce any witnesses who knew the truth of the matter, except a sister of the defendant, whom the court permitted to testify in surrebuttal. In the argument of the case the attorneys for the state commented upon the testimony showing that there were no rocks at the place of the encounter, and argued to the jury that the defendant had testified falsely for the purpose of establishing his plea of self-defense, and dwelt upon the fact that another wholly disinterested witness had denied the existence of any flower bed near the place of the encounter.

Many cases in point with this note are included in the notes on perjury as ground for relief against judgment, referred to supra, and so have not been repeated. This note is confined to the question whether perjury, conceded or assumed for the purposes of the question to be such, is ground for new trial. Cases which merely discuss the question whether a new trial should be granted because of newly discovered evidence are not in point, even though the new evidence, if credited, necessarily shows that some of the evidence given on the trial was perjured.

Many elements enter into the right of a new trial on the ground of perjury. It is a general rule that the perjury must be as to a material point, also that the complainant was not negligent in meeting at the trial perjury which he was bound to have anticipated, or, if surprised at its introduction, could have contradicted by diligent effort on his part. Where, however, there was no reason to suspect the testimony to be perjured, and no laches is shown, the courts generally will grant a new trial if, after the trial, evidence of its perjured character is discovered, and it is as to a material issue, or the verdict is based principally on such testimony.

If judgments predicated upon false swearing remained undisturbed, if the whim, caprice, or desire of a witness can marshal the forces of law and order to the aid of a litigant, regardless of the sanctity of an oath, then, not only will the power and respect of the court be impaired, but the very strength of the government be destroyed. Bernstein v. Schneider, 72 Misc. 479, 131 N. Y. Supp. 340.

And in Serwer v. Serwer, 71 App. Div. 415, 75 N. Y. Supp. 842, in holding that the trial court should set aside a verdict when in its opinion it was secured by perjury, the court said: "Weight of evidence is not to be adjudged by the language of witnesses alone. It shocks the sense of legal morality to argue that if a trial justice is convinced from his observations of the witnesses, and from the atmosphere of the trial, that a case has been presented and a verdict secured by perjured testimony, he is bound to receive and approve the verdict, and may not set it aside. Such a rule would make the judge a consenting party to a fraud upon the administration of the law. There is no doubt that a trial justice not only has, but is bound to exercise, the power of setting aside a verdict which, in his opinion, has been secured by perjury."

So, a new trial should be granted where it is shown that judgment was obtained on perjured testimony. Seward v. Cease, 50 Ill. 228; Chapman v. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. 102 App. Div. 176, 92 N. Y. Supp. 304.

Also, a verdict predicated almost wholly upon the false testimony of a party in interest should be set aside and a new trial granted. Wehrkamp v. Willet, 1 Daly, 4.

And in McCarthy v. Christopher Tenth Street R. Co. 10 Daly, 540, the court set aside a verdict for plaintiff because he thought that perjury had been committed, saying that he did so with the firm confidence that he was arresting, for the time at least, a most iniquitous proceeding.

So, also in Munro v. Callahan, 55 Neb. 75, 70 Am. St. Rep. 366, 75 N. W. 151, it was held that equity will vacate a judgment at law and grant a new trial where it is shown that the judgment was obtained on the perjured testimony of the successful party, and that the adverse party has not been negligent or guilty of laches, and has exhausted all his legal remedies for obtaining a vacation of such judgment.

Also, a judgment obtained by perjury and subornation of perjury will be vacated on motion of the defeated party. Nugent v. Metropolitan Street R. Co. 46 App. Div. 105, 61 N. Y. Supp. 476 (in this case plaintiff and all his witnesses, four in number, were, in the opinion of the court, conclusively shown to have committed perjury).

Nor, it was held, was laches a ground for denying such motion, the motion not having been made until after an appeal was taken to the court of appeals from the judgment of the appellate division affirming the judgment so obtained. Ibid. The court stated that the court is organized to enforce legal rights and redress legal wrongs, and more-

After the trial four persons who had heard the evidence went to the schoolhouse for the purpose of making an examination, and found the flower bed surrounded by rocks as testified to by the defendant. Their affidavits were used upon the motion for a new trial, and the evidence of the prosecuting witness at the first trial was produced, in which he testified to the existence of the flower bed. In addition, affidavits of three former school teachers who had taught there were introduced, to the effect that a flower bed surrounded with rocks was in the yard at the time of the alleged offense; and much additional testimony to the same effect was produced, including photographs showing the flower bed and the stones surrounding it. The existence of the flower bed there surrounded by rocks at the time the fight occurred is established beyond any doubt, from which it necessarily follows that the testimony of the witness to the contrary was false.

The court, however, refused to set aside the conviction and grant a new trial, upon the theory that it was not a vital issue whether there were in fact any rocks or stones at the place, and that if the jury found from the evidence that the defendant believed, or had reasonable grounds for believing, that the prosecuting witness was about to assault him in that way, the defendant had a right to rely on the plea of self-defense, "whether," as the court expressed it, "there was a stone within a mile of the place or not." We think a new over, whenever it is made to appear, as in this case, that a wrong has been perpetrated, it never hesitates to exercise the power which it has, unless to do so would do a greater injury than to refuse to exercise it.

But in Millman v. Drake & S. Co. 119 Minn. 124, 137 N. W. 300, a motion for a new trial on the ground of wilful false testimony given by one of plaintiff's witnesses was denied defendants because, as stated by the court, no suggestion appeared that plaintiff was in any way responsible for, or implicated in, the giving of the testimony, except in so far as the witness was produced by him, and it did appear that defendants knew that the testimony was false when given, and they produced witnesses who contradicted it on the trial, and the court fully complied with defendants' request that the jury be instructed particularly concerning this witness and his testimony.

It is not ground for a new trial that an accomplice the principal witness against one convicted of murder in the first degree, falsely swore that he had never been convicted of a felony. People v. Sullivan, 40 Misc. 308, 17 N. Y. Crim. Rep. 270, 81 N. Y. Supp. 989.

Nor can perjured testimony in one suit be relied upon as showing fraud practised in obtaining judgment in another suit, to support a petition for a new trial under a statute authorizing a new trial in case of a judgment obtained by fraud. Guth v. Bell, 153 Iowa, 511, 42 L.R.A.(N.S.) 692, 133 N. W. 883, Ann. Cas. 1913E, 142.

And where the court has no control over a judgment of conviction after the term at which it was rendered has passed, it has no power to set aside such a judgment and grant a new trial because of the perjury of a witness for the prosecution. State v. Williams, 147 Mo. 14, 47 S. W. 891.

Failure to meet perjury on trial.

Where the party could have shown the perjured character of his adversary's testimony at the time of trial, a new trial has 51 L.R.A.(N.S.)

generally been denied, on the ground that there must be an end of litigation.

Thus, in Powers v. St. Joseph, 91 Mo. App. 55, an action for injuries by reason of falling into an opening, false testimony that the shadow of a telephone pole fell across the opening and thus shut off the light from an electric light was held not to be ground for a new trial, as that the opening was sufficiently lighted or guarded was one of the main matters urged by defendant at the trial, and the electric light and the intervening pole were matters of evidence given by each side, and so there was no surprise at the evidence.

And in Sullivan v. Herrick, — Iowa, —, 140 N. W. 359, where, for all that appeared, petitioner for a new trial knew of the false testimony as well at the close of the trial as at the time the petition was filed, the court said that it was committed to the doctrine that a new trial cannot be awarded on petition because of perjured evidence having been resorted to in the trial, which could have been met.

And it would seem from the decision in Pepin v. Lautman, 28 Ind. App. 74, 62 N. E. 60, that perjured testimony offered at the trial would not be ground for a new trial when it was known at the time to be false, but no effort to meet it was made, nor time requested, but the case was submitted with the false testimony at the risk of obtaining judgment.

So, also, in Thiele v. Citizens' R. Co. 140 Mo. 319, 41 S. W. 800, 3 Am. Neg. Rep. 215, it was said that a party cannot be surprised that his adversary introduces testimony in support of the issues made by the pleadings, even though such testimony is false, and it was stated that the rule is thus forcibly stated by Phillips, P. J., in Bragg v. Moberly, 17 Mo. App. 221: "If a party be surprised by an unforeseen occurrence at the trial, he should make his misfortune known to the court instantly, and ask for a reasonable postponement to enable him to produce the countervailing proof. 'If he can relieve himself from his embarrassment by any mode, either by a nonsuit or a continuance or the introduction of other testi-trial should have been granted. Manifestly the false testimony must have influenced the jury unfavorably to the defendant's contention. The jury had been instructed that, if they believed that a witness had wilfully testified falsely to a material fact, they might entirely disregard his testimony, that they were the judges of whether the defendant was acting honestly and fairly and with the apprehension of danger, and that, in determining whether he reasonably or honestly believed himself to be in great danger of bodily harm, they might take into consideration all acts and circumstances shown in the evidence. If the jury had believed that there were stones on the ground near where the encounter took place, and that defendant knew this, they might the more readily have concluded that he acted reasonably in believing himself to be in danger of great bodily harm. It is difficult to conceive why the testimony was not prejudicial to the defendant.

It is said that new trials are not granted on the ground of newly discovered evidence which is merely cumulative. But this was more than cumulative; it was conclusive evidence of a fact that had been disputed at the trial, and which, though collateral to the main issue, became more or less material. In a survey and boundary case (Dent v. Simpson, 81 Kan. 217, 105 Pac. 542) the controversy turned upon the true location of the government corner, about which the evidence was conflicting. The surveyor was unable to find the governmony, or otherwise, he must not take the chances of a verdict, but must at once fortify his position by resorting to all available modes of present relief."

And one who has paid a claim sued on, and knows that a judgment can be obtained only on false testimony, which he is able to rebut, but refuses to produce the evidence or defend the action, is not entitled to a new trial. Heathcote v. Haskins, 74 Iowa, 566, 38 N. W. 417. The court said: "That the production upon the trial of false testimony to establish a cause of action or defense would in many cases amount to such a fraud as would entitle the adverse party to a new trial, or the vacation of the judgment, is certainly true. This would be so if the fact of its falsity or the evidence by which the fact could be established was not discovered until after the trial or the rendition of the judgment. But it would be trifling with the law to permit a party who, being advised in advance that testimony of that character would be resorted to on the trial, and who knew also of the existence of evidence by which the false testimony could be rebutted, but who neglected to either produce that evidence or assert his defense, to afterwards question the judgment because it was founded on that testimony; for, while it is the policy of the law to afford the parties to litigation the fullest opportunity for the establishment of their rights, it is equally its policy to maintain and enforce the judgments pronounced by the courts after those opportunities have been enjoyed by the parties."

But perjured testimony upon a material issue, offered by the prevailing party to the action, which could not be contradicted at the trial, is ground for a new trial. First Nat. Bank v. Wabash, St. L. & P. R. Co. 61 Iowa, 700, 17 N. W. 48; and to the same effect, see Ricker v. Horn, 74 Me. 289, and Nudd v. Home Ins. & Bkg. Co. 25 Minn. 100.

And, so, false testimony by a party to the action, where the adverse party is taken by surprise, was held in Seely v. Purdy, 3 N. S. 414, to be a ground for a new trial, as the surprise was not only on a material point, but on a point to which the complaining party's attention was not drawn, and which he had no notice that he was to meet, and on which testimony could be supplied only by one whose knowledge thereof was not known to complaining party at the time of the trial.

And in Pettine v. New Mexico, 119 C. C. A. 581, 201 Fed. 489, trial of indictment for murder, first degree, which resulted in conviction of second degree murder and sentence of forty-five years, it was held a gross abuse of its discretion for the trial court to submit the case to the jury upon the false testimony of a witness whose evidence was given too late for accused to demonstrate its falsity, inasmuch as, the court stated, until this testimony was given, the evidence as to the accused's guilt was conflicting, with little, if any, preponderance against him, and there was not a fair trial when such false testimony was thrown into the wavering balance at the close of the trial, too late for its falsity to be demonstrated, nor was it clear beyond doubt that this testimony did not turn the scales against him, or remove from the mind of some juror a reasonable doubt of his guilt.

So, also, in Zettel v. Taylor, 129 App. Div. 642, 114 N. Y. Supp. 467, where defendant in a personal injury action did not appear, because not informed of the time of the trial, and the plaintiff's evidence was uncontroverted, it was held that a new trial should be granted as plaintiff clearly committed deliberate perjury in his testimony as to the extent of his injuries.

And wilful perjury of the successful party, who was the only witness, was held in Laithe v. McDonald, 12 Kan. 340, to be a good ground for a new trial, although the adverse party was absent from the trial, he having been shown to have exercised reasonable diligence to be ready to defend the action. The court said: "Of course, a defendant failing to defend cannot have the judgment vacated on account of any innocent mistake or want of recollection on the part of the plaintiff or other witness, nor even on account of the perjury of the other witnesses, provided the plaintiff himself is ment stone, and established the corner some distance from where plaintiff claimed it should be. After a judgment approving the surveyor's report, plaintiff produced a witness who testified that he knew the true location of the corner, that he had been road overseer twenty years before, and in grading the road had plowed up and covered over the government stone; that after the trial he went to the place, dug down, and found the original stone in the exact location that it was when he graded the road. The newly discovered evidence was held not to be cumulative, and the judgment was reversed for error in refusing to grant a new trial. But manifestly, where a defendant has been convicted of a crime, his right to a new trial should not depend upon the technical question of whether certain evidence is or is not cumulative. He is entitled to a fair trial; and where it appears that perjured testimony which he had no fair opportunity to rebut at the trial probably influenced the jury to find him guilty, it is the duty of the court to set the conviction aside, and grant a new wholly guiltless. Nor can he have the judgment vacated on account of any mistake or error on the part of the court or jury, unless the record affirmatively shows such mistake or error. All such mistakes and errors each party is bound to anticipate, and to prepare for by extraordinary diligence. But no party is bound to anticipate or to suppose that the other party will commit wilful and corrupt perjury; and no party is bound to exercise extraordinary diligence in preparing to meet such perjury."

A case which would seem to be at variance with the rule that failure to meet perjured testimony at the trial, where possible, defeats the right to a new trial, is Klinger v. Markowitz, 54 App. Div. 299, 66 N. Y. Supp. 1135, 65 N. Y. Supp. 369, an action to recover for wrongful discharge under an alleged special contract of hiring for a specified time. Defendant denied the alleged contract, claiming that the hiring was by the week only, and called two witnesses who testified that they were in defendant's employ, were present when the plaintiff was employed, and that the hiring was by the week only, whereupon plaintiff called a witness who testified that he was in defendant's employ at the time, and that neither of the two witnesses called by defendant was, nor was either present when plaintiff was employed, and could not have been present when the contract was concluded. A verdict for plaintiff was had, and a new trial was granted on the ground that plaintiff's witness had committed wilful and corrupt perjury, as it was conclusively shown by twenty-seven affidavits that defendant's witnesses were in his employ at the time stated. The court said that the witness's testimony evidently had great weight with the jury, for he appeared in the role of a disinterested witness, from whom the truth was naturally to be expected. Upon a new trial his evidence will be entitled to no credence whatever, and it will be reasonably safe to assume that a different result may follow. Courts cannot sustain verdicts obtained by perjured evidence without encouraging perjury, the most dangerous of crimes. Perjury should be denounced whenever it appears, and driven, if possible, out of the sanctuary of justice. But in a dissenting opinion, Judge Ingraham said: "The court below granted a new trial of this action upon the ground that one of the witnesses called by the plaintiff in rebuttal testified falsely. His testimony was contradicted by other witnesses upon the trial, and the questions of fact were submitted to the jury. The court on a motion for a new trial, upon the affidavits of several persons which tended to show that the evidence of this witness called by the plaintiff was false, granted a new trial. I know of no principle upon which such an order can be sustained. When the issues in such an action are tried by a jury, their verdict should, I think, be final, and if they may be retried upon affidavit by the special term, it seems to me that it would be better to have the case originally tried upon affidavits, rather than to go through the useless formality of submitting the question to a jury."

After-discovered evidence tending to prove that a material part of plaintiff's testimony was false was held, in Struthers v. Wagner, 6 Phila. 262, to entitle the defendant to have the case submitted to another jury. And to the same effect are Cleslie v. Frerichs, 95 Iowa, 83, 63 N. W. 581, and Raphaelsky v. Lynch, 43 How. Pr. 157, 12 Abb. Pr. N. S. 224, 2 Jones & S. 31.

And there is a dictum in State v. Foster, 91 Iowa, 164, 59 N. W. 8, that under a provision that the court may grant a new trial in criminal cases when, from any other cause than those previously named, the defendant has not received a fair and impartial trial a new trial might be granted when false testimony of a material character had been given in the case, and the proof of its falsity had not, and by diligence could not have, been ascertained until after the trial.

So, in Bernstein v. Schneider, 72 Misc. 479, 131 N. Y. Supp. 340, two witnesses for the successful litigant testified that they were not related to him, and, subsequently to the trial, it was learned that one was a brother-in-law and the other a cousin, and it was held that, as the testimony was as to a material point at issue, a new trial should be granted.

And in Hansen v. Vogelsang, 139 App. Div. 750, 124 N. Y. Supp. 437, action for breach of warranty on sale of a cow, testimony of plaintiff that he killed the cow by order of the commissioner of agriculture, which was afterward found to be false, was held to entitle the defendant to a new trial on the ground of newly discovered evidence.

A new trial should be granted where trial. State v. Tyson, 58 Kan. 686, 44 Pac. 609; State v. Keleher, 74 Kan. 631 at page 643, 87 Pac. 738. In the last case it was said in the opinion: "A jury should have the opportunity to hear all of this testimony, and to determine what should be believed. Where the probable effect of the newly discovered evidence is doubtful, or impossible to determine, a new trial should be granted. Dennis v. State, 103 Ind. 142, 2 N. E. 349, 5 Am. Crim. Rep. 469; 14 Enc. Pl. & Pr. 842; Lindley v. State, 11 Tex. App. 283." p. 643.

testimony is clearly falsified by affidavits, Lister v. Mundell, 1 Bos. & P. 427. In this case affidavits were produced that certain testimony on a material point was false, and the adverse party admitted that he could not contradict the affidavits.

—confession.

In Dennis v. State, 103 Ind. 142, 2 N. E. 349, 5 Am. Crim. Rep. 469, where defendant was convicted of murder, first degree, upon the testimony of one who afterward confessed that he had perjured himself, a new trial was granted on the ground that defendant ought not to be permitted to suffer the extreme penalty of death where conviction was obtained upon confessedly false and perjured testimony.

And in State v. Powell, 51 Wash. 372, 98 Pac. 741, where prosecutrix in a prosecution for rape made affidavit that her testimony at the trial was false, and testified at the hearing on motion for new trial to the same effect, also testifying that her testimony was coerced, it was held an abuse of discretion to refuse to grant a new trial.

So, also, in Bussey v. State, 69 Ark. 545, 64 S. W. 268, where there was a conviction of rape and sentence to death, it was held error to refuse a new trial upon the ground of newly discovered evidence, where, after the trial, the prosecuting witness upon whose testimony the prosecution and conviction were based, almost entirely retracted her testimony, and there was every reason to believe that the retraction, and not the testimony, was true.

In State v. Moberly, 121 Mo. 604, 26 S. W. 364, it was held that where the principal witness for the prosecution on the trial of an indictment for a felonious assault confesses, after the trial, that his testimony was false, and makes affidavit to that effect, a new trial should be granted on the ground of newly discovered evidence.

And affidavits that perjured testimony was given as to a crucial point relied upon for conviction of one charged with assault entitle one to a new trial when there is every presumption that the matters stated in the affidavits are correct. Piper v. State, 57 Tex. Crim. Rep. 605, 124 S. W. 661.

Also, in Great Falls Mfg. Co. v. Mathes, 5 N. H. 574, a conviction of a witness, for perjury on his own confession, was held to be ground for a new trial, although the 51 L.R.A.(N.S.)

While it cannot be said in the present case, as was said in the Keleher Case, that the newly discovered evidence, if believed, entirely obliterates the evidence of the witness upon which the conviction was based, still it is true that it seriously affects his credibility as a witness, and also the credibility of the defendant; and their testimony was directly conflicting with respect to a material matter of defense.

The judgment is reversed, and a new trial ordered.

court stated that an indictment for perjury was not a ground, nor perhaps would conviction founded upon the testimony of those interested in the case be a ground.

And in Benda v. Keil, 34 Misc. 396, 69 N. Y. Supp. 655, where a material witness repudiated almost his entire testimony, it was held that, as there was doubt as to whether omitting the perjured testimony would produce a different result, a new trial should be granted.

But confession of perjury on the part of a material witness does not necessarily call for a new trial, if, eliminating such evidence, there is still other evidence sufficient to support the judgment. Bussey v. State, 69 Ark. 545, 64 S. W. 268; United States v. Raymundo, 14 Philippine, 416.

Thus, also, in United States v. Biena, 8 N. M. 99, 42 Pac. 70, although a witness for the prosecution subsequently confessed to perjury, and was convicted and sentenced therefor, a new trial was denied, as there was sufficient evidence to sustain the verdict.

Conviction — as essential to new trial.

Conviction of the perjurer, or his death rendering conviction impossible, is necessary to the setting aside in a court of equity on account of perjury, of a verdict obtained in a court of law. Dyche v. Patton, 56 N. C. (3 Jones, Eq.) 332.

And Dexter v. Handy, 13 R. I. 474, in effect holds that conviction of a perjurer is essential to the granting of a new trial on the ground of perjury.

In Richardson v. Roberts, 25 Ga. 671, it was held that as, under the Code, the court cannot lawfully set aside a verdict or judgment because of perjury, unless the person charged with perjury shall have been duly convicted thereof, and unless it shall appear to the court that the verdict or judgment could not have been obtained or entered up without such perjured evidence, a new trial could not be granted, though a witness was guilty of perjury, where it was not shown that the verdict could not have been obtained without such evidence.

And, also, in Munro v. Moody, 78 Ga. 127, 2 S. E. 688, the court refused to set aside a verdict on the ground of perjury, as there had been no conviction of perjury, and, admitting the perjury, the verdict could have been obtained without such evidence.

And in Brown v. State, 60 Ga. 210; Gant v. State, 115 Ga. 205, 41 S. E. 698, it was held that under the Code there must first be a conviction of perjury in order that the verdict may be set aside on that ground.

—as ground for new trial.

If the witness be convicted of perjury, it is a good cause for a new trial. Tilly v. Wharton, 2 Vern. 378.

And in Chappell v. State, 6 Okla. Crim. Rep. 398, 119 Pac. 139, it was held that a new trial should be granted one convicted of crime on the self-confessed perjury of the main witness for the state.

But it was held in Davies v. Bricknell, L. R. 3 Prob. & Div. 88, that the fact that plaintiff had been convicted of perjury as to his evidence was not of itself sufficient to justify the granting of a new trial after an application for a new trial on the ground that the verdict was against the weight of evidence had been denied. The court said: "It is indeed prima facie a striking thing, that a man who has been convicted of perjury should remain in possession of a victory apparently obtained by the very evidence for which the jury has found him guilty of perjury. But in deciding this question, I must bear in mind what had previously taken place. At the first trial a set of witnesses told their story, and on the other hand the plaintiff made his statement, and the jury, having heard and seen both sides, were unable to agree to a verdict. A second trial was had, the same witnesses were called and examined, and this man, who was afterwards convicted of perjury, told his story and was believed by the jury. On application for a new trial, Lord Penzance stated that he was not dissatisfied with the previous one, and refused the application. So that both the judge and jury who had seen the witness and heard him give his evidence held that he was entitled to credit. The other party, taking advantage of the machinery of the criminal law, indicted this man, who when he was heard in this court had been believed, for perjury, and on that indictment, the mouth of the prisoner and of his wife being closed, those witnesses who were not believed in this court had it all their own way, and he was convicted. As no new witnesses were called in the criminal court, and no new facts have been brought before me, I think I ought to accept the finding of the jury in this court, sanctioned and approved as it was by Lord Penzance."

And a new trial will not be granted upon conviction of a witness of perjury, where the plaintiff in the trial at which the perjured testimony was given was incompetent as a witness therein, and was the principal witness against him in the criminal action, and made the motion for a new trial. Horne v. Horne, 75 N. C. 101. The court said: "It is not denied that a new trial may be granted where the witnesses upon whose testimony the verdict was obtained have since been convicted of perjury. . . . But in exercising the discretion to grant or refuse a new trial, the court will distinguish between a conviction of the witness procured by the oath of a convicted and deeply interested plaintiff, and a conviction procured by disinterested testimony. If a party to an action, who is an incompetent witness, after his trial and conviction, can thus by his own evidence break down the character and credibility of the adverse witness, and thus relieve himself of the consequences of the verdict by obtaining another trial, in which the convicted witness would be disqualified or discredited, not only would a wide door be opened to perjury, but the party would obtain indirectly what he is debarred from directly, to wit, the benefit of his own evidence in his own behalf. The plaintiff . . . in the divorce suit is not a competent witness in his own behalf, . . . but after a verdict against him, he can avoid the consequences and obtain another trial by convicting the witness against him of perjury, by his own oath; and upon the second trial can offer this conviction in discredit of the witness. The mischiefs which would result from such an adjudication are too great to be overlooked. How it would be, had the adverse witness been convicted by disinterested evidence, we are not called upon to say. As the case now stands, it is clear that Horne, as a witness against Rickets upon the indictment for perjury, had more motives to commit perjury himself than had Rickets to commit perjury in the divorce suit."

Indictment.

Indictment for perjury of a witness on whose testimony the verdict was obtained is not ground for a new trial (Seeley v. Mayhew, 4 Bing. 561; Hampshire v. Harris, 3 Jur. 980); a probable cause must be laid to show that the verdict was obtained by perjury (Benfield v. Petrie, 3 Dougl. K. B. 24; Macpherson v. Petrie, 3 Dougl. K. B. 26; Petrie v. Milles, 3 Dougl. K. B. 27).

Under statute.

In Laithe v. McDonald, 7 Kan. 254, in construing a statute providing that a judgment may be vacated for "fraud practised by the successful party in obtaining judgment," the court said that the giving or using of false testimony, though it may operate to the injury of the unsuccessful party, is not necessarily fraud practised by the successful party. The rule is that when the party, being himself a witness, commits wilful perjury, or makes use of false testimony which he knows to be false, and thereby obtains a judgment, he practises fraud within the meaning of the statute quoted, for which the judgment may be vacated.

In Rickroad v. Martin, 43 Mo. App. 597, and Ridge v. Johnson, 129 Mo. App. 546, 107 S. W. 1103, it was held that, as a statute provided that a new trial may be granted "where the court is satisfied that perjury has been committed by a witness, and is also satisfied that an improper verdict or finding was occasioned by it, and that the party has a just cause of action or defense," perjury is a separate and independent ground upon which the court may award a new trial, and the effect of the perjury need not be a surprise,—distinguishing cases where the application for a new trial because of perjury is granted upon surprise.

See also Georgia cases supra, under "Conviction."

Effect of other evidence to support verdict or judgment.

But where there is other evidence to support the judgment, perjured testimony by the prevailing party is not such fraud as authorizes the judgment to be vacated. McDougall v. Walling, 21 Wash. 478, 75 Am. St. Rep. 849, 58 Pac. 669, distinguishing Laithe v. McDonald, supra, and Munro v. Callahan, 55 Neb. 75, 70 Am. St. Rep. 366, 75 N. W. 151, as cases where judgment was based solely upon the perjured testimony of the prevailing party.

So, also, where there was other evidence to sustain a verdict, it has been held that a new trial should be denied, in United States v. Biena, 8 N. M. 99, 42 Pac. 70; Bussey v. State, 69 Ark. 545, 64 S. W. 268; United States v. Raymundo, 14 Philippine, 416; Richardson v. Roberts, 25 Ga. 671; Munro v. Moody, 78 Ga. 127, 2 S. E. 888 (the last two cases being under statute).

KENTUCKY COURT OF APPEALS.

OLIVER COMPANY, Appt.,
v.

LOUISVILLE REALTY ASSOCIATION.

(156 Ky. 628, 161 S. W. 570.)

Corporation — action on contract — failure to comply with statute as defense.

1. It is a good defense to an action brought by a foreign corporation upon a contract made in the prosecution of its business within the state, that it has not complied with a statute which expressly provides that it shall not be lawful for any corporation to carry on any business in the state until it shall have filed a statement giving the location of its place of business within the state, and the name of an agent thereat upon whom process may be served, and which further subjects to a penalty any corporation undertaking to transact any business in the state without complying with such requirements, although such statute does not in terms declare that any contract made by a corporation before complying with the statute shall be void or not enforceable.

Estoppel — stare decisis — fundamental principle of.

2. The rule of stare decisis, stated in simple form and considered in relation to its effect upon private affairs, is really nothing more than the application of the doctrine of estoppel to court decisions. It finds its support in the sound principle that when courts have announced, for the guidance and government of individuals and the public, certain controlling principles of law, or have given a construction to statutes upon which individuals and the public have relied in making contracts, they ought not, after these principles have been promulgated and after these constructions have been published, to withdraw or overrule them, thereby disturbing contract rights that had been entered into, and property rights that had been acquired, upon the faith and credit that the principle announced or the construction adopted in the opinion was the law of the land.

Same — who may invoke doctrine.

3. When it appears that a party was not misled to his prejudice by reliance on a decision that the court rendering it subsequently concluded was erroneous, the court will not feel estopped to overrule it by the insistence of the party claiming to have acted under it that it will overturn contracts and engagements that he has entered into on the faith of it.

Same — right of corporation not complying with statutory requirements to invoke.

4. A corporation which subjects itself to a fine by prosecuting its business within the state without complying with statutory requirements is not in a position to invoke the doctrine of stare decisis to induce the court not to overrule an earlier decision to the effect that the other contracting party is estopped from setting up as a defense the failure of the corporation to comply with such requirements.

Same — limitations of doctrine.

5. A court of last resort will not feel bound to adhere to an earlier decision that a party entering into a contract with a corporation is estopped, in an action thereon, from setting up as a defense the failure of the corporation to comply with a statute, enacted pursuant to the Constitution, for the purpose of carrying out a wise public policy, which provides that it shall not be lawful for any corporation to carry on any business in the state until it shall have filed a statement giving the location of its place of business within the state, and the name of an agent thereat upon whom process may be served.

Fruin-Colnon Contracting Co. v. Chatterson, 40 L.R.A. (N.S.) 857.

For effect of change of judicial decisions to impair the obligation of a contract, see notes to Swanson v. Ottumwa, 5 L.R.A. (N.S.) 860, and Crigler v. Shepler, 23 L.R.A. (N.S.) 500.

Constitutional law — change of decision — impairing obligation of contracts.

6. The doctrine that if a contract when made was valid by the laws of the state, as then administered in its courts of justice, its validity and obligation cannot be impaired by any subsequent decision of the courts of the state, altering the construction of the law, does not apply where the making of the contract is in itself a violation of law; and therefore has no application where a corporation which has failed to comply with a statute subjecting to a penalty any corporation undertaking to transact any business in the state without filing a statement of the location of its place of business within the state and the name of an agent thereat, upon whom process may be served, seeks to enforce a contract entered into subsequently to an earlier decision of the court to the effect that failure to comply with such statutory requirements will not prevent the enforcement of a contract.

(December 19, 1913.)

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Chancery Branch, First Division, of the Circuit Court for Jefferson County, in defendant's favor in an action to enforce the collection of an amount due on a contract. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Bruce & Bullitt, for appellant:

Although a corporation may have failed to file with the secretary of state a statement showing its place of business and name of an agent for receipt of process, as required by statute, nevertheless a contract between such corporation and a third party, which has been performed by the corporation, and under which the other party to the contract has received and retained benefits, is enforceable as between the parties to it.

Carroll, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The question for decision in this case is this: Is it a good defense, to an action brought in a state court by a foreign corporation to enforce the collection of the amount due on a contract entered into in the execution of its business here engaged in, that it has not complied with § 571 of the Kentucky Statutes reading: "All corporations except foreign insurance companies formed under the laws of this or any other state, and carrying on any business in this state, shall at all times have one or more known places of business in this state, and an authorized agent or agents thereat, upon whom process can be served; and it shall not be lawful for any corporation to carry on any business in this state, until it shall have filed in the office of the secretary of state a statement, signed by its president or secretary, giving the location of its office or offices in this state, and the name or names of its agent or agents thereat upon whom process can be served; and when any change is made in the location of its office or offices, or in its agent or agents, it shall at once file with the secretary of state a statement of such change; and the former agent shall remain agent for the purpose of service until statement of appointment of the new agent is filed; and if any corporation fails to comply with the requirements of this section, such corporation, and any agent or employee of such corporation, who shall transact, carry on or conduct any business in this state, for it, shall be severally guilty of a misdemeanor, and fined not less than $100 nor more than $1,000 for each offense"? The Oliver Company is a Tennessee corporation, and entered into a contract with the Louisville Realty Association to do certain work for it in the construction of a building by the latter company in the city of Louisville, Kentucky. The contract fixed the compensation that should be paid to the Oliver Company for the work it agreed to do, but during the progress of the work certain changes were made in the specifications, and as a result of differences arising between the parties to the contract as to the amount that should be paid, this suit was brought by the Oliver Company to recover from the realty company the sum it claimed was due it on the contract.

To this suit several defenses were made going to the merits of the claim asserted by the Oliver Company, but the issues arising on the merits of the controversy we do not find it necessary to discuss. The only question that we need concern ourselves with is the sufficiency of the defense relied on by the realty company that the Oliver Company could not maintain the action because it had failed to comply with the statute quoted. The lower court ruled that the failure of the Oliver Company to observe the requirements of this statute denied it the right to maintain the action, and dismissed its suit, and in the correctness of this decision we concur.

It will be observed that this statute expressly provides that it shall not be lawful for any corporation to carry on any business in this state until it shall have observed the requirements of the section, and further subjects to a penalty any corporation undertaking to transact, carry on, or conduct any business in this state without observing the section, although it does not in terms declare that any contract made by a corporation before complying with the statute shall be void or not enforceable. The fact, however, that the statute does not expressly declare that contracts made before complying with the section shall be void or not enforceable does not weaken the effect of the statute as a prohibition against the enforcement of contracts made by a corporation in violation of the statute. In other words, the declaration of the statute that it shall not be lawful for any corporation to carry on any business in this state until it shall have observed the requirements of the statute, and the imposition of a penalty for engaging in business in violation of it, has the same effect and accomplishes the same end as if the statute had expressly declared the invalidity of contracts made without observing its conditions.

Upon this point we may repeat what was said in the case of Fruin-Colnon Contracting Co. v. Chatterson, 146 Ky. 504, 40 L.R.A.(N.S.) 857, 143 S. W. 6, where this question was discussed: "The statute does not provide that contracts, entered into before it has been complied with, shall be void or nonenforceable, nor does it use any language in reference to the contract; but, when a statute makes it unlawful to do business under certain conditions, it seems to necessarily and logically follow that the doing of the business under the prohibited conditions is in itself unlawful. When the doing of the act is made unlawful, there is 51 L.R.A.(N.S.) no reason why the statute should also declare that contracts made in violation of it should also be unlawful. When the law prohibits a thing, it is unlawful to do it, and the courts should not lend their aid to the enforcement of prohibited contracts. Courts are established to afford remedies to litigants who seek relief growing out of lawful transactions, and not to aid those who would invoke their assistance to enforce contracts made in violation of law. Their chief purpose is to secure the observance of laws enacted for the safety and protection of life and property and the general well-being of the people, and it would be a startling departure from this purpose if they should also give relief to parties who were seeking to enforce contracts made in violation of law. Such a course of procedure would be a perversion of justice, and convert the courts into instruments to aid lawbreakers in place of punishing them." The principle thus announced is supported by abundant authority, for it is a generally prevailing rule that a contract is void if prohibited by statute, though the statute only inflicts a penalty and does not in terms declare illegal contracts made in violation of it. Lindsey v. Rutherford, 17 B. Mon. 246; Vanmeter v. Spurrier, 94 Ky. 22, 21 S. W. 337; Harris v. Runnels, 12 How. 79, 13 L. ed. 901; Wilson v. Spencer, 1 Rand. (Va.) 76, 10 Am. Dec. 491; Harrison v. Berkley, 1 Strobh. L. 525, 47 Am. Dec. 578; Woods v. Armstrong, 54 Ala. 150, 25 Am. Rep. 671; Columbia Bank & Bridge Co. v. Haldeman, 7 Watts & S. 233, 42 Am. Dec. 229; Roby v. West, 4 N. H. 285, 17 Am. Dec. 423, and Levinson v. Boas, 150 Cal. 185, 12 L.R.A.(N.S.) 575, 88 Pac. 825, 11 Ann. Cas. 661.

But passing this, a vigorous assault is made on the decision of the lower court denying to the Oliver Company the right to maintain the action it had instituted, and it is earnestly pressed on our attention that the statute should not be so construed as to prohibit a corporation that had failed to comply with the statute from bringing suit to enforce contracts made in the prosecution of its business in this state. The argument is made that persons who make otherwise valid contracts with foreign corporations should be estopped to deny the right of the corporation to enforce them. It is, of course, at once apparent that the effect of such a construction of this statute would be to destroy the life and vigor of the feature of it now under consideration. So construed, it would virtually have no meaning or effect at all. It would be to say, in substance, to a corporation: "It is true the statute expressly prohibits you from doing business in this state until you have complied with its simple provisions, but if it does not suit your convenience or your interest to do so, your failure will not prejudice any rights that you may have. If you choose to observe these requirements, well and good, but if you don't, you can yet carry on any business you please and make as many contracts as you wish, and the courts of the state are open to your pleas, and, notwithstanding your dereliction of duty and your violation of law, will afford you all the remedies that could be afforded if you had seen proper to observe the statute." If corporations may thus lightly treat the laws of this state, if they may ignore them at their pleasure and comply with them or not, as suits their convenience, free from any of the civil disabilities imposed by the statute, the legislature of the state might as well cease the enactment of laws intended to protect the people of the state in their dealings with corporations.

The statute, as may be readily seen, does not impose any harsh or unreasonable conditions. A literal compliance with its simple requirements is both easy and inexpensive, and no good reason can be assigned why a corporation undertaking to do business in the state should not be obliged to observe its provisions. It is a useful statute, and was intended as a police regulation for the protection of the people of the state, who have a right to know whether the party they are dealing with is an individual, or a corporation. It is a notorious fact that the country is full of corporations engaged in every imaginable line of business, with their agents going here and there and everywhere, and many of the people dealing with them do not know where the home of the corporation is, or, if they do know, would find it impracticable to seek relief by suits in foreign jurisdictions. Except for this statute they would not, in many instances, know on whom process could be served, or in what county a suit against the corporation could be brought, and thus in many cases would be left virtually remediless. To relieve in a measure the disadvantages our citizens, as a result of this condition, were placed under in their dealings with corporations, the legislature undertook in this statute to say that when a corporation, whether foreign or domestic, desired to engage in business in this state, it should at all times have an agent at a known place of business in this state upon whom process could be served, and to whom the citizens of the state might look if it became necessary to seek redress in the courts of the state, so that any citizen desiring to institute an action against a corporation might, by writing to the secretary of state, learn who and where its agent was, and where its place of business was, and thus be able to secure such relief as the circumstances of the case seemed to demand.

So universally recognized is the wisdom and propriety of this character of legislation that every state in the Union, save possibly two, have adopted statutes in substance the same as ours, and the courts of these different states, as we will presently point out, have, with few exceptions, given to these salutary statutes the same construction and the same meaning and effect that we have.

As said by the United States circuit court of appeals in Pittsburgh Constr. Co. v. West Side Belt R. Co. 11 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1145, 83 C. C. A. 501, 154 Fed. 929, in speaking of a like statute: "This act is a salutary one, for the protection of persons transacting business with foreign corporations. The facility with which irresponsible corporations are created, frequently with no assets within the jurisdiction where business is transacted, would frequently leave creditors without any chance whatever of collecting their claims, were it not for acts requiring registration where business is transacted. This enables the creditors to bring the foreign corporation within the jurisdiction of the courts where the obligations are created; and, in order that the provisions of these laws may be complied with, it is necessary that they should receive a reasonably strict enforcement."

The purpose of the statute is also well expressed by the supreme court of Pennsylvania in Delaware River Quarry & Constr. Co. v. Bethlehem & N. Pass. R. Co. 204 Pa. 22, 53 Atl. 533, where the court said: "The purpose of the act is to bring foreign corporations doing business in this state within the reach of legal process. This purpose is not accomplished by a registration of the corporation at the pleasure of its officers, or when it may be to their interest to appeal to our courts. The act is for the protection of those with whom it does business, or to whom it may incur liability by its wrongful acts, and nothing short of a registration before the contract that it seeks to enforce is made can give it a right of action. Any other construction of the act would violate its plain words, and wholly defeat its object by affording protection to the corporation and denying it to the public."

It may further be observed that the effect of allowing the plea of estoppel would be to defeat one of the chief purposes of the statute. For example, if every person who made a contract with a corporation should be denied the right to set up, when sued by the corporation, the defense that when making the contract it acted in violation of law, instances would be very rare in which the statute could be effectively interposed, and the corporation punished for failing to observe it. There are few cases in which business transactions are not directly conducted between the parties affected, or others acting for them, and it is manifest that if the party within the law should be estopped to make the defense that the other party was without the law, the party who was guilty of violating the law would feel assured that his violation would not subject him to any disadvantage. In short, if the statute is to be given effect, the doctrine of estoppel should not be applied. So apparent is the fact that the adoption of the doctrine of estoppel would virtually nullify the purpose of the statute that the authorities generally refuse to assent to it, although the failure to apply this rule may, in some cases, work a hardship on the delinquent corporation.

It is equally plain that the fact that the enforcement of the statute may work hardships on corporations that fail to obey it, and sometimes prevent them from collecting just debts, cannot, without ignoring the legislative intent, be allowed to defeat the object sought to be accomplished by the enactment of the law. Every person who violates the law puts himself in the attitude of being required to pay the penalty for the infraction; but, although the delinquency may subject him to punishment, civil or criminal, this of course furnishes no reason why the statute should not be enforced. The individual who violates a penal statute may expect to pay the penalty, and so a corporation that violates the civil features of a statute is not in any position to complain if it, too, must pay the penalty.

These views in different forms of expression have been frequently announced. Thus, in Thompson on Corporations, 2d ed. vol. 5, § 8712, it is said: "Such statutes are intended for the protection of the citizens of the state who deal with such foreign corporation, and there are many reasons why a person, after dealing with such a corporation, should have the right to insist on compliance with the statute, when the corporation sues to enforce the contract. The effect of the cases holding otherwise is to make such a statute an instrument of fraud as against persons whom it was intended to protect, and the doctrine of estoppel cannot be extended so far as to aid a foreign corporation in doing what was forbidden by statute." 51 L.R.A.(N.S.)

In Cyclone Min. Co. v. Baker Light & P. Co. (C. C.) 165 Fed. 996, the court, in answering the argument that the doctrine of estoppel should be applied, said: "Nor are the defendants estopped, by reason of their contractual relations with the plaintiff, from insisting that the contract is void, and the plaintiff without legal right or capacity to sue for the breach thereof, because if so estopped, the plaintiff would be permitted to take advantage of its own offending acts done in derogation and even in defiance of the law. It would be a revolting doctrine, fraught with inconceivable, deleterious results, if a foreign corporation could come into a state not its own, and there carry on a business in direct defiance of the provisions of law by which it may capacitate itself for the transaction of business therein, and then validate its acts because, forsooth, parties had dealt with it; for but few others have cause for suit except those having contractual relations in some form with such corporations."

Out of a large number of cases illustrating the rule that a corporation or an individual that has made a contract for carrying on a business in violation of law or without having complied with statutory requirements cannot enforce the collection of his or its demands created in carrying on the business, and that the defendant, although the beneficiary of the unlawful transaction, when sued is not estopped to raise the question of the disability of the plaintiff to maintain the suit, we may select the following: Smith v. Robertson, 106 Ky. 472, 45 L.R.A. 510, 50 S. W. 852; Franklin Ins. Co. v. Louisville & A. Packet Co. 9 Bush, 590; Bull v. Harragan, 17 B. Mon. 349; Woods v. Armstrong, 54 Ala. 150, 25 Am. Rep. 671; G. Heileman Brewing Co. v. Peimeisl, 85 Minn. 121, 88 N. W. 441; Delaware River Quarry & Constr. Co. v. Bethlehem & N. Pass. R. Co. 204 Pa. 22, 53 Atl. 533; United Lead Co. v. Reedy Elevator Mfg. Co. 222 Ill. 199, 78 N. E. 567, 6 Ann. Cas. 637; Cary-Lombard Lumber Co. v. Thomas, 92 Tenn. 587, 22 S. W. 743; Seamans v. Temple Co. 105 Mich. 400, 28 L.R.A. 430, 55 Am. St. Rep. 457, 63 N. W. 408; Commonwealth Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. Hayden Bros. 60 Neb. 636, 83 Am. St. Rep. 545, 83 N. W. 922; Tri-State Amusement Co. v. Forest Park Highlands Amusement Co. 192 Mo. 404, 4 L.R.A.(N.S.) 688, 111 Am. St. Rep. 511, 90 S. W. 1020, 4 Ann. Cas. 808; State Bank v. Lawrence, 177 Ind. 515, 42 L.R.A.(N.S.) 326, 96 N. E. 947; E. A. Strout Co. v. Howell, — Del. —, 85 Atl. 666.

Another argument advanced by counsel for the Oliver Company is rested on the doctrine of stare decisis. In support of this contention, our attention is called to the fact that in Johnson v. Mason Lodge, 106 Ky. 838, 61 S. W. 820, decided in 1899, this court held that a person who contracted with a corporation that had failed to comply with the statute here in question would be estopped, when sued by the corporation, to set up as a defense the illegality of the transaction, and it is said that the principle announced in this case was followed in Aultman & T. Co. v. Mead, 109 Ky. 583, 60 S. W. 294, and Hallam v. Ashford, 24 Ky. L. Rep. 870, 70 S. W. 197, and therefore, following the rule of stare decisis, this court should now adhere to these opinions. In other words, the effect of the argument is this: That the Oliver Company felt authorized to violate this statute because this court said in Johnson v. Mason Lodge that it might do so with impunity, and repeated this assurance of protection in the Ashford and Mead Cases subsequently decided. It might here be noted that Johnson v. Mason Lodge and the two cases that follow it were virtually overruled in Fruin-Colnon Contracting Co. v. Chatterson, 146 Ky. 504, 40 L.R.A. (N.S.) 857, 143 S. W. 6; but as this case was decided subsequent to the transaction of the business out of which this litigation arose, it cannot be said to deprive the Oliver Company of the right to rely on the doctrine of stare decisis, if the invocation of that doctrine saves it from the penalty of the statute. Before, however, taking up directly the question of stare decisis, it may be well to notice with more care the decision in Johnson v. Mason Lodge. The opinion in that case discloses that Mason Lodge was a Kentucky corporation and a branch of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows. It sued Johnson to recover a sum of money it had loaned him. In defense of the suit, he set up that the corporation was not legally organized, and, furthermore, that it had not complied with § 571 of the statute, and for these reasons could not enforce collection of the debt. The court, after discussing at length the proposition that Johnson was estopped to deny the legality of the corporate existence of the Mason Lodge, took up the question of the nonenforceability of the contract because the corporation had failed to comply with § 571 of the statute, and disposed of it in a few words adversely to the contention of Johnson. The opinion makes it perfectly apparent that the entire reasoning of the court was devoted to consideration of § 566 of the statutes, providing that "no corporation organized under this chapter shall be permitted to set up or rely upon the want of legal organization as a defense to any action against it; nor shall any person transacting business with such corporation, or sued for injury done to its property, be permitted to rely upon such want of legal organization as a defense;" and that little or no attention was given to the effect on the contract of § 571. But, nevertheless, it is fair to say that the court held in this opinion that the failure of this corporation to comply with § 571 did not defeat its right to enforce the collection of the contract sued on. In the Ashford Case all that was said on the point under consideration is this: "In Johnson v. Mason Lodge it was held that one who is sued upon a contract made with a corporation is estopped from relying upon the failure of the corporation to comply with the provisions of § 571. As this question was very thoroughly considered in that case, and has been followed in quite a number of subsequent decisions of this court, it is unnecessary for us to again consider the question." In the Mead Case the only reference to this question is this: "The objection that appellants did not comply with § 571 of the Kentucky Statutes is fully answered in the opinion of the court in the case of Johnson v. Mason Lodge, and it will therefore be unnecessary for us to again consider that question."

It will thus be seen that while in three opinions it was held that § 571 of the statute did not obstruct the right of a delinquent corporation to enforce a contract made with it, in no one of these opinions was the question examined with any degree of care. In the Johnson Case we think the court fell into the error of confusing an ultra vires contract with an unlawful contract, and treating § 571 as a companion section to § 566, and this error seems to have been followed in the two subsequent cases. It is, of course, plain that § 566 and § 571 relate to entirely distinct subjects. They have not the remotest connection with each other except in so far as they relate in a general way to corporations. They were enacted for different reasons and to accomplish different purposes. Section 566 relates to defects in the organization of a corporation, and so states, while § 571 relates exclusively to the matter of a corporation doing business in this state without having an agent and a place of business in this state. Fruin-Colnon Contracting Co. v. Chatterson, 146 Ky. 504, 40 L.R.A. (N.S.) 857, 143 S. W. 6. As said in the Johnson Case, it has been repeatedly decided, both by this court and others, that a person dealing with a corporation will not be permitted to raise the question that it was not legally organized, and § 566 merely put into the form of a statute a rule that a long line of court decisions had made a part of the law of the state.

On the other hand, the subject-matter of § 571 first made its appearance in the history of the state in 1893, when it was adopted as a part of the statute law of the state, and it was put into the statute in obedience to § 194 of the Constitution, providing that "all corporations formed under the laws of this state, or carrying on business in this state, shall, at all times, have one or more known places of business in this state, and an authorized agent or agents there, upon whom process may be executed, and the general assembly shall enact laws to carry into effect the provisions of this section."

Under these circumstances the question now before us, put in simple form is, Shall § 571 of the statute, enacted pursuant to § 194 of the Constitution of the state, stand or shall the decision of this court in Johnson v. Mason Lodge stand? The decision and the statute are in conflict, and if the doctrine of stare decisis as sought to be applied is to control, the decision must prevail and a valuable part of the statute be in effect expunged.

We are not unmindful of the importance of courts of last resort adhering to rules of law announced in long-established decisions that have become a part of the jurisprudence of the state, and on the faith of which people have transacted business, entered into contracts, and conducted in a general way their affairs, and we should be slow to overrule any opinion that might unsettle property rights acquired on the faith of the opinion overruled, or that might prejudice the rights or interests of persons who had entered into engagements in reliance upon the fact that the opinion assailed was the law of the land.

As said in Kent's Commentaries, vol. 1, *476: "When a rule has been once deliberately adopted and declared, it ought not to be disturbed unless by a court of appeal or review, and never by the same court, except for very cogent reasons, and upon a clear manifestation of error; and if the practice were otherwise, it would be leaving us in a state of perplexing uncertainty as to the law." To the same effect are Farrior v. New England Mortg. Secur. Co. 92 Ala. 176, 12 L.R.A. 856, 9 So. 532; Haskett v. Maxey, 134 Ind. 182, 19 L.R.A. 379, 33 N. E. 358; Vermont & C. R. Co. v. Vermont C. R. Co. 63 Vt. 23, 10 L.R.A. 562, 3 Inters. Com. Rep. 488, 21 Atl. 262, 731, and many other cases referred to in these opinions.

But the rule of stare decisis, stated in simple form and considered in relation to its effect upon private affairs, is really 51 L.R.A. (N.S.)

nothing more than the application of the doctrine of estoppel to court decisions. It finds its support in the sound principle that when courts have announced, for the guidance and government of individuals and the public, certain controlling principles of law, or have given a construction to statutes upon which individuals and the public have relied in making contracts, they ought not to, after these principles have been promulgated and after these constructions have been published, withdraw or overrule them, thereby disturbing contract rights that had been entered into and property rights that had been acquired upon the faith and credit that the principle announced or the construction adopted in the opinion was the law of the land. In the correct application of the rule of stare decisis we fully concur, and do not propose in this opinion to announce any views that would impair or overthrow its efficiency when properly understood and applied. Later in the opinion we will again advert to the necessity for an adherence to the rule of stare decisis, when properly invoked, to protect contract or property rights.

It, however, seems to us apparent that the doctrine of stare decisis, giving to it what may be called a personal application, cannot be relied on by a party who has not, in good faith, been deceived by the decision under which he claims to have acted; and, when it appears that a party was not misled to his prejudice by reliance on a decision that the court rendering it subsequently concluded was erroneous, the court will not feel estopped to overrule it by the insistence of the party claiming to have acted under it that it would overturn contracts and engagements that he had entered into on the faith of it.

Let us see now for a moment if the Oliver Company is in a position to assert that, relying on Johnson v. Mason Lodge, it did not observe this statute. It will be observed that the statute not only subjects the offending corporation to the civil disability of denying it the right to maintain an action, but it also subjects it to a fine under the criminal law of the state; and, if it should be said that the civil disability was removed by construction in Johnson v. Mason Lodge, the penal features of the statute remained undisturbed, and furnished full notice to the corporation that it must comply with the statute or subject itself to the penalty imposed. Under these circumstances it does not lie in the mouth of the Oliver Company to say that, acting on the faith and credit of the Johnson Case, it did not know it was necessary that it should observe this statute. In entering into this contract the Oliver Company was undeniably guilty of violating a law of this state that has been enforced in many cases, and it is not in a position to set up that this court ought not now to overrule the Johnson Case.

We have examined a large number of cases on the subject of stare decisis, and in no one of them can there be found an attempted application of it to a state of facts such as are here presented. In every instance, so far as our investigation goes, where the doctrine has been applied, the decisions relied on furnished in themselves a line of authority that left no notice that anything else was required.

But aside from this, the doctrine of stare decisis is not without its limitations. A court of last resort is not irrevocably bound to follow opinions that, in the light of present circumstances and conditions, seem to be erroneous, and this case furnishes a good illustration of the necessity for a departure from the rule. Here we have a statute of the state, enacted pursuant to the Constitution, for the purpose of carrying out a wise public policy, an important feature of which was eliminated by the decision in Johnson v. Mason Lodge, and upon mature consideration we do not feel bound to follow this decision. In overruling it we are not without ample precedents furnished, not only by the decisions of other courts, but of this court. This court in the course of its history has deemed it wise and proper to overrule many cases, numbers of them relating to property rights, as may be seen by an examination of volumes 2 and 4 of Barbour's Digest, under the head of "Overruled Cases." A few of them may be mentioned:

In Montgomery County Fiscal Ct. v. Trimble, 104 Ky. 629, 42 L.R.A. 738, 47 S. W. 773, in overruling several previous cases, we said: "When a question involving important public or private rights, extending through all coming time, has been passed upon on a single occasion, and such decision can in no just sense be said to have been acquiesced in, it is not only the right, but the duty, of the court, when properly called upon, to re-examine the questions involved, and again subject them to judicial scrutiny. We are by no means unmindful of the salutary tendency of the rule of stare decisis; but at the same time we cannot be unmindful of the lessons furnished by our own consciousness, as well as by judicial history, of the liability to error and the advantages of review."

In Hall v. Martin, 89 Ky. 9, 11 S. W. 953, and Breathitt Coal, Iron, & Lumber Co. v. Strong, 106 Ky. 699, 51 S. W. 189, the case of Hamilton v. Fugett, 81 Ky. 51 L.R.A.(N.S.)

366, was in effect overruled, although the overruling opinions unsettled extensive property rights acquired on the faith of the Fugett opinion. True it was not expressly overruled, but it was effectually disposed of by being explained away in the cases mentioned, a process of elimination sometimes adopted to remove undesirable opinions.

Another case affecting property rights was Sheets v. Grubbs, 4 Met. (Ky.) 339, decided in 1863; but this case, after standing for many years and being followed in several cases, was overruled in Chenault v. Chenault, 88 Ky. 83, 11 S. W. 424. Yet another example is found in the bank tax cases reported in 102 Ky. 174, 44 L.R.A. 825, 39 S. W. 1030.

In Victor Cotton Oil Co. v. Louisville, 149 Ky. 149, 148 S. W. 10, the case of Mengel Box Co. v. Louisville, 117 Ky. 735, 79 S. W. 255, was overruled, although, on the faith of the exemption from taxation it afforded, the Victor Cotton Oil Company was, as it claimed, induced to establish its plant in the city of Louisville. Having thus been induced to act on the authority of the Mengel Case, the Cotton Oil Company insisted that its right to the exemption ought not to be defeated, but Chief Justice Hobson, speaking for the court, said: "It is insisted, however, that the facts here shown bring the case directly within the doctrine laid down in Mengel Box Co. v. Louisville, 117 Ky. 735, 79 S. W. 255. This seems to be true, but that case is out of line with the subsequent cases, and with what seems to us the proper construction of the Constitution and the statute." To the same effect is Pratt v. Breckinridge, 112 Ky. 1, 65 S. W. 136, 66 S. W. 405.

In 26 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 183, we find this sensible statement of the limitations upon the rule of stare decisis: "This doctrine is not an arbitrary rule of positive law which forbids the questioning, under any circumstances, of all decisions, or the exercise of judicial discretion in relation thereto, but is subject to reasonable limitations. . . . No prior decision is to be reversed without good and sufficient cause, yet the rule is not in any sense ironclad, and the future and permanent good of the public is to be considered rather than any particular case or interest. Even if the decision affects real estate interests and titles, there may be cases where it is plainly the duty of the court to interfere and overrule a bad decision. Precedent should not have an overwhelming or despotic influence in shaping legal decisions. . . . The benefit to the public in the future is of greater moment than any incorrect decision in the past. Wherever a correction can be made without working more harm than good, it should be done. . . . Where vital and important public or private rights are concerned, and the decisions regarding them are to have a direct and permanent influence in all future time, it becomes the duty, as well as the right, of the court to consider them carefully, and to allow no previous error to continue if it can be corrected. The foundation of the rule of stare decisis was promulgated on the ground of public policy, and it would be an egregious mistake to allow more harm than good to accrue from it."

It is further insisted by counsel for the Oliver Company that this court, in construing § 571 in Johnson v. Mason Lodge, declared that a failure to comply with this statute did not affect the validity of a contract made by the delinquent corporation, or prohibit it from enforcing the contract, and that, as the contract between the Oliver Company and the Louisville Realty Association was entered into subsequent to this opinion, and while it was standing unaffected as the law of the land, this court is not now at liberty, without impairing the obligations of a contract, to overrule the Johnson Case so as to affect the validity of the contract here in question.

In support of this position our attention is called to Gelpcke v. Dubuque, 1 Wall. 175, 17 L. ed. 520. In that case the court said: "The sound and true rule is that if the contract, when made, was valid by the laws of the state, as then expounded by all departments of the government and administered in its courts of justice, its validity and obligation cannot be impaired by any subsequent action of legislation or decision of its courts, altering the construction of the law."

And to Douglass v. Pike County, 101 U. S. 677, 25 L. ed. 968, where the court said: "As a rule we treat the construction which the highest court of a state has given a statute of the state as part of the statute, and govern ourselves accordingly. . . . The true rule is to give a change of judicial construction in respect to a statute the same effect in its operation on contracts and existing contract rights that would be given to a legislative amendment; that is to say, make it prospective, but not retroactive. After a statute has been settled by judicial construction, the construction becomes, so far as contract rights acquired under it are concerned, as much a part of the statute as the text itself, and a change of decision is, to all intents and purposes, the same in its effect on contracts as an amendment of the law by means of a legislative enactment." To the same effect 51 L.R.A.(N.S.)

fect is Havemeyer v. Iowa County, 3 Wall. 294, 18 L. ed. 38; Pine Grove Twp. v. Talcott, 19 Wall. 666, 22 L. ed. 227.

We entirely concur in the right and justice of the rule announced in these cases, and fully agree to its soundness when properly applied, but we think it should have no application to the facts of this case. In the cases mentioned, and the others we have examined, it was used to protect innocent and law-observing parties who in good faith had made investments in securities upon the faith and credit of opinions of courts of last resort. The parties invoking the protection of the rule did not, in making the contracts sought to be declared void by subsequent decisions, violate any law of the state. They appeared before the court with clean hands, asking relief from decisions the effect of which was to deprive them of property in which they had been invited to invest, not only by the laws of the state, but by the opinions of its highest court in construing them. Here the situation is quite different. The Oliver Company comes before the court a confessed violator of the laws of the state. It is asking relief from a condition resulting from its deliberate and wilful violation of a penal statute. It is not in a position to ask the protection of beneficial rules of law intended to save from loss law-observing citizens. We put our decision, that the Oliver Company, is not entitled to the protection afforded by the principle announced in these cases and invoked in its behalf, upon the ground that it brought upon itself all the trouble it seeks to escape by making the contract now in question, in violation of an express penal statute of the state that was in full force and effect at the time the contract was made, and that it was fully advised of, if its other pleas heretofore noticed are true, and that it was obliged to take notice of, whether it had actual notice or not.

For the reasons stated the opinion in Johnson v. Mason Lodge and the others that follow it are overruled, and the judgment appealed from is affirmed, whole court sitting.

Hobson, Ch. J., and Nunn, J., dissenting:

Hobson, Ch. J., dissenting:

Two questions arise in this case: (1) Did the court err in its conclusion as to the construction of § 566, Ky. Stat. in Johnson v. Mason Lodge, 106 Ky. 838, 51 S. W. 620; Aultman & T. Co. v. Mead, 109 Ky. 583, 60 S. W. 294, and Hallam v. Ashford, 24 Ky. L. Rep. 870, 70 S. W. 197? (2) Can the court now, under its own rulings, properly depart from the construction of the statute it then adopted, the legislature having acquiesced in that construction?

1. In Johnson v. Mason Lodge, the corporation had not complied with § 571, Ky. Stat. Johnson had borrowed the money from it, and when sued for the money relied on the violation of § 571 by the corporation in bar of a recovery. The circuit court sustained a demurrer to his answer, which was practically the same as the answer in this case. In the opinion delivered by this court, after stating the facts, the court quotes § 194 of the Constitution and §§ 571 and 566, Ky. Stat. It then proceeds, in a lengthy opinion, to show that under § 566 a person, by executing a note to a corporation, "is estopped to deny its existence or authority to do business at that time." The other two cases follow and reaffirm this decision; and in the list of cases it is stated that the question has been repeatedly before the court, and had been decided the same way, though it would seem that it was not noticed in the opinions, being deemed settled by the previous adjudications. These cases being based upon § 566, Ky. Stat. in no manner conflict with Lindsey v. Rutherford, 17 B. Mon. 245; Franklin Ins. Co. v. Louisville & A. Packet Co. 9 Bush, 590; Vanmeter v. Spurrier, 94 Ky. 22, 21 S. W. 337; or Smith v. Robertson, 106 Ky. 472, 45 L.R.A. 510, 50 S. W. 852, or other like cases, for the reason that the statute under which those cases were decided contained no such provision as is set out in § 566. The opinion proceeds on the ground that the equitable doctrine of estoppel does not apply. This may be conceded, but the question turns on § 566, and not on equitable estoppel. So the question recurs, Was the court right in the construction it then gave § 566? That section and § 571 are parts of the same act, the work of the same legislature, and the two must, of course, be read together.

Section 566 is as follows: "No corporation organized under this chapter shall be permitted to set up or rely upon the want of legal organization as a defense to any action against it; nor shall any person transacting business with such corporation, or sued for injury done to its property, be permitted to rely upon such want of legal organization as a defense." It is now insisted that the words "want of legal organization" refer only to the filing of the articles of incorporation, the election of officers, and the like. Is this the natural meaning of the words in the connection in which they are used in this section? In Words and Phrases, vol. 6, defining the 61 L.R.A. (N.S.) words "organize" and "organization" in reference to corporations, it is said: "'Organize' or 'organization,' as used in reference to corporations, has a well-understood meaning, which is the election of officers, providing for the subscription and payment of the capital stock, the adoption of by-laws, and such other steps as are necessary to endow the legal entity with the capacity to transact the legitimate business for which it was created." It will be observed that this is precisely the definition of the terms which this court adopted in the cases referred to; and, if we insert this definition in § 566, it will read as follows: "No corporation organized under this chapter shall be permitted to set up or rely upon its want of capacity to transact the legitimate business for which it was created, as a defense to any action against it, nor shall any person transacting business with such corporation, or sued for injury done to its property, be permitted to rely upon such want of capacity to transact the legitimate business for which it was created."

In Black's Law Dictionary, the word "organization" is not given, but among the definitions of "organize" are these: "To put into working order; to arrange in order for the normal exercise of its appropriate functions." A corporation is not put into working order until it has capacity to do business. It is not arranged in order for the normal exercise of its appropriate functions until it is lawful for it to make contracts. It is true that appellant is a foreign corporation, but as such it had no legal existence outside of the state creating it. The exercise of any power in another state depends upon the will of that sovereignty. Lathrop v. Commercial Bank, 8 Dana, 114, 33 Am. Dec. 481. By § 202 of our Constitution foreign corporations coming into this state must do business on conditions not more favorable than are prescribed by law to similar corporations organized under the laws of the commonwealth. So, when foreign corporations come into the state, they must comply with our laws, and have no right to do business or legal existence here except by virtue of our laws. When they do this, as has been frequently held, they stand on the same plane as similar corporations created under the laws of the state. If, as is uniformly held, appellant had no legal existence as a corporation in this state until it complied with our laws giving it a right to do business here, how can it be maintained, under any meaning of the word "organization," that it is not within the provisions of § 566?

Under § 571 it was not "lawful for any corporation to carry on any business in this state" until it complied with that section; and therefore no corporation had capacity to do business in this state until it complied therewith. The defense here made is simply that the corporation had not capacity to do business because it had not complied with § 571; and this defense under § 566, a person transacting business with the corporation cannot make.

Section 460, Ky. Stat. which is the work of the same legislature regulating the construction of statutes, provides as follows: "All words and phrases shall be construed and understood according to the common and approved usage of language; but technical words and phrases, and such others as may have acquired a peculiar and appropriate meaning in the law, shall be construed and understood according to such meaning." The word "organization" having acquired a peculiar and appropriate meaning in the law, the court in the cases referred to properly gave it that meaning.

But, looking beyond the letter of the statute to its purpose and intent, what reason could the legislature have had for making § 566 apply only to irregularities in the steps taken prior to the filing of the papers in the office of the secretary of state, as required by § 571, and not including this step also? By § 460, Ky. Stat. it is also provided as to this revision that its "provisions are to be liberally construed with a view to promote its objects."

In Bailey v. Com. 11 Bush, 691, this court said that "every statute ought to be expounded, not according to the letter, but according to the meaning." In Sams v. Sams, 85 Ky. 400, 3 S. W. 593, it is said that "the reason for the enactment must enter into its interpretation, so as to determine what was intended to be accomplished by it."

Can anyone believe that a body of practical men intended by § 566 to protect a corporation that had not the necessary number of incorporators or the necessary stock subscription, or that had not paid its organization tax, and did not intend it to protect a corporation that was not qualified to do business because it had not filed a certain paper in the office of the secretary of state? Section 571 applies alike to domestic as well as foreign corporations, and § 566 must also apply to all alike. Much of the business of the state is now done by corporations. Mistakes are sometimes made by the most careful men; papers sent by mail sometimes do not reach the secretary of state, and sometimes one officer is under the impression that another has performed this duty or that required by the statute. So § 566 was inserted for 51 L.R.A.(N.S.)

the protection of the capital invested in these enterprises. It only validates the contract as between the parties to it. When we construe the statute liberally with a view to promote its objects, how can it be thought that § 566 only refers to defects in the articles of incorporation and the like? What was its purpose? Manifestly to prevent injustice, and to prevent those who had done business with the corporation for taking advantage of the corporation's want of capacity to do business. The words employed in § 566 show the legislature had this in mind. In the first place it provides that the corporation shall not make this defense. If we turn this case around, and the owner of the house was here suing the contractor for not building the house properly, would there be any doubt that under § 566 the corporation could not make this defense, although both parties made the contract knowing the facts? And if the first part of the section would cut off the corporation from making that defense, upon what principle can it be maintained that the last clause of the sentence is narrower in its application than the first clause? Not only so, but the second clause deals with the person who has transacted business with the corporation, and in that clause manifestly the legislature has in mind business done by the corporation, and provides that this defense shall not be allowed in favor of the men who have done business with the corporation. There may be cases in which the word "organize" is given a narrower meaning, where only the life of the corporation is in issue; but this section is dealing with the transaction of business by the corporation, and manifestly uses the words "legal organization" in the sense of capacity to do business. The court entirely overlooks, in § 566, the words "or sued for injury done to its property." Can anybody believe that the legislature intended this protection to the property of a corporation only in cases where there was some defect in the steps taken to form the corporation? Is there any reason why the property of such a corporation should be protected from wanton injury that would not apply to a corporation that had not complied with § 571? Would anybody hold that a trespass committed upon the property of a corporation before it had complied with § 571 would be without redress when it complied with the section before bringing suit? Does anybody believe that the legislature intended that the defendant here could, with impunity, have appropriated to its own use the property of the plaintiff because it had not complied with § 571? The plain purpose of § 566 was not to leave corporations without remedy in the two classes of cases indicated, although they had failed to comply with some provision of the statute, and could not lawfully do business as a corporation.

The Kentucky cases above referred to are cited in Thompson on Corporations, vol. 5, § 6710, where he says: "Not a few courts have applied the general doctrine of estoppel to persons dealing with foreign corporations. And the rule established by these courts is that a person who has contracted with a foreign corporation that has not complied with the statute authorizing it to transact business in the state will be estopped, in any action by it on such contract, from setting up the fact that it had not complied with the statute."

In 19 Cyc. 1297, after showing that in some states where they had no such statute as § 566 the contracts of the corporation have been held not enforceable, it is said: "In some states the courts have held, contrary to the doctrine hereinbefore stated, that where a person enters into a contract with a foreign corporation, and receives the benefit of such contract, he is estopped to set up the fact that the corporation had not complied with a statute of the state, imposing conditions upon its right to do business therein, for the purpose of avoiding liability on the contract." In support of this statement, decisions are cited from Arkansas, Colorado, Idaho, Iowa, Massachusetts, Missouri, Montana, New Hampshire, Ohio, Rhode Island, Washington, West Virginia, Kentucky, North Dakota, South Dakota, and in the annotations for 1914 a number of other cases to the same effect are cited.

Section 194 of the Constitution requires all corporations carrying on business in this state to have one or more known places of business in this state, and an authorized agent upon whom process may be executed. But this has no application to the case at bar, for a violation of this section is not shown. The general assembly, to carry into effect the constitutional provision, enacted §§ 566 and 571. What regulations should be made was a legislative question.

It is said that the construction of the statute adopted by the court makes it vain and elusive. Other penal statutes are not vain and elusive because the penalties affixed for their violation are the means relied on for their enforcement. If experience has shown that the statute as construed by the court is vain or elusive, it must be presumed that the legislature, coming biennially from the people, would have afforded a remedy. When they have not done this and no officer of the state has complained, by what authority is it said that the statute is vain and elusive? The general assembly met in the year 1900, a few months after the decision in the Johnson Case was rendered, and when the matter was fresh in everybody's mind. It not only took no action, but the subsequent general assemblies, meeting biennially, have acquiesced likewise in the court's construction of the statute. The dockets of this court show that the statute is not vain and elusive; for the officers of the state have not been remiss in prosecutions under the statute to obtain the fines it provides for. It is a highly penal statute. Not only the corporation may be fined, but every officer or agent doing any business, and the corporation can enforce no civil right by action except as provided by § 566. The Chatterson Case, 146 Ky. 504, 40 L.R.A.(N.S.) 857, 143 S. W. 6, where a contractor who had built a street was refused relief, illustrates the fact that the statute is not vain and elusive. Must it not strike any justice-loving man as a travesty on justice that a person may borrow of a corporation $20,000, and, when asked to pay it, snap his fingers in the creditor's face, and say, "I will keep your money, because you did not file a statement in the office of the secretary of state, as required by law, before you lent me the money, and took my note for it?" Must it not strike any justice-loving man as a travesty on justice when the owner of property, who, as here, is sued by the contractor for $20,000 for building him a house, says, "I have the house and you can do without your money because you have not complied with § 571, Ky. Stat.?" Is it any wonder that the representatives of a justice-loving constituency like the people of Kentucky put such a section as 566 in the statutes to prevent such injustice as this? And is it any wonder that when the statute they made was thus construed by the court, the representatives of such a people acquiesced in the construction of the court and made no effort to change the statute? A change of the statute by the legislature and a change of its construction by the court are very different things. When changed by the legislature the change operates only on the future, and the people have notice of it; a change by the court, as in this case, operates on the past, and destroys rights contracted innocently upon the faith of the decisions of the court.

It is true that in some states, where the statute expressly provided that contracts made in violation of it should be void, and in others, where the contract was simply declared unlawful, the courts have enforced the statute while acknowledging its hardship, saying that it was a legislative question. Such is the rule in Pennsylvania, Alabama, Tennessee, Wisconsin, Michigan, Minnesota, and Oregon. But in no case has this been done where the court did not recognize that justice had been defeated. In view of these things, how can it be maintained that the construction which is now given § 566 construes the statute liberally with a view to promote its purposes?

2. The second question comes to this: Is the construction of a statute settled by a line of decisions of this court, or is it never settled until settled right in the eyes of those who are judges of this court when the case reaches here? Does the obligation of contracts depend upon the law as officially promulgated at the time the contract was made, and may it be impaired by a subsequent change in those laws by judicial construction?

The purpose of establishing this court is primarily that justice may be administered, and that the laws of the state may have a uniform operation. To this end the opinions of this court are published as the authoritative exposition of the laws. When the court has construed a statute, and that construction has been adhered to in a line of cases, it has been the settled policy of the court not to depart from it. In South v. Thomas, 7 T. B. Mon. 62, where the court was urged to overrule previous decisions construing a statute, it said: "It has been often said that it is not so important that the law should be rightly settled as that it should remain stable after it is settled. This is true, for attempts to change the course of judicial decision, under the pretext of correcting error, are like experiments by the quack on the human body."

In Tribble v. Taul, 7 T. B. Mon. 455, where members of the court differed in opinion as to the correctness of the previous decisions construing a statute, the court said: "If we were convinced that on this point the law was settled wrong originally, we should not feel ourselves at liberty to depart from it; aware that it is of greater importance to society that the rule should be uniform and stable than that it should be the best possible rule that could be adopted. In the supreme court of a state, as this is, possessing, with but few exceptions, appellate judicial power coextensive with the state, the influence which its decisions must have is evident. Its mandates are conclusive, and even its dicta are attended to in all the inferior courts. No sooner is a decision published than it operates as a pattern and standard in all other tribunals, and as a matter of course, all other decisions conform to it. 51 L.R.A. (N.S.)

If in this court a settled course of adjudication is overturned, then the trouble and confusion of reversing former causes succeeds in the inferior tribunals; and even the credit and respect due to this court is shaken by the phenomenon that A has lost his cause on the same ground that B gains his. And not only do these consequences follow, but some still more serious may ensue. For perhaps no court may strike the vitals of society with a deeper wound than a capricious departure in this court from one of its established adjudications."

In Maddox v. Graham, 2 Met. (Ky.) 56, where a like question was passed upon, the court said: "If this court were now to overrule its former decision, it would be an inconsistency as gross in form and manifestation as unjust in its consequences."

In McChesney v. Hager, 31 Ky. L. Rep. 1041, 104 S. W. 715, the court, after pointing out that if the question was a new one, it would give the statute a different interpretation, said: "But we do not feel disposed to overrule the opinion of this court in the case supra. Since that case was handed down, there have been four regular sessions of the legislature, and if the construction given to these statutes was not the one intended by the legislative department, it is fair to assume that the statute would have been so amended as to make effective the purpose of the legislature in the enactment of these laws, and give to the secretary of state the additional salary now insisted upon." Further on in the opinion the court said that "in construing the statutes interpreted, they must be read in connection with the opinion of the court; and in fact, the opinion becomes, in effect, a part of the statute, binding upon all persons asserting rights under it, or whose interests are affected by it."

These rules are of universal application. In Inland Revenue Comrs. v. Harrison, 7 H. L. 9, Lord Cairns said: "I think that, with regard to statutes . . . it is desirable, not so much that the principle of the decision should be capable at all times of justification, as that the law should be settled, and should, when once settled, be maintained without any danger of vacillation or uncertainty."

In Sutherland on Statutory Construction, vol. 2, § 485, it is said: "A judicial construction of a statute becomes a part of it, and as to rights which accrue afterwards it should be adhered to for the protection of those rights. To devest them by a change of the construction is to legislate retroactively."

It is now nearly fifteen years since the decision of this court in the Johnson Case was rendered. In the meantime, and while that decision was acquiesced in by all three departments of the state government, a large part of the business of the state has been done by corporations. Thousands of dollars have been lent or invested in the building of railroads or other structures upon the faith of these decisions, under contracts which were valid under the law as then expounded, and which are now declared invalid under a different construction of the statute.

The Chatterson Case is rested on the ground that there was no estoppel; the defendant there not being a party to the contract. The point decided is not inconsistent with the prior cases. While the court has often overruled a single case, especially where it was inconsistent with subsequent decisions, it has never overruled two reported cases on the construction of a statute after they "had been followed in quite a number of subsequent decisions." None of the cases cited go as far as the decision now made, and none of them in the slightest degree sustain the action of the court in this case.

It is submitted that nothing so unwarranted has ever been done by this court before as to overrule repeated decisions construing a penal statute and adding greatly to its penalties, when those decisions have been acquiesced in by the legislature. It is to the interests of all that the law should be settled. The uncertainty of the law has passed into a proverb, but how infinitely more uncertain it must be when reliance cannot be placed upon the decisions of the highest court in the state. Our docket is now overburdened with cases in which this or that precedent is sought to be overruled; and certainly it is a sound principle that the law as settled shall remain settled.

Manifestly, if the legislature, after the decision of the cases referred to, had amended § 571 and provided, as in a number of other states, that contracts made in violation of it should be void, this act could not have the effect to invalidate contracts made before it was passed, and which were valid under the statute as it then stood. Can a court of justice consistently, if it has the power, by a retroactive decision, invalidate contracts which were valid under the law as it stood when they were made? Aside from the Federal question, it is submitted that no court, in administering justice, can consistently do such injustice.

In 20 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 179, it is said: "But after a statute has been settled by judicial construction, the construction becomes, as far as contract rights acquired under it are concerned, as much a part of the statute as the text itself; and a change of decision is, to all intents and purposes, the same in its effect on contracts as an amendment of the law by means of a legislative enactment; and contract obligations entered into or vested rights acquired while the former decision was in force cannot be impaired."

A number of decisions of the United States Supreme Court and the state courts are cited in support of the text, and a number of other cases are given in the brief for appellant. It is said that these cases have no application for the reason that it was unlawful for the corporation to do business, and that it cannot avail itself of the constitutional provision in an illegal act. But it will be observed that a number of cases cited were just such cases as this. If the contract was valid under the law in existence as it stood when it was made, and is invalid under the law as it is now declared, has not the obligation of the contract been impaired? In Ohio Life Ins. & T. Co. v. Debolt, 16 How. 416, 14 L. ed. 997, the United States Supreme Court said: "The sound and true rule is that, if the contract when made was valid by the laws of the state, as then expounded by all the departments of its government, and administered in its courts of justice, its validity and obligation cannot be impaired by any subsequent act of the legislature of the state, or decision of its courts, altering the construction of the law."

The argument that the obligation of the contract may be impaired by a change in the court's ruling because the transaction was unlawful assumes the point in issue. To illustrate: The court by its former decisions read § 566 into § 571, so that that section, when read with § 566, meant that contracts made in violation of it might be enforced against the party doing business with the corporation. If these words had been inserted by the legislature in § 571, and a subsequent act had stricken them out, would it be contended that the effect of the subsequent act was to invalidate contracts already made? And if the legislature could not do this, how comes it that the court has any greater power when the limitation of the Federal Constitution is that the state shall not impair the obligation of a contract? Certainly it must be admitted that a contract that was valid under the law as it stood when it was made, according to the construction then given it by this court, is now held invalid. If this is not to impair the obligation of a contract, what is it?

For these reasons I dissent from the opinion of the court.

Nunn, J., concurs in this dissent on the second question.

KENTUCKY SUPREME COURT.

CINCINNATI, NEW ORLEANS, & TEXAS PACIFIC RAILWAY COMPANY, Appt.,
v.

G. W. STEPHENS, Admr., etc., of C. B.
Wilson, Deceased.

(157 Ky. 460, 163 S. W. 493.)

Parent and child — status of child begotten after divorce of parents.

A child begotten after the divorce of its parents is not kin to children of its father and his second wife within the meaning of the Federal employers' liability act, and therefore such children cannot recover under that statute for the wrongful death of such child, although he contributed toward their support.

(February 17, 1914.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Whitley County in plaintiff's favor in an action under the Federal employers' liability act to recover damages for the death of plaintiff's intestate, alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Note. — Status of child begotten after divorce between parents.

Research has disclosed no case other than CINCINNATI, N. O. & T. P. R. Co. v. STEPHENS, passing upon the status of a child begotten after an absolute divorce between its parents. In several cases the courts have passed upon the status of a child begotten after the granting of a mere judicial separation, which did not absolutely annul the marriage relation. But the question therein is, of course, different from that involved in the above case.

For instance, in Re Parishes of St. George & St. Margaret, 1 Salk. 123, the rule was laid down that children begotten after a divorce a mensa et thoro are presumptively bastards; for it was said the court would "intend a due obedience to the sentence unless the contrary be showed." But it was said that if the husband and wife without sentence parted and lived separate, the children were presumptively legitimate. And the same rule was apparently approved in Sidney v. Sidney, 3 P. Wms. 269. 51 L.R.A.(N.S.)

Messrs. Edward Colston, John Galvin, and Tye & Siler, for appellant:

The decedent, Wilson, being a bastard, had no next of kin at common law.

Stover v. Boswell, 3 Dana, 233; 1 Bl. Com. 459; 5 Cyc. 639.

The recovery authorized under the Federal employers' liability act is for the benefit of certain persons designated therein, and if no beneficiary is left belonging to either of the three classes, then there can be no recovery.

Illinois C. R. Co. v. Doherty, 153 Ky. 369, 47 L.R.A.(N.S.) 31, 155 S. W. 1119; Michigan C. R. Co. v. Vreeland, 227 U. S. 59, 57 L. ed. 417, 33 Sup. Ct. Rep. 192; American R. Co. v. Didricksen, 227 U. S. 145, 57 L. ed. 458, 33 Sup. Ct. Rep. 224; Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. McGinnis, 228 U. S. 173, 57 L. ed. 785, 33 Sup. Ct. Rep. 426, 3 N. C. C. A. 806.

The Federal employers' liability act is exclusive of, and not supplementary to, the laws of the states covering the same field.

And in Hetherington v. Hetherington, L. R. 12 Prob. Div. 112, 56 L. J. Prob. N. S. 78, 57 L. T. N. S. 533, 36 Week. Rep. 12, 51 J. P. 119, 294, where a judicial order was made authorizing the wife to refuse to cohabit with the husband, directing the husband to pay her a stated sum weekly, and giving the wife the custody of the children, it was said that the order was equivalent to a judicial separation and the ancient divorce a mensa et thoro, and that if a child was born more than nine months after the separation, it was presumed to be illegitimate, unless it was shown by evidence to be otherwise.

As to right to recover for negligent killing of illegitimate, or to maintain an action for the benefit of illegitimate, for negligent killing of relative, see note to McDonald v. Southern R. Co. 2 L.R.A.(N.S.) 640.

by the appellant company, and at the time of his death the company was engaged in interstate commerce, and he was employed by it in such commerce, and his death resulted from its negligence. In a suit brought by his administrator under the Federal employers' liability act to recover damages for his death, there was a trial and verdict and judgment against the company, and it appeals, asking a reversal upon the ground that Wilson did not leave any kin, or, if he did, they were not dependent upon him.

The record shows, without contradiction, that Wilson was begotten and born out of lawful wedlock; that his parents did not, after his birth, marry; that he was an unmarried man, and that both of his parents are dead. It further appears that his parents, many years before his birth, had been married, and, as a result of this marriage, several children were born, two of them being alive at the time of Wilson's death, and married women, living with their respective husbands; and that two other of these children died, leaving children who were infants at the time of Wilson's death; that before the birth of Wilson his parents were divorced from the bonds of matrimony, and, after living apart several years, had illicit relations with each other, as a result of which Wilson was begotten and born.

We do not find it necessary in disposing of this case to consider at all the question whether the children of Wilson's mother begotten and born in lawful wedlock while she was the lawful wife of his father are kin to Wilson, within the meaning of the Federal employers' liability act, because there is no evidence whatever that he at any time contributed to the support and maintenance of these children, or the children left by the children of this marriage who died, or that any of these persons were dependent upon him. The nearest approach to persons dependent upon him arises out of his contribution to the support and maintenance of the widow and infant children of his father, but, of course, neither the widow nor these children were of kin to him, and, this being so, his contribution to their support did not have the effect of bringing the case within the scope of the Federal statute that controls it. This act provides that, when any person is employed in interstate commerce by a carrier engaged in such commerce, and is killed by the negligence of the carrier while so engaged, a cause of action to recover damages for his death arises, and the carrier "shall be liable . . . to his or her personal representative for the benefit of the surviving widow or husband and children of such 51 L.R.A. (N.S.) employee; and, if none, then of such employee's parents; and, if none, then of the next of kin dependent upon such employee. . . ." [35 Stat. at L. 65, chap. 149, § 1, U. S. Comp. Stat. Supp. 1911, p. 1322.]

As this act limits a recovery in cases like this to the surviving kin of the deceased, and as Wilson left no kin, it would seem to inevitably follow that there could be no recovery in favor of his administrator. This we understand to be the ruling of the Supreme Court of the United States in cases like this. It was said by that court in American R. Co. v. Didricksen, 227 U. S. 145, 57 L. ed. 456, 33 Sup. Ct. Rep. 224, and in Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. McGinnis, 228 U. S. 173, 57 L. ed. 785, 33 Sup. Ct. Rep. 426, 3 N. C. C. A. 806, that "the cause of action which was created in behalf of the injured employee did not survive his death nor pass to his representatives. But the act, in case of the death of such an employee from his injury, creates a new and distinct right of action for the benefit of the dependent relatives named in the statute. The damages recoverable are limited to such loss as results to them because they have been deprived of a reasonable expectation of pecuniary benefits by the wrongful death of the injured employee. The damage is limited strictly to the financial loss thus sustained." And such was the ruling of this court in Illinois C. R. Co. v. Doherty, 153 Ky. 363, 47 L.R.A. (N.S.) 31, 155 S. W. 1119.

Wherefore the judgment is reversed, with direction to dismiss the petition.

(March 27, 1914.)

APPEAL by plaintiff from an order of the Circuit Court for Kenton County sustaining a demurrer to a complaint filed to recover damages for the death of plaintiff's intestate, alleged to have resulted from a fall on ice negligently left by defendants on the walk. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Charles M. F. Striger and Richard H. Gray for appellant.

chione v. Hunnewell, 50 L.R.A.(N.S.) 300.

The liability of municipality for injuries caused by the freezing of water accumulated on walks by reason of artificial conditions is the subject of a note to Holbert v. Philadelphia, 20 L.R.A.(N.S.) 201.

As to the liability of a municipal corporation for injuries from rough or uneven snow or ice accumulated from natural causes on a street or sidewalk not otherwise defective, see notes to Bull v. Spokane, 13 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1105, and Jackson v. Grand Forks, 45 L.R.A.(N.S.) 75.

As appears from the earlier notes, the prevailing rule is that when the abutting property owner creates a condition which artificially turns water across a sidewalk in such a way as to freeze and render the walk unsafe, he is liable for injury to pedestrians thereby caused.

Thus, one who so constructs or maintains a structure upon his own premises as to cause an artificial discharge or accumulation of water upon a public way, which by freezing makes the use of the way dangerous, will be held liable to one who, being rightfully upon the way and in the exercise of due care, is injured in consequence of such dangerous condition. Marston v. Phipps, 209 Mass. 552, 95 N. E. 954.

In Shipley v. Proctor, 177 Mass. 498, 59 N. E. 119, 9 Am. Neg. Rep. 304, overruling exceptions to a judgment in favor of plaintiff, it was held that the question whether the result of the arrangement of conductors on defendant's building in such a way that water from them formed ridges of ice upon the sidewalk was a public nuisance was a question of fact. A statute providing that no city or town shall be liable for any injury on a highway suffered by reason of snow or ice was held to have no application to an action against the owner.

An abutting owner was held liable in Adlington v. Viroqua, — Wis. —, 144 N. W. 1130, for injuries to a pedestrian because of the icy condition of the sidewalk as a result of water being artificially turned thereon through a conveyer pipe leading from a building. The court said that if one discharges water through a spout

Messrs. Jolin E. Shepard and Stephens L. Blakely, for appellees:

An abutting property owner is not liable for injuries sustained by one who slips on an icy sidewalk.

Jaegar v. Newport, 155 Ky. 110, 159 S. W. 671; Varney v. Covington, 155 Ky. 662, 160 S. W. 173; Webster v. Chesapeake & O. R. Co. 32 Ky. L. Rep. 404, 105 S. W. 945; Covington Saw Mill & Mfg. Co. v. directly onto a sidewalk, causing ice to form thereon so as to render the way defective, he is guilty of actionable negligence. The fact that the water was discharged from defendant's conveyer pipe a few feet from the edge of the sidewalk is of little consequence as long as the natural and probable result was that it would reach the sidewalk with substantially the same consequences as if discharged at or on the walk. "It is said that it was the duty of the city, not of the abutting owner, to clear out the culvert. If that be conceded, it would count for very little under the circumstances. The liability of the culvert to become useless was well known to appellants. The fact that it was useless at the time in question, and had been for a long time, was well known to them, as the jury found. Except for the artificial condition created by them, the walk was not defective even when the culvert was closed. Therefore, it may well be said they created the defect. They deposited water from their premises near the walk, knowing, as the jury found, that a nuisance would result rendering the walk unsuitable for public use. It is a familiar principle that if an abutting owner by his own fault renders a sidewalk defective, he is liable, regardless of the concurrent liability of the city. Such is the effect of the statute."

So, where water leaked from a spout onto the sidewalk, causing ice to form, whereby a pedestrian was injured by falling, the person owning and having control of the building was held liable in Davis v. Rich, 180 Mass. 235, 62 N. E. 375, where he knew or ought to have known that the spout was defective.

The rule is stated in Cavanagh v. Block, 192 Mass. 63, 6 L.R.A.(N.S.) 310, 116 Am. St. Rep. 220, 77 N. E. 1027, 20 Am. Neg. Rep. 379, that the owner of a house on a private way used by occupants of adjoining houses to gain access to the street is under obligation not to construct his gutters in such a manner that they will create a dangerous accumulation of ice in the way; that the owner of property who looks after the conductor pipe, and pays the bills for ler, 93 Ky. 23, 18 S. W. 835; Fugate v. Somerset, 97 Ky. 50, 29 S. W. 970.

Miller, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This action for damages for the death of Mary Stephens, alleged to have resulted from injuries sustained in a fall upon a sidewalk in the city of Covington, was filed against the city of Covington, Theodore Deickman (the owner of the abutting property), and George and Bernard Strotman (the lessees thereof). The petition alleged, in substance, that Deickman owned the lot and building at the southwest corner of Fifteenth and Holman streets; that said building was 80 feet long and more than 30 feet wide, with a 4-inch metal down spout from the roof, which emptied the water gathered on the roof directly upon the cement sidewalk in front of the building, where said water, by alternately freezing and thawing, formed a covering of ice which spread out and upon the sidewalk in great and dangerous quantities; that by repeated thawing and freezing the ice accumulated in ridges and lumps, and in such quantities as to cause a dangerous obstruction upon the sidewalk, and over which Mary Stephens stumbled and fell, causing the injuries which resulted in her death; and that said slick, slippery, and dangerous condition had existed and continued for more than two weeks before the accident, and was known to the defendants, or they by the exercise of ordinary diligence could repairing and cleaning them, and not his tenant, may be found responsible for their creating a dangerous accumulation of ice in an adjoining way, to the injury of a passer-by. Plaintiff was injured by falling upon an accumulation of ice on a walk at the side of a private way. A gutter was constructed under the eaves in front, with a conductor which extended down from near the end of the gutter on the side of the house, and emptied water on the sidewalk.

In Aull v. Lee, 84 N. J. L. 155, 85 Atl. 1018, the plaintiff in her declaration averred that the defendant, for his own convenience, removed from the sidewalk of a public street adjoining his premises a large quantity of snow which had naturally fallen there, and deposited it upon his adjoining premises, and there permitted it to remain for a long time; that, as a consequence, the snow melted and the water therefrom ran upon the sidewalk, where it was congealed into ice; and that the plaintiff, as she was walking along the sidewalk, stepped upon this ice and was thereby thrown and injured. It was held that a cause of action was set out, and the declaration not subject to a demurrer. The court was of the opinion that a party is responsible for the results flowing from the artificial accumulation of snow upon his premises adjoining a sidewalk, and there left to discharge water at times when the natural result would be to form ice upon the sidewalk. "While a party would not be responsible at all times for conditions resulting from natural causes, still if, for his own convenience or benefit, he undertakes to store snow which has fallen in another place upon his own property, he is responsible for any injury which might reasonably be expected to result therefrom. It seems to be well settled that where one maintains upon his own property buildings which collect and temporarily hold snow and ice, so that it may be reasonably expected that it will fall from such building to the sidewalk, or upon adjacent buildings of other property owners, and injury results therefrom, a cause of action exists.

Manifestly, if one should cart upon his lot large quantities of snow and leave it there to melt and discharge water over the sidewalk, at a time when it might reasonably be expected that such water would congeal on the sidewalk and render it a dangerous place for the public to travel over, he would have created a condition from which he might reasonably anticipate that persons who used the sidewalk would be thrown and injured, and if so, he would be chargeable with the injuries that resulted from his conduct."

So, a railroad company having no license from the city is liable to a person injured by falling on ice formed on the sidewalk from water flowing from its tanks. McGoldrick v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 49 N. Y. S. R. 566, 20 N. Y. Supp. 914, affirmed without opinion in 142 N. Y. 640, 37 N. E. 567.

In Canfield v. Chicago & W. M. R. Co. 78 Mich. 356, 44 N. W. 385, where a young woman fell on the ice on a sidewalk near defendant's water tank, the court stated that as the icy condition of the walk was not the result of neglect to remove naturally accruing ice and snow, but was caused by the action of defendant in throwing water on the place where it froze, the case was a proper one for the jury.

In Rohling v. Eich, 23 App. Div. 179, 48 N. Y. Supp. 892, where the gravamen of the complaint was that the dangerous condition of the street which caused the injury to the plaintiff was occasioned by defendant's wrongful act in sweeping out snow from his own lot onto the sidewalk, where it accumulated and formed an obstruction which imperiled the safety of persons lawfully using the street for purposes of public travel, the court stated that there was no doubt that an individual is liable for thus interfering with the safety of persons using the highway, if injury results to them from the condition thus created, but to make out a case, the plaintiff must show not only that the defendant swept out the snow, or caused it to be swept out, but that it was allowed to remain upon the sidewalk; and that the plaintiff has failed to sustain that burden.

J. D. C.

have known it, all of said time. The circuit court sustained the demurrers of Deickman and his tenants to the petition; and from an order dismissing the petition upon plaintiff's failure to further plead, the plaintiff prosecutes this appeal.

The suit against the city is not here; this appeal relates solely to the case against Deickman and his tenants, and presents but one question, to wit, the liability of the owner of abutting property, and his tenants, for injuries sustained by a pedestrian in walking upon ice formed on a sidewalk in front of his property in the manner above set forth, and as the result of water carried from the roof by the owner's gutters and pipes. It is not alleged that the down spout, of itself, constituted an obstruction upon the sidewalk; neither is there any allegation as to the thickness of the ice; and, as the petition charges that said ice was caused to spread out upon the sidewalk, it is clear the injury received by Mrs. Stephens was caused by her slipping upon the ice.

As the question is one of first impression in this jurisdiction, appellant relies, by way of analogy, upon Covington Saw Mill & Mfg. Co. v. Drexilius, 120 Ky. 493, 117 Am. St. Rep. 593, 87 S. W. 266, claiming that the principle there announced supports the petition in this case. In the Drexilius Case the sawmill company, without the permission of the city, and entirely for its own convenience, constructed a covered wooden sewer across a public alley; and the court held it was the company's duty to maintain the sewer in such a reasonably safe condition as would not interfere with the public's superior use of the alley for any purpose for which it might have been properly used, and that its failure to keep the sewer in such repair made it a nuisance. While not directly in point, the principle there announced, that one who uses a public easement for his own purposes must keep it in a reasonably safe condition for the use of the public, is applicable to the case at bar.

In the same way appellee relies upon Webster v. Chesapeake & O. R. Co. 32 Ky. L. Rep. 404, 105 S. W. 845; Jaegar v. Newport, 155 Ky. 110, 159 S. W. 671, and Varney v. Covington, 155 Ky. 602, 160 S. W. 173, in support of the proposition that the property owner is not liable. While those suits were against the municipality, it is insisted the principle which excepted the city from liability in those cases applies equally to the case of an abutting property owner.

In the Jaegar Case the accident happened at the intersection of an alley with a street. There had been snow, and as the snow melted the water ran down the alley and was frozen at the point where the sidewalk crossed the alley. The ice had accumulated until it was about even with the sidewalk,—perhaps 6 inches high, with a large ridge on it. When Mrs. Jaeger stepped on the ice, she fell and was injured, although she fell before she reached the ridge of ice. In that case this court held the city was not liable; and it is argued that, if the city was not liable under such circumstances, surely the property holder would not be liable, or bound to a greater degree of care than the city itself. In the course of the opinion, however, the court said: "While, due to the operation of the statutes there in force, municipalities in the New England states are held to a stricter degree of liability, the decided weight of authority elsewhere, as well as the tendency of the more recent decisions, is to hold that a city is not ordinarily liable for mere slipperiness of its sidewalks, occasioned by snow and ice. Where, however, the sidewalk itself is defective, or the snow or ice amounts to an obstruction, or its natural condition has been changed by artificial means, liability may attach; or where it is customary to treat the removal of snow and ice as a regular part of highway management, a failure to do so may become wrong or negligent." (Cases cited.)

The same rule was announced in Varney v. Covington, supra, and the language above quoted from the Jaegar Case was repeated with approval. It will be noticed, however, that the exemption from liability was based upon the fact that the city had done nothing to change the natural condition of the surroundings. That fact is clearly shown by the closing paragraph in the opinion in the Varney Case, where it is said: "As it was not made to appear by the proof that the injury sustained by the appellant was the result of any defect in the construction of the sidewalk, or the changed natural condition of the ice by artificial means, or that the city had undertaken the duty of removing the snow and ice from its sidewalks, there is no ground for our holding that the trial court erred in directing a verdict in favor of the appellee."

We are not, however, without abundant authority from other jurisdictions which is directly in point.

In Reedy v. St. Louis Brewing Asso. 161 Mo. 523, 53 L.R.A. 805, 61 S. W. 859, the court, in discussing the question of the joint liability of the city and the abutting property owner for negligently suffering rain water to be discharged from defective pipes from his roof, so that it freezes and forms a dangerous condition of the sidewalk, said: "It is argued upon the authority of Norton v. St. Louis, 97 Mo. 537, 11 S. W. 242; St. Louis v. Connecticut Mut. L. Ins. Co. 107 Mo. 92, 28 Am. St. Rep. 402, 17 S. W. 637; Baustian v. Young, 152 Mo. 317, 75 Am. St. Rep. 462, 53 S. W. 921, and other cases cited, that the abutting owner is not responsible for the condition of the sidewalk in his front, but that the duty to look after that is on the city alone. It does not, however, impair the doctrine laid down in those cases, to say that an individual may become liable and jointly liable with the city for an unsafe condition of the sidewalk. This liability does not arise from the fact that he is owner of property abutting the sidewalk, but from the fact that he is instrumental in causing the condition, either by his wilful act or negligent omission to perform a duty which the law imposes on him. If he is allowed an extraordinary use of the sidewalk for his private convenience, as, for example, to place in it a manhole for the reception of coal (Benjamin v. Metropolitan Street R. Co. 133 Mo. 274, 34 S. W. 590), a water meter (Carvin v. St. Louis, 151 Mo. 334, 52 S. W. 210), or an excavation in close proximity to the sidewalk for a foundation for a new building (Wiggin v. St. Louis, 135 Mo. 558, 37 S. W. 528), the law imposes on him the exercise of reasonable care to guard the public from injury in such use. And it may be said that if the individual neglect to perform any duty that the law imposes on him in particular, and a dangerous condition of the sidewalk results, then a new duty on him in relation to that condition arises, and, of course, with greater force, it would be so if that condition was the result of his wilful act." Again, in the same opinion, we find the following language: "It is said by this defendant that there is no law requiring it to have gutters and down spouts on its buildings at all. There is no statute on the subject that we are aware of, but the principle of the common law is that, whilst the owner of adjoining property is not responsible for the natural flow of water across his land onto the land of his neighbor, yet he is liable if he collects it in a quantity by artificial means and discharges it in a flood on his neighbor's land, and that principle underlies that feature of this case. Water accumulated on a large roof and directed to a single point may cause a nuisance for which the owner of the house would be liable. If, therefore, the petition is to be construed into stating a case in which the brewing association was negligent in suffering the water to be discharged on the sidewalk, where it became frozen and formed a dangerous condition (and that seems to have been the construction put upon it by 51 L.R.A.(N.S.)

both parties and the trial court), then it showed a condition of the sidewalk for the continuance of which for an unnecessary period both defendants would be liable; the joint wrong being the neglect to remove the obstruction."

The same rule has long maintained in Massachusetts. In Maloney v. Hayes, 206 Mass. 1, 28 L.R.A.(N.S.) 200, 91 N. E. 911, 3 N. C. C. A. 137, the court said: "The plaintiff, while lawfully using the street as a traveler, was injured by falling on an accumulation of ice which had been formed from water collected and discharged upon the sidewalk through a spout attached to a conductor leading from the roof of the defendant's house. A landowner or occupier of land cannot lawfully collect surface water into a definite channel and discharge it upon a highway, making it unsafe for the use of travelers. The act creates a public nuisance, and a traveler who suffers injury therefrom can sue the wrongdoer. Hynes v. Brewer, 194 Mass. 435, 9 L.R.A.(N.S.) 598, 80 N. E. 503." Again, in Field v. Gowdy, 199 Mass. 570, 19 L.R.A.(N.S.) 237, 85 N. E. 385, the court said: "A landowner has a right to change the surface of his lot, or improve it by the construction of buildings or by other means, in any lawful manner, and, if the natural course of surface water is thereby altered, no liability is imposed on him. But he has no right to collect water into a definite channel by a spout or otherwise and pour it upon a public way. If he does this, and through the operation of natural causes the water freezes, he is the efficient cause in the creation of a nuisance, and is liable for whatever damage ensues as a probable consequence. Cavanagh v. Block, 192 Mass. 63, 6 L.R.A.(N.S.) 310, 116 Am. St. Rep. 220, 77 N. E. 1027, 20 Am. Neg. Rep. 379; Hynes v. Brewer, supra; Leahan v. Cochran, 178 Mass. 560, 53 L.R.A. 891, 86 Am. St. Rep. 506, 60 N. E. 382. There was evidence tending to show that from two spouts on the defendant's house, one about 11 feet from the street line and the other nearer by the width of a piazza, water was collected from the roof and turned upon his concrete walk, and by the natural grade of the walk flowed to the sidewalk, where it froze in a ridge across the width of the public walk about 3 inches in thickness in the middle. This was sufficient to warrant a finding that the defendant collected the surface water in an artificial course and poured it upon the public way in such a manner as to create a nuisance."

In Tremblay v. Harmony Mills, 171 N. Y. 599, 64 N. E. 501, 12 Am. Neg. Rep. 132, the court, distinguishing, if it did not overrule, Wenzlick v. McCotter, 87 N. Y. 122, 41 Am. Rep. 358, and Moore v. Gadsden, 87 N. Y. 84, 41 Am. Rep. 352, said: "Assuming the sufficiency of the appellant's exception to raise the point, which may well be doubted, the question presented on this appeal is whether the trial court erred in instructing the jury that, if the defendant was negligent in maintaining a leader from the roof of a building so as to discharge water on the sidewalk, by which ice was accumulated thereon and the walk rendered dangerous, the plaintiff was entitled to recover. 'At common law any act or obstruction which unnecessarily incommodes or impedes the lawful use of a highway by the public is a nuisance.' Angell, Highways, § 223. And any party who sustains a private or peculiar injury therefrom may maintain an action to recover the damages sustained. Wakeman v. Wilbur, 147 N. Y. 657, 42 N. E. 341. This is unquestionably the general rule. That the jury could have found that the discharge of water and drippings from the leader in winter weather, when the water so discharged was liable to freeze and form ice, rendered the sidewalk dangerous and constituted an obstruction, and that the defendant was negligent in not carrying his leader under the sidewalk to the carriage way seems to me quite plain. To exonerate the defendant from liability, it must establish one of two propositions: First, that it had the lawful right to discharge the water which it had collected on the roof of its building upon the highway regardless of the effect of that action upon the highway; or, second, that because the municipality was liable to anyone injured by the defective character of its highway, no action could be maintained against the abutting owner, though his act may have created the danger or defect. I think that neither proposition can be sustained." See also Loois v. Eureka Club, 37 App. Div. 628, 56 N. Y. Supp. 66; Macauley v. Schneider, 9 App. Div. 279, 41 N. Y. Supp. 519; New York v. Dimick, 49 Hun, 241, 2 N. Y. Supp. 46; McConnell v. Bostelmann, 72 Hun, 238, 25 N. Y. Supp. 390; Thuringer v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 82 Hun, 33, 31 N. Y. Supp. 419—to the same effect.

The supreme court of Pennsylvania recognized the same rule in Brown v. White, 202 Pa. 307, 58 L.R.A. 324, 51 Atl. 963, where the court said: "The testimony of the plaintiff showed that on the morning of the accident there was a continuous ridge of ice extending from the mouth of the archway across the pavement to the curb. In the center of the ridge it was from 3 to 5 inches thick and sloped to the sides. It is claimed by the plaintiff, and her evidence tended to show, that this accumulation of ice was produced by the water which passed through the defendant's drainpipe and thence through the archway to the pavement, where it froze. This action was brought by the plaintiff to recover damages for the injuries she sustained by the alleged negligence of the defendant in causing the pavement to be obstructed by ice. . . . The second, third, and fourth assignments complain of the court's refusal to admit testimony to show that in the borough of Chambersburg it is customary to drain water from lots, roofs, and waste pipes for domestic use in the houses of the borough, over and through uncovered drains across pavements to the gutters in the street, in the same manner as was done in the case on trial. The learned trial judge very properly sustained the objection to the offers and excluded the testimony."

Benard v. Woonsocket Bobbin Co. 23 R. I. 581, 51 Atl. 209, is to the same effect.

The rule above announced is nothing more than an application of the older rule, which declares that an owner of land has no right to rid his land of surface water by collecting it in artificial channels and discharging it through or upon the land of an adjoining proprietor, laid down by Gould on Waters, § 271 and recognized by this court in Pickerill v. Louisville, 125 Ky. 213, 100 S. W. 873, and in Johnson v. Marcum, 152 Ky. 630, 153 S. W. 959.

The only case we have found which seems to be out of harmony with the prevailing doctrine is Jessup v. Bamford Bros. Silk Mfg. Co. 66 N. J. L. 641, 58 L.R.A. 329, 88 Am. St. Rep. 502, 51 Atl. 147. The case is not directly in point, and five justices dissented.

From these authorities it follows that the property holder, in conducting the water from the roof of his house to the sidewalk, must use ordinary care not to cause an obstruction or nuisance by which persons lawfully using the sidewalk, and in the exercise of ordinary care upon their part, may be injured; and in case such an obstruction or nuisance should arise suddenly or unexpectedly, it is the landlord's duty to remove the obstruction or nuisance as soon as he has knowledge of its existence, or could have had such knowledge by the exercise of ordinary care. In the case at bar the petition alleges the ice had remained upon the sidewalk for more than two weeks before the accident, and to the knowledge of the appellees. Clearly, it stated a case of actionable negligence, and the demurrer to the petition should have been overruled.

Since the petition equally charges all of the defendants with the negligent acts complained of, and it has not yet been made to appear that the landlord did not have complete control over his premises, the demurrers of all the appellees to the petition should have been overruled. Lee v. McLaughlin, 86 Me. 410, 28 L.R.A. 197, 30 Atl. 65.

Judgment reversed for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.

MASSACHUSETTS SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT.

WHITTAKER CHAIN TREAD COMPANY
v.

STANDARD AUTO SUPPLY COMPANY.

(216 Mass. 204, 103 N. E. 695.)

Accord and satisfaction — acceptance of amount acknowledged to be due — payment.

Cashing a check sent in payment of the portion of an account which is admitted to be due does not prevent enforcement of the balance, although the tender is on condition that it shall be received in full payment.

(December 13, 1913.)

REPORT by the Superior Court for Suffolk County for determination by the Supreme Judicial Court of an action brought to recover a balance claimed to be due on an account for certain goods sold and delivered by plaintiff to defendant. Judgment for plaintiff.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Ralph M. Smith for plaintiff.

Mr. John E. Crowley for defendant.

Loring, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff sold and delivered to the defendant goods to the amount of $80.03. The defendant undertook to return a part of the goods sold, of the value of $50.02. The plaintiff disputed its right to do so and refused to receive the goods from the teamster through whom the defendant undertook to make the return. While matters were in this condition the defendant sent the plaintiff a check for $30.01, which was admittedly due, and which the defendant stated was in full settlement of the account. The plaintiff cashed the check and on the following day notified the defendant that it had done so, and demanded payment of $50.02, the balance claimed by it to be due after crediting the amount of the check as a payment on account. The judge found that the defendant had no right to return the goods which it attempted to return, and that the plaintiff was entitled to recover the $50.02 due from it unless it was barred by cashing the check.

Cases in which debtors have undertaken to force a settlement upon their creditors by sending a check in full discharge of a disputed account have given rise to more than one question upon which there is a conflict in the authorities.

In Day v. McLea, L. R. 22 Q. B. Div. 610, 58 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 293, 60 L. T. N. S. 947, 37 Week. Rep. 483, 53 J. P. 532, it was decided by the court of appeal in England that a creditor who cashes a check sent in full settlement is not barred from contending that he did not agree to take it on the terms on which it was sent if at the time he accepts it he says that he takes it on account. The ground of that decision was that to make out the defense of accord and satisfaction the debtor must prove an agreement by the creditor to take the sum paid in settlement of the account, and that if the creditor, in taking the check, notifies the debtor that he accepts it on account, and that he refuses to accept it in full settlement, the debtor, as matter of law, has not proved an agreement on the part of the creditor to accept the check in satisfaction of the claim, but that that question must be decided by the jury. This doctrine is upheld in 17 Harvard Law Review, at page 469, and in the case of Goldsmith v. Lichtenberg, 139 Mich. 163, 102 N. W. 627. See also in this connection Krauser v. McCurdy, 174 Pa. 174, 34 Atl.

Note. — The question whether the acceptance of a remittance of part of an unliquidated or disputed claim, accompanied with a statement that it is "in full," operates as an assent to its receipt in full payment, is considered in the notes to Canadian Fish Co. v. McShane, 14 L.R.A.(N.S.) 443, and Barham v. Bank of Delight, 27 L.R.A.(N.S.) 439; and see later cases in this series: Matheny v. Eldorado, 28 L.R.A.(N.S.) 980; Scheffenacker v. Hoopes, 29 L.R.A.(N.S.) 205; Seeds Grain & Hay Co. v. Conger, 32 L.R.A.(N.S.) 380; and Bassick Gold Mine Co. v. Beardsley, 33 L.R.A.(N.S.) 852.

part of a liquidated and undisputed debt is a consideration for the discharge of the whole is considered in the notes to Fuller v. Kemp, 20 L.R.A. 785; Melroy v. Kemmerer, 11 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1018; and Ex parte Zeigler, 21 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1005.

For acceptance of partial allowance of claim by public body as an accord and satisfaction, see note to Paulson v. Ward County, 42 L.R.A.(N.S.) 111; and later case, Wolfe v. Humboldt County, 45 L.R.A.(N.S.) 762.

For acceptance of principal sum as affecting right to interest, see note to Bennett v. Federal Coal & Coke Co. 40 L.R.A.(N.S.) 588.

518; Kistler v. Indianapolis & St. L. R. Co. 88 Ind. 460.

But the true rule is to the contrary. The true rule is put with accuracy in Nassoio v. Tomlinson, 148 N. Y. 326, 331, 51 Am. St. Rep. 695, 42 N. E. 715, 716, in these words: "The plaintiff could only accept the money as it was offered, which was in satisfaction of his demand. He could not accept the benefit and reject the condition, for if he accepted at all it was cum onere. When he indorsed and collected the check referred to in the letter asking him to sign the inclosed receipt in full, it was the same, in legal effect, as if he had signed and returned the receipt, because acceptance of the check was a conclusive election to be bound by the condition upon which the check was offered." And to that effect is the weight of authority. Nassoio v. Tomlinson, 148 N. Y. 326, 51 Am. St. Rep. 695, 42 N. E. 715; Washington Natural Gas Co. v. Johnson, 123 Pa. 576, 10 Am. St. Rep. 553, 16 Atl. 799, 16 Mor. Min. Rep. 165; T. M. Partridge Lumber Co. v. Phelps-Burruss Lumber & Coal Co. 91 Neb. 396, 136 N. W. 65; Neely v. Thompson, 68 Kan. 193, 75 Pac. 117; Hull v. Johnson, 22 R. I. 66, 46 Atl. 182; Cunningham v. Standard Constr. Co. 134 Ky. 198, 119 S. W. 765; Canton Union Coal Co. v. Parlin & O. Co. 215 Ill. 244, 106 Am. St. Rep. 162, 74 N. E. 143; Petit v. Woodlief, 115 N. C. 120, 20 S. E. 208; Pollman & Bros. Coal & Sprinkling Co. v. St. Louis, 145 Mo. 651, 47 S. W. 563; Potter v. Douglass, 44 Conn. 541; Cooper v. Yazoo & M. Valley R. Co. 82 Miss. 634, 35 So. 162; Barham v. Kizzia, 100 Ark. 251, 140 S. W. 6; Thomas v. Columbia Phonograph Co. 144 Wis. 470, 129 N. W. 522; Sparks v. Spaulding Mfg. Co. — Iowa, —, 139 N. W. 1083. See also in this connection McDaniels v. Bank of Rutland, 29 Vt. 230, 70 Am. Dec. 406; Hutton v. Stoddart, 83 Ind. 539; Creighton v. Gregory, 142 Cal. 34, 75 Pac. 569.

Indeed, the decision in Day v. McLea, ubi supra, was explained by the court of appeal in the recent case of Hirachand Punamchand v. Temple [1911] 2 K. B. 330, 80 L. J. K. B. N. S. 1155, 105 L. T. N. S. 77, 27 Times L. R. 430, 55 Sol. Jo. 519, and made to rest not on the lack of agreement, but on the lack of consideration.

But in cases (like the case at bar) where there is a dispute as to the amount due under a contract, and payment of an amount which he (the debtor) admits to be due (that is to say, as to which there is no dispute) is made by the debtor in discharge of the whole contract, further and other questions arise.

The question whether the creditor who, under these circumstances, accepts such a payment, protesting that he takes it on account, is or is not barred, is a question upon which again the authorities are in conflict. It was held in the following cases that a creditor in such a case is barred: Nassoio v. Tomlinson, 148 N. Y. 326, 51 Am. St. Rep. 695, 42 N. E. 715; Ostrander v. Scott, 161 Ill. 339, 43 N. E. 1089; Tanner v. Merrill, 108 Mich. 58, 31 L.R.A. 171, 62 Am. St. Rep. 687, 65 N. W. 664; Neely v. Thompson, 68 Kan. 193, 75 Pac. 117; Treat v. Price, 47 Neb. 875, 66 N. W. 834; Hull v. Johnson, 22 R. I. 66, 46 Atl. 182; Cunningham v. Standard Constr. Co. 134 Ky. 198, 119 S. W. 765; Pollman & Bros. Coal & Sprinkling Co. v. St. Louis, 145 Mo. 651, 47 S. W. 563. See also in this connection Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. v. Clark, 178 U. S. 353, 44 L. ed. 1099, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 924. But in the following cases it was held that he was not barred: Demeules v. Jewel Tea Co. 103 Minn. 150, 14 L.R.A.(N.S.) 954, 123 Am. St. Rep. 315, 114 N. W. 733; Seattle, R. & S. R. Co. v. Seattle-Tacoma Power Co. 63 Wash. 639, 116 Pac. 289; Prudential Ins. Co. v. Cottingham, 103 Md. 319, 63 Atl. 359. See also in this connection Chrystal v. Gerlach, 25 S. D. 128, 125 N. W. 633; Robinson v. Leatherbee Tie & Lumber Co. 120 Ga. 901, 48 S. E. 380; Walston v. F. D. Calkins Co. 119 Iowa, 150, 93 N. W. 49; Weidner v. Standard Life & Acci. Ins. Co. 130 Wis. 10, 110 S. W. 246; Louisville, N. A. & C. R. Co. v. Helm, 109 Ky. 388, 59 S. W. 323.

The decision in most of these cases was made to turn upon the question whether payment of the amount admitted to be due without dispute did or did not constitute a valid consideration for the discharge of the balance of the debt about which there was a dispute. If that were the only question involved in the case at bar, it would be necessary to consider whether Tuttle v. Tuttle, 12 Met. 551, 46 Am. Dec. 701, is in conflict with the well-settled law of the commonwealth that a promise to pay one for doing that which he was under a prior legal duty to the promise to do is not binding for want of a valid consideration. The cases are collected in Parrot v. Mexican C. R. Co. 207 Mass. 184, 194, 34 L.R.A. (N.S.) 261, 93 N. E. 590.

Tuttle v. Tuttle, ubi supra, was a case in which the holder of a note made an express agreement to forego a claim which he had made to interest on the note in consideration of payment of the balance of the principal, then unpaid. It was a question whether he was entitled to interest, but there was no question of his right to the principal. It was held that this agreement was a bar to any claim for interest on the note. There was no discussion in the opinion as to the lack or validity of a consideration. But the point was involved in the decision.

In the case at bar there was no express agreement by the creditor to forego the balance of his claim on receiving payment of the amount admitted without dispute to be due. The only way in which such an agreement can be made out in the case at bar is on the ground that the plaintiff had to take the check sent him on the condition on which it was sent, and that by cashing the check he elected to accept the condition, and so took the part admittedly due in full discharge of the whole debt. But while the doctrine of election is sound where a check is sent in full discharge of a claim no part of which is admitted to be due, it does not obtain where a debtor undertakes to make payment of what he admits to be due, conditioned on its being accepted in discharge of what is in dispute. Such a condition, under those circumstances, is one which the debtor has no right to impose, and for that reason is void. In such a case the creditor is not put to an election to refuse the payment or to take it on the condition on which it is offered. He can take the payment admittedly due free of the void condition which the debtor has sought to impose. Take an example: Suppose the defendant had agreed to deliver to the plaintiff a stipulated quantity of iron for a stipulated price during each month of the year, and after six months the market price of iron was double that stipulated for in the contract. Suppose further that the defendant, on the seventh month, sent the stipulated amount of iron, but on condition that the plaintiff should pay double the stipulated price, can there be any doubt of the plaintiff's right to retain the iron without paying the double price? That is to say, can there be any doubt that the condition which required the plaintiff to pay double the contract price for the instalment sent was void, and that the plaintiff, under those circumstances, is not put to an election, but can keep the iron under the contract? There can be no doubt on that question in our opinion; and in our opinion the principle of law governing that case governs the case at bar, where the debtor undertook without right to impose upon a payment of what admittedly was due a void condition that it be received in full discharge of what was in dispute.

It follows that in accepting the check in the case at bar as a payment on account, the plaintiff was within its rights, and that it has not agreed to accept it in full settlement of the balance of the account. By 51 L.R.A.(N.S.)

the terms of the report judgment is to be entered for the plaintiff in the sum of $50.02, with interest from the 20th day of October, 1911; and it is so ordered.

MICHIGAN SUPREME COURT.

CATHERINE L. ERNST

v.

PETER ERNST, Appt.

(— Mich. —, 144 N. W. 513.)

Estoppel — quitclaim — after-acquired title.

1. A quitclaim deed by a woman of land held by herself and her husband by entireties does not pass the property when the title vests in her by the death of her husband.

Lien — quitclaim of land held by entireties.

2. A quitclaim deed by a woman of land held by herself and her husband by entireties creates no lien on the property in favor of the grantee.

Cloud on title — removal — retention of consideration.

3. A quitclaim deed by a woman of land held by herself and her husband by entireties will not be canceled as a cloud on title after the title vests in her by her husband's death until she returns the consideration which she received for the conveyance.

(December 20, 1913.)

A PPEAL by defendant from a decree of the Circuit Court for St. Clair County in favor of complainant in a suit to remove a cloud from the title of lands owned by complainant and her husband as tenants by entirety. Modified.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Walsh & Walsh and C. L. Benedict, for appellant:

A court of equity has power to decree an equitable lien upon the land in question for the amount paid by Peter Ernst to Mrs. Ernst as consideration for the deed thereof.

The court should not grant the relief asked for by the complainant, except upon the condition that she do equity by refunding to defendant the amount he paid her, with interest. When she asks that this deed be canceled and set aside without tendering a return of the consideration therefor, she does not come with clean hands.

The court should enter a decree determining that the complainant owes the defendant the sum paid as consideration for the deed, with interest.

Koch v. Bird, 174 Mich. 594, 140 N. W. 919.

A purchaser under a quitclaim deed obtains no better title than that held by his grantor.

Hughes v. Jordan, 118 Mich. 27, 76 N. W. 134.

A quitclaim deed does not convey the land itself, but merely the grantor's interest therein; and therefore, a subsequently acquired title does not pass to the grantee.

Kuhn, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The bill of complaint is filed in this cause for the purpose of removing a cloud from the title of lands which, on the 9th day of December, 1881, were owned by the complainant and her husband, Frederick W. Ernst, as tenants by entirety. On that day the complainant executed to the defendant and cross complainant, her stepson, a quitclaim deed of the land, for which he gave her $175. Mrs. Ernst and her husband occupied the land up to the date of her husband's death, January 26, 1910, and she is still in possession through a tenant. She claims that she obtained the $175 as a loan, for which she gave the deed as security, and that she repaid the loan in 1893 by conveying other property to the defendant. It is the claim of the defendant and cross complainant that he purchased the interest of Mrs. Ernst in the land described in the quitclaim deed, and as a consideration gave her the $175. In his cross bill he asks the court to decree that this deed placed him in the same position as to the title to the land as that in which Mrs. Ernst stood before the deed was given, and that on the death of Frederick W. Ernst he became the sole owner. He further asks that, if the deed did not convey legal title to the land, the court find that it created an equitable lien which became enforceable on the death of Frederick W. Ernst. The circuit judge held that, under the decisions of this court, "the quitclaim deed of December 9, 1881, . . . conveyed no present title, because Mrs. Ernst had no title that she could convey by her sole act. Neither could she create an encumbrance in this way." Vinton v. Beamer, 55 Mich. 559, 22 N. W. 40; Re Lewis, 85 Mich. 340, 24 Am. St. Rep. 94, 48 N. W. 580; Naylor v. Minock, 96 Mich. 182, 35 Am. St. Rep. 595, 55 N. W. 664. He made the following supplementary findings of facts, which an examination of this record shows are fully warranted by the evidence: "First, that the quitclaim deed from Catherine L. Ernst to Peter Ernst, executed in December, 1881, was intended by the parties as a conveyance of the interest Catherine L. Ernst had in the land herein described to Peter Ernst; second, at the time of the execution of the quitclaim deed described in the first paragraph of this finding, Peter Ernst paid Catherine L. Ernst the sum of $175, as a consideration for the interest which they supposed the deed conveyed, which sum has not been repaid to Peter Ernst." The circuit judge held the deed void, and made a decree granting the prayer of complainant's bill. Counsel for defendant and cross-complainant concede in this court that the deed is void, but contend that an equitable lien for the amount paid by the defendant to the complainant should be decreed, and, in the event that this cannot be done, that the payment of this sum by the complainant to the defendant be made a condition precedent to granting relief to the complainant.

The quitclaim deed did not convey the land itself, but merely the interest which the grantor had therein, and the purchaser under this deed did not obtain any better title than that held by the grantor. Hughes v. Jordan, 118 Mich. 27, 76 N. W. 134. And it necessarily follows that a subsequently acquired title did not pass to the grantee. Frost v. Missionary Soc. 56 Mich. 62, 22 N. W. 189; Fay v. Wood, 65 Mich. 390, 32 N. W. 614; Gadsby v. Monroe, 115 Mich. 282, 73 N. W. 367.

The complainant, at the time she gave the deed, had no right, title, or interest in the land which she could, by her sole act, encumber in any way; and to hold that the defendant obtained an equitable lien at the time of taking the deed would, in effect, be giving him a mortgage, which it is clear she could not do. He does not claim that he was defrauded or deceived, and, according to his own version, he knew the kind of deed he received and was willing to accept it. The circuit judge was correct in holding that no equitable lien was established.

The complainant, however, has come into a court of equity for relief, and under the familiar axiom that he who seeks equity must do equity, it does seem that relief should not be granted complainant without requiring her to repay what has been paid her. We are satisfied that she received the $175, and has not repaid the sum to the defendant, as found by the circuit judge. The relief she prays for should be made conditional upon repayment by her to the defendant of the $175 and interest thereon at the legal rate from the time of the payment.

The decree of the court below will be modified accordingly, with costs to the defendant.

MISSISSIPPI SUPREME COURT.

UNDERWRITERS AT LLOYD'S INSURANCE COMPANY, Appt.,
v.

VICKSBURG TRACTION COMPANY.

(— Miss. —, 63 So. 455.)

Judgment — separate suits for injury to person and property.

An insurer of an automobile who had, in accordance with a provision of the policy, become subrogated to the claim of the owner for damages thereto against a street railway company before the institution by such owner of a suit for personal injuries growing out of the same accident, in which a judgment has been recovered, is not precluded thereby from maintaining an action.

(December 8, 1913.)

Note. — Injury both to person and to property at the same time as constituting more than one cause of action.

The question here considered was treated in the notes to King v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 50 L.R.A. 161, and Ochs v. Public Service R. Co. 36 L.R.A.(N.S.) 240. A search has disclosed but one later case.

In Schermerhorn v. Los Angeles P. R. Co. 18 Cal. App. 454, 123 Pac. 351, where the plaintiff had suffered personal injuries and damage to his automobile through a collision with defendant's car, it was argued that where damage has been caused to the person and property of an individual by the same tortious act of another, separate actions cannot be brought to recover for the different damages resulting; but it was held that the fact that the plaintiff had previously recovered a judgment which had been satisfied, for the injury to his automobile, did not preclude him from maintaining an action to recover for his personal injuries, it being held that § 427 of the Code of Civil Procedure, providing that the plaintiff may unite several causes of action where they arise out of "(6) injuries to person, (7) injuries to property," and providing further that "the causes of action so united must belong to one only of these classes," although it authorizes several causes of action for injuries to the person to be united, or several causes for injuries to property, does not authorize the uniting of actions for injuries to the person and to property.

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Warren County overruling a demurrer to the answer in an action brought to recover damages for injuries to an automobile which had been insured by plaintiff under a policy providing for subrogation. Reversed.

Messrs. Hirsh, Dent, & Landau for appellee.

Reed, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

F. E. O'Neil, on September 5, 1909, while driving his automobile along the streets of Vicksburg and crossing the tracks of the Vicksburg Traction Company, was struck by an electric car. His automobile was damaged and he was injured in his person. He held a policy of insurance on the automobile in the appellant company, dated August 2, 1909. Pursuant to this policy, on November 26, 1909, in consideration of the payment by appellant of the amount of the policy, as required thereby, Mr. O'Neil executed to appellant an article of subrogation, in accordance with the terms of the policy, whereby he assigned to appellant all of his right, claim, and interest against appellee for damages to his automobile. In the policy is the following provision: "In case of payment of loss under this policy, these assurers shall be subrogated, to the amount of such payment, to all rights of recovery for such loss by the assured against persons, corporations, or estates; and the assured shall execute all papers required, and shall co-operate with these assurers to secure these assurers such rights."

On December 16, 1909, Mr. O'Neil brought suit against appellee for personal injuries sustained by him in the collision, and recovered a judgment. Appellant, as assignee of O'Neil, afterward brought the present suit against appellee to recover for damages to the automobile. Appellee pleaded as a bar to the action that appellant's claim for damages was res judicata because of the recovery by O'Neil from appellee in the suit for injuries to his person sustained in the collision, claiming that all injuries from the collision constituted only one cause of action, and could not be split so that separate suits could be brought for the injuries to his person and for damages to his automobile. A demurrer interposed by appellant to appellee's plea was overruled by the court, and from such action this appeal is taken.

It is contended by appellee that this case is controlled by the decision of this court in the case of Kimball v. Louisville & N. R. Co. 94 Miss. 396, 48 So. 230. Therein Kimball recovered a judgment against the railroad company for damages done to his horse and wagon while he was attempting to drive across a track of the company at a public crossing in Biloxi. After judgment had been fully satisfied, he brought suit to recover for injuries sustained to his person in the same collision. The court decided that he could not maintain the second action; that the injury to himself and his property was by the same tortious act, and gave rise to but a single cause of action; that the different injuries were merely separate items of damages; and that he was not permitted to split up his cause of action.

We see a difference between this case and the Kimball Case. Mr. Kimball brought both suits against the railroad company. The entire cause of action was in him when he filed his first suit for damages done his personal property, and when he sued to recover for injuries to his person. He himself split his cause of action, which all along was wholly in him. This is not so in the case now before us. Mr. O'Neil had assigned all of his right and interest against the traction company for damages to his automobile before he filed suit for personal injuries. When the suit was entered by him, he had no cause of action against the company for damages to the automobile. This disposition by him of his right to damages to the automobile was in pursuance of a policy of insurance written for him by appellant company. It was in accordance with an agreement executed by him to make such transfer, whereby appellant would be subrogated to all of his rights to recover.

Appellant had an equitable interest in the automobile at the time of the collision by reason of having written the policy of insurance. When it was damaged, then, by virtue of the contract of insurance and the article of subrogation, appellant had such an interest in the claim for damages. This interest became a right to sue at law when appellant paid to Mr. O'Neil the amount owing him for loss under the policy and received from him assignment of his claim and was subrogated to his right to recover for damages. Therefore, when the suit was filed by Mr. O'Neil on December 16, 1909, against appellee, the cause of action for recovery for injuries sustained to his person was in Mr. O'Neil, and the cause of action to recover for damages to the automobile was in appellant. There were then two distinct causes of action, two separate rights to recover, in two different persons.

In delivering the opinion of the court in the case of Kimball v. Louisville & N. R. Co. supra, Judge Mayes cited the case of King v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 80 Minn. 83, 50 L.R.A. 161, 81 Am. St. Rep. 238, 82 N. W. 1113, and made the following quotation from the opinion in that case: "That rule of construction should be adopted which will most speedily and economically bring litigation to an end, if at the same time it conserves the ends of justice. There is nothing to be gained in splitting up the rights of an injured party as in this case, and much may be saved if one action is made to cover the subject." We note, upon examination of the report of the King Case, that both suits were brought by King. The first suit was for personal injuries suffered in a collision with a train of the railroad company, and the second was for damages done to his wagon, horse, and harness. The court decided that he could not split his cause of action.

In the Kimball Case, as well as in the King Case, we can see that the ends of justice were conserved by requiring the parties to bring one suit for their one cause of action. But it does not seem to us that the ends of justice would be conserved in the present case by deciding that the appellant had no cause of action for damages to the automobile, because Mr. O'Neil had brought his suit for personal injuries suffered by him,—the only cause of action he had against appellee when the suit was filed. It would not "conserve the ends of justice," but would work an injustice, to hold that Mr. O'Neil could, as claimed, destroy the right of appellant, vested in the manner above shown, to sue for damages to the automobile by bringing suit for injuries to his person. Appellant could not control Mr. O'Neil's course in entering suit. Appellant had no interest in his cause of action for personal injuries, but owned absolutely the right to recover for damages to the automobile.

We do not intend to disturb the rule announced in the Kimball Case. As applied in that case we approve it. We do not think it should be stretched to include the case before us. It is not applicable here. We distinguish that case from this. Appellant's right to recover in this case should not be defeated by Mr. O'Neil's suit. The ends of justice, the public welfare, will be conserved by holding that appellant, under the facts of this case, has a cause of action against appellee.

Reversed and remanded.

NEBRASKA SUPREME COURT.

MATTIE SHEETS, Appt.,
v.
CITY OF McCOOK.

(— Neb. —, 145 N. W. 252.)

Municipal corporation — obstruction of sidewalk — health measure — liability.

Neither the city nor the officers of its board of health are liable for damages sustained by reason of acts committed in the exercise of police power for the benefit of the public health and safety; but if, in the exercise of such powers, such officers place a rope barrier across a public walk or street, which becomes and remains in a defective and dangerous condition, and the city either has actual notice of the defect, or it has existed for such a length of time as that notice will be presumed, the city may, if the facts in the case warrant, be held liable for its negligence in leaving the walk in an unsafe and dangerous condition.

(January 30, 1914.)

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the District Court for Red Willow County sustaining defendant's motion for a directed verdict in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by its negligence. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. C. D. Ritchie, for appellant:

It is the duty of a city to keep and maintain its streets and sidewalks in repair and safe for public use.

Rep. 451; Prime v. Yonkers, 192 N. Y. 105, 84 N. E. 571.

Letton, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In June and July, 1910, there was an epidemic of scarlet fever in McCook. A number of houses were quarantined, and, in order to prevent the further spread of the disease, the city authorities caused ropes to be stretched, extending from the porch of one of the quarantined houses across the sidewalk to posts or stakes driven at the edge of the curb, a distance of about 22 or 23 feet. Two ropes were placed at each side of the house; the lower being about 30 inches, and the upper about 4 feet, high. 51 L.R.A.(N.S.)

The witnesses for the city testify that the ropes were stretched tight when put up, and were afterwards tightened twice; but it is shown that the stakes or posts at the curb were not in any manner braced. On Saturday, July 18, 1910, the plaintiff, a young married woman twenty-four years old, then about six months gone in pregnancy, while walking on the sidewalk about 8 o'clock in the evening, tripped and fell over one of the ropes. She testified that it struck her about half way between the ankle and knee, and that she did not know what tripped her until after she had fallen, when she discovered the rope. She makes no mention of seeing two ropes at that point. She finished her errand, and returned to her home. Some time on Sunday or Sunday night, under peculiar circumstances, she gave premature birth to a stillborn child. In the petition she alleges that the city knowingly and negligently permitted the sidewalk at the place where she fell to remain obstructed with full knowledge of the dangerous condition, that it neglected to place a light upon the rope or any warning to passers-by, and that the sidewalk had remained in that condition for a long time. The defendant's answer is a general denial and a plea of contributory negligence. At the close of the testimony defendant moved the court for a directed verdict in its favor, which was sustained, and judgment of dismissal rendered. Plaintiff appeals.

The testimony showed that the ropes were placed across the sidewalk in the latter part of June or early in July by one of the city policemen, at the direction of Dr. Hare, who was a member of the board of health and city physician.

The plaintiff's position is that the city negligently failed to perform its duty to exercise reasonable care in keeping its sidewalks free from danger, both by the act of commission in placing the rope across the walk, and by its omission to warn foot passengers either by lights, barrier, or otherwise, and by suffering the rope to sag so as to make it dangerous. The city asserts that the stretching of the ropes was performed by officers of the board of health in the exercise of the police power, for the protection of public health and safety, and that it is not responsible for negligent acts on the part of the board of health or of any of its officers or employees.

The ordinances of the city provide that the mayor, the city physician, the president of the city council, and the city treasurer shall constitute the board of health. They are empowered to make all needful rules and regulations relating to matters of health and sanitation in the city, and to enforce the laws of the state and the ordinances of said city in relation to such matters. The city marshal is created the health officer, with the usual powers of such official.

The board of health of the city and its officers had the right, under the health ordinance, to erect barriers to prevent the approach of others than the physician within nearer than 30 feet of the house. The plaintiff, while conceding that no damages are recoverable from the city which were caused by the quarantine itself, contends that the injuries which plaintiff suffered were not caused by or derived from the quarantine, but from the neglect of the city to see that its sidewalks were kept reasonably safe. The defendant insists that the rule is broader, and that the city is not liable for any negligent acts on the part of health officers, and that their act was the cause of the injury. We have held that no damages can be recovered against a city or village arising from the placing of a quarantine, for the reason that the acts of the health officer are public and governmental, and are not corporate in character. Verdon v. Bowman, 5 Neb. (Unof.) 38, 97 N. W. 229, 15 Am. Neg. Rep. 110. The same principle is laid down in Murray v. Omaha, 66 Neb. 279, 103 Am. St. Rep. 702, 92 N. W. 299, 13 Am. Neg. Rep. 138, where the facts were that certain old buildings were torn down by employees of a board of building inspection, and the city was held not liable. Perhaps as clear a statement of the principle as we have seen may be found in the case of Love v. Atlanta, 95 Ga. 129, 51 Am. St. Rep. 64, 22 S. E. 29. The facts were that a small negro boy, driving a fractious mule, was employed by the city in the removal of garbage under the direction of the board of health; that the mule ran away, collided with the plaintiff's buggy, and caused serious injuries. The court says: "In the discharge of such duties as pertain to the health department of the state, the state is acting strictly in the discharge of one of the functions of government. If the state delegate to a municipal corporation, either by general law or by particular statute, this power, and impose upon it within its limits the duty of taking such steps and such measures as may be necessary to the preservation of the public health, the municipal corporation likewise, in the discharge of such duty, is in the exercise of a purely governmental function, affecting the welfare, not only of the citizens resident within its corporation, but of the citizens of the commonwealth generally, all of whom have an interest in the prevention of infectious or contagious diseases at any point within the state, and in 51 L.R.A.(N.S.)

the exercise of such powers is entitled to the same immunity against suit as the state itself enjoys;" and humorously ends the opinion with the remark: "However incongruous it may appear to be to say that this diminutive dinky and this refractory mule were engaged in the performance of some of the functions of government, it is nevertheless true, and illustrates how even the humblest of its citizens, under the operation of its laws, may become in Georgia an important public functionary." Watson v. Atlanta, 136 Ga. 370, 71 S. E. 664; Evans v. Kankakee, 231 Ill. 223, 13 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1190, 83 N. E. 223; Valentine v. Englewood, 76 N. J. L. 509, 19 L.R.A.(N.S.) 262, 71 Atl. 344, 16 Ann. Cas. 731; Ogg v. Lansing, 35 Iowa, 495, 14 Am. Rep. 499.

This principle requires no further discussion. The city, however, is charged with the duty of exercising reasonable care to keep its sidewalks in reasonably safe condition for public travel. This is a duty which it must perform regardless of the person by whom the dangerous condition of the sidewalk is created. Neither the city nor the officers of its health department are liable for the negligent acts of such officers committed in the enforcement of the provisions for the public health; but, while the city may not be liable on account of these acts, it may be liable for its neglect of an undeleagable duty committed to it. Can it with reason be said that, if a trap had been set upon a sidewalk, and had been maintained there for such a length of time that the city authorities must be presumed to have notice of it, the city would not be guilty of negligence in failing to remove the trap, even though it had been placed there by a person for whose act it could not be held responsible? In this case the ropes had extended across the walk for several weeks before the plaintiff fell, and apparently long enough for the city authorities to have acquired knowledge of the existence of the unsafe condition, by whomsoever placed. No effective barrier was placed against travel on the sidewalk, and no lights or other warnings were so displayed as to bring the rope to the knowledge or notice of one passing in the dusk or dark. We think it would be unreasonable to hold that a city might with impunity allow such obstructions to remain upon its walks. This view seems to be in accordance with that of other courts where an almost identical question was presented.

In Barnesville v. Ward, 85 Ohio St. 1, 40 L.R.A.(N.S.) 94, 96 N. E. 937, Ann. Cas. 1912D, 1234, the facts were that the plaintiff tripped over a low hanging wire placed between the sidewalk and the curb for the purpose of protecting the grass and trees upon the parking. The court held that the city might properly for the public good maintain park strips between the sidewalk and the curb, and might construct proper barriers to prevent travel thereon, and that one could not complain if he had collided with a tree or a proper barrier, but that this would not authorize the city to maintain a wire in such a condition as to become dangerous; that "if a pedestrian, in the exercise of due care for his own safety, is injured by reason of the dangerous or defective condition of the barrier, the municipality is liable in damages for such injury, if it be shown that it knew, or, in the exercise of ordinary care, should have known, the dangerous condition thereof." To the same effect is Paducah v. Simmons, 144 Ky. 640, 139 S. W. 851, where the facts were substantially identical; Covington v. Whitney, 30 Ky. L. Rep. 659, 99 S. W. 337; Glasgow v. Gillenwaters, 113 Ky. 140, 67 S. W. 381.

In McDonald v. St. Paul, 82 Minn. 308, 83 Am. St. Rep. 428, 84 N. W. 1022, 9 Am. Neg. Rep. 318, where the facts were similar to Barnesville v. Ward, supra, the court held that the city is not bound to use due care to keep the parked portion of the street free from obvious obstructions, although they may endanger the safety of travelers thereon, but that, "while this is true, yet the municipality has no right to maintain, or permit others to do so, on its boulevards, and especially on those at the street corners, anything in the nature of a dangerous pitfall or trap, or snare, or like obstruction, whereby the traveler, yielding to the impulse of the average person to cut across the corner when in a hurry, may be injured."

In Carrington v. St. Louis, 89 Mo. 208, 58 Am. Rep. 108, 1 S. W. 240, in a case where a police officer negligently left an obstruction in a street, the court, after stating the rule of nonliability for acts of officers exercising governmental or police functions, says: "But we do not see how these principles of law can aid the defendant here, for it is the unquestioned duty of the city to keep its streets and sidewalks in a reasonably safe condition for persons traveling thereon, and it is liable in damages to one injured by reason of negligence in this behalf." Shinnick v. Marshalltown, 137 Iowa, 72, 114 N. W. 542. Temporary obstructions in a street are often lawful or permissible; but, as said by Judge Dillon, "this will never justify the leaving of the street or way in an unsafe and dangerous condition, or its use in an unreasonable manner, or for an unreasonable 61 L.R.A. (N.S.) time." 3 Dill. Mun. Corp. 5th ed. § 1168.

Plaintiff was not engaged in an unlawful act at the time she fell, because she had no knowledge of the existence of the quarantine or of the obstruction to the walk. If the barrier had been seen, or had it been effective and sufficient, the accident could not have happened as she testifies.

There is no doubt that the original obstruction of the street by the ropes was authorized, and not unlawful; but it is equally free from doubt that the city had a continuing duty to protect travelers upon the walk from hidden obstructions, if such existed, by means of a light or other warning. The liability of the city, if any, is not by reason of the placing of the ropes, but it is by reason of its negligence in failing to warn pedestrians of the dangerous situation created by the sagging rope. Nothing that is said here is to be taken as expressing any opinion upon the facts in the case, but only upon the legal questions presented. We think the questions whether the city had or was charged with notice of the defect in the barrier, and whether it was negligent with respect to the care of its sidewalk, together with all the other issues in the case, should have been submitted to the jury under proper instructions, and that it was erroneous to direct a verdict for the defendant.

The judgment of the District Court, therefore, is reversed, and the cause remanded for further proceedings.

v.

CITY OF NEW ORLEANS, Appt.

(— La. —, 64 So. 286.)

Highway — defect — liability of municipality.

1. Section 14 of act No. 45 of 1896 requires the city of New Orleans "to keep open and free from obstructions all streets." The right of the citizen to recover damages for injuries sustained by reason of the failure of a municipal corporation to discharge the mandatory duty thus imposed is beyond question.

Municipal corporation — lighting obstruction in street.

2. The ordinances of the city of New Orleans require excavations and obstructions in public streets to be indicated by red lights during the night, in order to prevent accidents liable to otherwise happen.

Highway — rope in street — notice.

3. The stretching of wire ropes along a public thoroughfare a few feet above the level of the pavement creates, especially at night, a dangerous obstruction, of which the public should have timely notice and warning by proper danger signals.

Same — use by pedestrian.

4. A citizen has the right to assume that the street is in a reasonably safe condition for travel, and is not, as a matter of law, guilty of negligence in attempting to run across the street in the usual manner in order to catch a car.

Same — injury — liability of municipality.

5. The city of New Orleans is responsible in damages for the death of a citizen who, at night, without notice or knowledge of the existence of the obstruction, ran against a wire rope placed in the street by direction of the municipal authorities, and was thereby mortally injured.

Trial — negligence — question for jury.

6. In such a case, the question of contributory negligence on the part of the deceased is one peculiarly within the province of the jury.

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Civil District Court for the Parish of Orleans in plaintiffs' favor in an action brought to recover damages for the alleged negligent death of their intestate. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. John J. Reilley and I. D. Moore, for appellant:

If the contention of plaintiff is correct, that the officials of the city acted beyond their powers in causing to be erected wire ropes along the principal streets of the city during the carnival season, then and in that event the municipality cannot be held in damages for the torts of any of its officers in the prosecution of said work.

M. on February 12, 1912, left his place of business near the corner of Carondelet and Canal streets, and, while hurrying to catch a car, ran against a small wire rope which had been strung on posts along the outer edge of the sidewalk in Canal street, at the instance of the municipal authorities of the city of New Orleans.

The wire rope was stretched several feet above the level of the sidewalk. Martin fell over the rope, and struck the pavement with such force as to cause a dislocation of the bones of his neck. Martin expired in a taxicab while on his way to his home.

Martin's widow and minor children instituted this suit to recover damages in the amount of $25,000.

Petitioners represent that the wire rope was intended to keep back crowds of persons while the carnival processions were passing along Canal street; that the city was grossly negligent in erecting said barrier four days before any of the expected parades; that the said rope was made of galvanized wire of neutral tint, difficult to see by day, and impossible to see in the dusk or at night; that obstructions of streets are prohibited by city ordinance, unless distinctly marked so as to indicate danger; that the obstruction in question could have been made distinguishable by placing on it cloths of bright color, which was done later in the same week; and that neither the city council nor any of its officers or agents had the power to obstruct said street.

The defendant, after pleading the general issue, specially averred as follows: "Respondent avers that in the exercise of its police power it did cause to be constructed a wire rope along the principal streets of the city of New Orleans on or about the 12th day of February, 1912; that the stretching of this wire rope during the Mardi Gras season was in the interest of the general public, in which the city of New Orleans had no pecuniary interest, and, instead of being a negligent act, the officials of the city of New Orleans had every reason to believe it was a wise and prudent forethought to protect the general public and preserve the order and discipline of the Mardi Gras parades." "Respondent further shows that, being an old resident of the city, the decedent should have anticipated meeting with the temporary obstruction in question, and that his failure, at the time, to exercise care and attention contributed to the accident, and bars his right to recover."

The case was tried before a jury, which found a verdict for $10,000 in favor of the plaintiffs. The defendant filed a motion for a new trial, which was overruled, and judgment was rendered pursuant to the verdict. The defendant has appealed; and the plaintiffs have answered, praying for an increase in the amount awarded by the verdict and judgment.

It was admitted that the diameter of the wire rope was $\frac{1}{4}$ of an inch, and that it was placed 41 inches above the sidewalk, and was made of galvanized steel wire of 51 L.R.A. (N.S.)

a grayish color. This wire was strung along the edges of the neutral ground in Canal street and along the edges of the sidewalks, for the purpose of keeping the street open for the usual parades during the Mardi Gras season. The street intersections were left open for the convenience of the public. This custom of wiring the streets commenced in the year 1906, and has continued down to the present time.

The mayor testified as follows:

Q. Why was it done?

A. Because there were a great many accidents. I have lived here all my life, and I was identified with it and had the experience to see that there were a great many accidents occurring every year. People were trampled upon by the horses prancing in the parade, and there was a demand that something be done to control the crowds that appeared on the principal streets. . . . Well, we found it was absolutely necessary to do it. The carnival is one of the institutions of the city of New Orleans. It had to be carried on with the least detriment to the people. You could not successfully, with the growing population of the city, and the tremendous crowds that come here every year, hope to carry out these parades without a roping of the streets. . . . The city is put to an expense of between $700 and $800 per year to do it, and it does not get anything out of it, except the protection of its citizens."

The mayor further testified that he had seen crowds checked and controlled by means of wire ropes in Washington, District of Columbia, and in the city of New York; and that this system in the city of New Orleans had caused no serious accident prior to the death of Martin, in 1912.

The city electrician testified that the wiring of the streets since 1905 has been done under his supervision; that the wiring in 1912 commenced on February 11th, and it was absolutely necessary to commence the work on that day in order to complete the wiring in time for the first parade on February 15th; and that it took about five days to wire the principal thoroughfares. The same witness testified that openings were left at all the street intersections, which are always well lighted at night.

Martin, on the evening in question, was seen by two of his witnesses standing in front of the cigar store corner of Carondelet and Canal streets, with an overcoat on his arm. Martin's intention was to take a Dauphine street car operating on the neutral ground in Canal street. The witnesses observed Martin start and run forward, as if to catch a car passing along the neutral ground. The witnesses did not see Martin strike the wire, but saw him prone on the pavement immediately beyond the wire. The circumstantial evidence shows that Martin ran against the wire with sufficient momentum to throw him over the obstruction and head foremost on the pavement. The coroner found on Martin's chest a bruised mark, some 4 or 5 inches long and half an inch or more wide, evidently caused by his impact with the wire. Martin was 39 years old, weighed about 200 pounds, and was in vigorous health at the time of the accident. The wire was placed on the edge of the sidewalk while Martin was engaged in his daily work in his place of business on Carondelet street very near its intersection with Canal. There is not a tittle of evidence to suggest that Martin had any knowledge of the wire obstruction in the latter street. He surely would not have run against the wire if he had received any notice of its existence. The late B. R. Forman, Esq., a distinguished member of the bar, testified that the wire even in daylight was difficult to perceive, and that he himself, on the day of the accident, had struck against the wire on three different occasions. The same witness further testified that his sight was good. It did not need the testimony of this witness to prove that it was far more difficult to see the wire at night.

Martin, if he had not been stopped by the wire obstruction, would have passed from the sidewalk to the intersection, a very short distance. In a similar case, this court held that a pedestrian is not confined to the regular crossing, but may use any part of the street, and may run to catch his car. Weber v. Union Development & Constr. Co. 118 La. 77, 42 So. 652, 12 Ann. Cas. 1012. A pedestrian has the right to assume that the street is reasonably safe for passage. Ibid.; McCormack v. Robin, 126 La. 598, 139 Am. St. Rep. 549, 52 So. 779. On the facts of the case, we would not be justified in setting aside the verdict on the issue of contributory negligence.

The remaining question is whether the defendant city was negligent in the premises. In McCormack v. Robin, supra, the court said: "The charter of the city of New Orleans requires it to 'keep open and free from obstruction all streets.' Act 45 of 1896, § 14. The right of the citizen to recover damages for injuries sustained by reason of the failure of a municipal corporation to discharge the mandatory duty thus imposed on it is beyond question." The court cited a number of text writers and of Louisiana cases to sustain the rule of law thus announced.

and corporations making excavations in the public thoroughfares, or depositing in any street or on any sidewalk heaps of brick, dirt, rubbish, or materials whatsoever, proceeding from the construction or demolishing of any building, or from any other cause whatsoever, to place a lamp with red light every night in the center of said excavation at every point of probable danger, and at the summit of said heap, which lamp must remain lighted during the night, so as to shed a sufficient light to make the encumbrance visible, in order to prevent accidents liable to otherwise happen. Flynn's Dig. art. 1439.

It is hardly necessary to cite authorities to show that the stretching of wires or ropes along or across public thoroughfares low enough to strike passing pedestrians or vehicles constitutes an unauthorized and dangerous obstruction to public travel. Cases similar to the one at bar have come before courts of other jurisdictions. In Arthur v. Charleston, 51 W. Va. 132, 41 S. E. 171, the supreme court of West Virginia held that the defendant was liable in damages for an injury to the plaintiff because of his having been tripped up by a rope stretched across the pavement of a street and fastened to a pole for the purpose of holding a wharf boat during a flood in the Kanawha river. The court held that the officials of the city were negligent in not barricading the street, or marking the obstruction in such manner as would have warned the public of the situation, and said: "The negligence of the officials was not in allowing the rope to be placed there, but in permitting it to remain without proper warning to or protection of the traveling public. . . . The city has the right temporarily to allow obstructions on the streets and sidewalks for any lawful purpose; but while they remain there the traveling public should have notice and warning thereof."

In the case of Kleopfert v. Minneapolis, 90 Minn. 158, 95 N. W. 908, 14 Am. Neg. Rep. 381, and 93 Minn. 118, 100 N. W. 669, 16 Am. Neg. Rep. 456, the court held that the defendant was liable for the negligent acts of a servant of the board of park commissioners in stretching a rope across a boulevard, whereby a bicycle rider, in attempting to avoid the same, collided with a team and was injured.

In Baltimore v. O'Donnell, 53 Md. 110, 36 Am. Rep. 395, the syllabus reads as follows: "A city employed an individual upon contract to repair one of its streets. The contractor's servants stretched a rope across the street and hung a lighted lantern upon the rope at night. The lantern was broken and extinguished by boys. The plaintiff, in driving a hack at night, came in contact with the rope and was injured. The city authorities and the contractor had no notice of the rope. Held, that the plaintiff could recover against the city." We make the following extract from the text of the opinion: "The court properly instructed the jury . . . that it was the duty of the defendant to take proper precaution, by proper guards, signals, lights, or other warnings, to warn persons of the impassable condition of the street, so as to prevent injuries to persons passing along said street, and if the jury further find that the defendant, and those employed by it in repairing and recurring said street, did not use ordinary care in providing such precautions, and that the plaintiff, in consequence of such neglect to provide such precautions, was thrown from his hack while driving with ordinary care along said street, then the plaintiff is entitled to recover."

The case of Wheeler v. Ft. Dodge, 131 Iowa, 566, 9 L.R.A.(N.S.) 146, 108 N. W. 1057, contains a valuable citation of authorities on the subject-matter of obstructions in public streets, and the liability of municipalities for permitting their existence. In that case the defendant, on the occasion of a Fourth of July celebration, permitted the erection of a wire over a street for the purposes of a tight-rope performance. The exhibitor fell and injured the plaintiff, and the city was held liable in damages. The court, inter alia, said: "The fact that the wire in most of its course passed through the air above the heads of the people using the walks and carriage way below does not remove its character as an obstruction of the street. The public right goes to the full width of the street, and extends indefinitely upward and downward so far at least as to prohibit encroachment upon said limits by any person by any means by which the enjoyment of said public right is or may be in any manner hindered or obstructed or made inconvenient or dangerous."

Counsel for the defendant cites the case of Simon v. Atlanta, 87 Ga. 618, 44 Am. Rep. 739, as holding that, as stated in the syllabus, to temporarily obstruct passage by stretching ropes across a street during a parade or practice of the fire department does not furnish any ground for damages against a city. The syllabus is too broad. The facts were that a rope was stretched sufficiently above the pavement as not to interfere with the free use of the street, and that from some cause, not traceable to the municipal authorities or the fire department, the rope fell upon and injured the plaintiff.

In the case at bar, the municipal authorities obstructed the street by wire ropes stretched a few feet above the pavement. The placing of these ropes commenced on the fifth day before the date of the first Mardi Gras procession, and no precautions were taken to warn the public of the existence of these obstructions. These ropes were so small that it was very difficult for ordinary persons to perceive them at night, even in a well-lighted thoroughfare. Martin evidently did not see them, and, assuming that the street was safe, rushed to his death. Having created this obstruction in a public street, it was the plain duty of the municipal authorities to have warned the traveling public of its existence by lights or other proper signals.

As to the quantum of damages, we see no good reason to disturb the verdict.

It is therefore ordered that the judgment below be affirmed, and that defendant and appellant pay costs of appeal.

Goss, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

One Frank Henderson has petitioned this court for a writ of habeas corpus. As grounds for the writ, proof by affidavits has been submitted, establishing: That from August 1st to December 25th last Henderson was a resident of Richland county in this state, and an employee of the Fairmount & Veblen Railway Company, a corporation. That on December 10th a criminal complaint charging embezzlement, a felony, was laid before a magistrate of said county, charging Henderson with the commission of said crime, upon which a warrant for his arrest was duly issued. He was arrested thereon, and pending examination was held in $4,500 bail, which he furnished. That on December 25th Henderson changed his residence to Minneapolis, Minnesota. This is proven by his own affidavit and those of residents of Minneapolis. That on said date he rented apartments in that city, to which he has moved his personal belongings, and where he has taken up his abode, and at which place he claims to be actually residing. Although the opponents to the granting of this writ claim this residence to be merely colorable, and for the purpose of gaining some temporary advantage in these legal proceedings, and have offered affidavits tending in part to contradict the defendant's statements as to residence, and to impeach his good faith, we find in favor of the petitioner on this question of fact under proof and presumptions of law thereto applying, and find that on December 25th last the petitioner did change his residence from North Dakota to Minneapolis, Minnesota, and that on the date of this petition he was and now is a bona fide resident of Minnesota. Petitioner has returned from Minnesota without extradition for the sole purpose of defending the criminal charge of embezzlement so pending against him in the courts of this state since December 10, 1913, at all times until January 17, 1914, on which last date, after a preliminary examination lasting over two weeks, defendant was held for trial before the district court upon a charge of felony, which trial, according to the showing made, will probably take place at the coming term of district court to be held in June of this year. In holding defendant for trial, the examining court has found the existence of probable cause to believe that felony has been committed, and that the defendant is guilty thereof. He was so held in $4,500 bail pending trial, and has furnished a cash deposit in lieu of and as a bond in said amount for his appearance to answer said charge at the next term of the district court for Richland county.

And in Rogers v. Rogers, 138 Ga. 803, 76 S. E. 48, while defendant was not in the state pursuant to the condition of a bail bond, he was there voluntarily, to defend a criminal action for abandonment of his children, and it was held that he was not exempt from service of civil process in a suit for divorce and alimony, the court saying that the exemption from service of process extended only to witnesses, and therefore not to a defendant in a criminal case, inasmuch as he cannot be a witness in his own case, under the laws of the state.

After issuance of an order discharging him on bail approved, and about one minute after his release on bail, and while he was still in the courtroom of the magistrate taking bail, he was served with a summons, complaint, and order for arrest on bail and arrest proceedings in an action wherein the corporation procuring his arrest for embezzlement is plaintiff, and the petitioner is defendant. The order upon arrest and bail issued out of the district court of Richland county, directing that this petitioner be held in custody until he shall give bail on said order in the sum of $5,000, as provided by law. The proceedings upon bail and arrest are in proper form, and the order of arrest and bail issuable in such an action. Petitioner is imprisoned in default of bail. Without moving to vacate the service or the proceedings, he made application to the district judge of the district in which he was confined for the issuance of a writ of habeas corpus, which was denied after full hearing on the merits. He here contends to be illegally restrained of his liberty, alleging that, as a citizen of Minnesota, he is privileged from arrest in attending upon trial of the criminal action against him pending in the courts of this state, and not subject to interference by arrest upon mesne process during the time of his attendance and until a reasonable time afforded him to return to Minnesota. This is the issue presented. 51 L.R.A. (N.S.)

We have no statute bearing upon or controlling this situation. Had petitioner been in attendance as a witness or suitor in the civil courts of this state, as a citizen of Minnesota or any foreign state, he would be privileged, and therefore exempt upon his claim of privilege from legal service in a civil suit (Hicks v. Besuchet, 7 N. D. 429-435, 66 Am. St. Rep. 665, 75 N. W. 793), or from arrest in arrest and bail proceedings, which are merely ancillary to the civil action of which the arrest and bail is but an incident. Of the existence of this general privilege there is no question. Under the common law, to avail, such privilege must be claimed.

But petitioner is before us in a case in which the reasons for this common-law privilege so applying in civil cases are entirely absent. As a suitor or witness in a civil case he could not be compelled to attend or to submit himself to the jurisdiction of our courts. And his entering the state must be voluntary, either to aid others by voluntarily appearing or testifying in their behalf, or to defend his own interests, and voluntarily submit his cause to our courts for arbitrament. In either case the common law, on grounds of public policy, has privileged him from harassment of civil proceedings, the interests of justice and public policy demanding it, and has thus encouraged the voluntary appearance of the nonresident who is under no compulsion to appear, to disclose, or to litigate in a civil case in our courts. In either or any event he is voluntarily aiding in the administration of justice. But where the party served has been brought under extradition proceedings, or by force of criminal process, from the foreign state into ours, to here answer for crime committed within our boundaries, if at all, the defendant is not voluntarily here. He has no choice in the matter. He is rendering organized society no service. Instead, he is here charged with being a menace to it. While presumed innocent, he is not fulfilling any office of good citizenship nor voluntarily promoting justice. And except in sham criminal proceedings wherein the criminal process is made a mere pretense upon which to perpetrate a fraud upon a defendant by procuring his involuntary attendance, not with the bona fide intent of his being criminally prosecuted, but instead to secure service of a summons or process in a civil suit upon him, the criminal proceedings being but an instrument used for the collection of a debt, the reasons upon which the common-law exemption is given to a civil suitor or witness are mostly, if not altogether, absent. The question before us is whether such privilege accorded the civil suitor or witness shall be extended, regardless of nonexistence of reason, to cover the case of this petitioner, who, when served, was here as a criminal defendant, and as such, on principle, should have no privilege.

Such proceedings are often discussed in connection with the law applying to extradition. This petitioner is to be treated in all respects as though he had been extradited, and the fact that he is here without having been extradited is no circumstance against him. Assuming that he had been extradited, instead of appearing voluntarily to protect his bail, he could have been prosecuted for any criminal offense other and wholly independent of the alleged crime on which he was extradited, provided that such extradition was from another state of this union, and not from a foreign country, in which latter case an immunity guaranteed by treaty would then be violated. Knox v. State, 164 Ind. 226, 108 Am. St. Rep. 291, 73 N. E. 255, 3 Ann. Cas. 539, and note. As between the states of this union there is no such immunity. Lascelles v. Georgia, 148 U. S. 537, 37 L. ed. 549, 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. 687, affirming 90 Ga. 347, 35 Am. St. Rep. 216, 16 S. E. 945. The object of our extradition laws, as between states, is not to afford any refugee or fugitive any personal privilege or immunity whatever; neither is it their intention nor purpose that any state shall, as to the extraditing state, be considered as an asylum for a fugitive from justice. Thus, theories of personal immunity or privilege because of this defendant's residence in another state, as appear in the reasoning of some courts as a foundation for so-called public policy invoked by petitioner, or wherein extradition between states is treated as analogous to extradition from a foreign country under treaty rights, should not on principle be considered. Such precedent, exaggerating the rights of a defendant in extradition, consistently announces generally a rule contrary to our conclusions on the merits. From a standpoint of number of cases alone, petitioner would be entitled to the writ prayed for; but the early precedent seems to have applied the common-law privilege of suitors and witnesses in civil cases indiscriminately to criminal defendants, without distinguishing or apparently observing the want of grounds therefor. There seems to be a well-marked tendency in those courts not irrevocably committed to the extension of said privilege to criminal defendants, to deny it as to them. What we believe to be the weight of recent authority is to that effect, and recognizes the want of reason for adherence to the early rule. When the reason for the rule fails, the rule itself should fall, is the statute of our state as well as the course dictated by common sense.

It may be urged that these proceedings in arrest and bail may interfere with the right of this defendant to make his defense in the criminal prosecution,—a plausible and for the moment appealing circumstance that admittedly may be the result. But had the defendant remained a resident of this state, as he concededly was at the time of any commission of this offense for which he is held for trial, he would have been subject to arrest and imprisonment on mesne civil process. On the contrary, had he then been a resident of Minnesota, and been extradited here, he would have been subject to prosecution for any criminal offense, and to which further criminal prosecutions might have been added, the result of which might have been to equally hamper him in his first defense. Such subsequent prosecution would have violated no rule of comity between states, as the state of Minnesota has no interest in shielding either a refugee from this state or one domiciled within its borders from amenability for crimes here committed. To recognize any such rule as contended for would be contrary to the whole theory of the extradition laws.

It has been argued that to permit these proceedings may cause the executive of a foreign state to deny extradition in meritorious cases. The granting of extradition is intrusted to the chief executive of the state. He may, and oftentimes does, assume the right he does not, under the spirit of the extradition laws, possess, to pass upon the real merit of the prosecution. He may assume a given case to be an abuse of process, and deny extradition,—the equivalent of holding that the courts of the extraditing state will permit an abuse of their process. Nor is it the duty of an executive to refuse rendition under extradition under a plea of protection of the property rights of the fugitive, as must be the case should such grounds be considered in passing upon requisition. Had this defendant been extradited, the foreign executive should not be concerned with whether the fugitive, if rendered on extradition, would thereafter be served with civil process, with perhaps bail and arrest proceedings as an incident thereto. The courts here are, as the courts there would be, amply able to see that fraudulent use is not made of criminal process to obtain extradition merely for the purpose of mulcting by subsequent civil proceedings the party so prosecuted. This duty is intrusted to the courts, and the rule is well established that in such cases of fraud the defendant will be regarded and his rights measured as though he had not come within the jurisdiction; the court not permitting its process to be used to perpetrate a fraud upon him in getting him here. This question has not been raised in this case except as it incidentally appears from the single fact that the corporation procuring his criminal prosecution is the plaintiff in the civil action. That such plaintiff made use of criminal process to obtain petitioner's presence here, that he might then be served with civil process, is wholly negatived by the fact that at the time of the laying of the criminal complaint, and for two weeks thereafter, including the time of his arrest, he was a resident and householder of Richland county, where he and his wife were residing. Had the corporation plaintiff desired to serve a civil process, it could have done so without employing the aid of any criminal prosecution. No principle of extradition is violated by a denial of privilege, available in civil proceedings, to petitioner here as a defendant in a criminal case.

Any extended quotation from the authorities is needless. We must choose between two opposing lines of authority. Our holding is in line with the following: Netograph Mfg. Co. v. Scrugham, 27 L.R.A. We are satisfied that the common-law privilege that would protect this petitioner from arrest under civil process, had he been attending the courts of this state as a witness in a civil or criminal case, or as a suitor in a civil suit, should have no application where he is here as a defendant in a criminal prosecution.

The writ is therefore denied.

NORTH CAROLINA SUPREME COURT.

STATE OF NORTH CAROLINA

v.

WILLIAM DARNELL, Appt.

(— N. C. —, 81 S. E. 338.)

Municipal corporation — authority to prevent members of different races from living on same street.

Charter and statutory authority to pass ordinances for the general welfare of the city, and such regulations for the better government of the town as the commissioners may deem necessary, does not include power to forbid members of either the white or colored race to live in any block where a majority of the residents are of the other race.

Clark, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

On July 5, 1912, the board of aldermen of Winston, North Carolina, adopted an ordinance which made it unlawful for any colored person to occupy as a residence any house upon any street or alley between two adjacent streets on which a greater number of houses were occupied as residences by white people than were occupied as residences by colored people. Another section of the ordinance made a similar restriction against white people occupying as residences houses on streets where there were more houses occupied by colored residents than by whites. In 1913 the defendant, William Darnell, a colored man, moved his family into a house on Highland avenue to occupy it as a residence. At that time in the other houses on that street and block there were more white families than colored. The defendant was tried in the municipal court for violating this ordinance, and, being found guilty, he was fined and appealed. In the superior court he was again found guilty and fined, and appealed to this court.

The only authority which the board of aldermen claim for the passage of this ordinance is § 44 of the city charter, which provides that the aldermen "may pass any ordinance which they may deem wise and proper for the good order, good government, or general welfare of the city, provided it does not contravene the laws and Constitution of the state." In 1 Dill. Mun. Corp. § 89, which is copied and approved in State v. Webber, 107 N. C. 962, 22 Am. St. Rep. 920, 12 S. E. 598, it is said: "It is a general and undisputed proposition of law that a municipal corporation possesses, and can exercise, the following powers, and no others: (1) Those granted in express words; (2) those necessarily or fairly implied; . . . (3) those essential to the declared objects and purposes of the corporation,—not simply convenient, but indispensable. Any fair, reasonable, substantial doubt concerning the existence of power is resolved by the courts against the corporation, and the power is denied." In State v. Thomas, 118 N. C. 1225, 24 S. E. 535, the court reiterated this doctrine, and quoted with approval 1 Dill. Mun. Corp. § 325, as follows: "An ordinance cannot legally be made which contravenes a common right, unless the power to do so be plainly conferred by a valid and competent legislative grant." In State v. Dannenberg, 150 N. C. 800, 63 S. E. 946, it was held:

"Municipal corporations can only exercise such police powers as are granted by their charters, and all fair and reasonable doubts as to whether such powers have been so conferred are resolved by the courts against their being exercised."

The brief for the state frankly says: "It is not claimed that the city of Winston had any express grant of power to pass a segregation ordinance. To uphold the validity of such an ordinance, therefore, it must be shown that the passage of it was a reasonable exercise of the police power." Revisal, 1923, is broader even than this provision of the charter, for it gives town commissioners "power to make ordinances, rules and regulations for the better government of the town not inconsistent with this chapter and the law of the land, as they may deem necessary," and to enforce them by suitable penalties. It is held under this last section that such ordinances and by-laws must be in harmony with the general laws of the state. Washington v. Hammond, 76 N. C. 33; State v. Langston, 88 N. C. 692; State v. Brittain, 89 N. C. 574, 4 Am. Crim. Rep. 458.

We do not think that the authority conferred by § 44 of the charter to enact ordinances for the "general welfare of the city" can justly be construed as intended by the legislature to authorize an ordinance of this kind which establishes a public policy which has hitherto been unknown in the legislation of our state. To do so would give to the words "general welfare" an extended and wholly unrestricted scope which we do not think the legislature could have contemplated in using those words. If the board of aldermen is thereby authorized to make this restriction, a bare majority of the board could, if they may "deem it wise and proper," require Republicans to live on certain streets, and Democrats on others, or that Protestants shall reside only in certain parts of the town, and Catholics in another, or that Germans or people of German descent should reside only where they were in the majority, and that Irish and those of Irish descent should dwell only in certain localities designated for them by the arbitrary judgment and permission of a majority of the aldermen. They could apply the restriction as well to business occupations as to residences, and could prescribe the localities allotted to each class of people without reference to whether the majority already therein is of the proscribed race, nationality, or political or religious faith.

Besides, an ordinance of this kind forbids the owner of property to sell or to lease it to whomsoever he sees fit, as well as forbids those who may be desirous of buying or renting property from doing so where they can make the best bargain. Yet this right of disposing of property, the jus disponendi, has always been held one of the inalienable rights incident to the ownership of property which no statute will be construed as having power to take away. In Bruce v. Strickland, 81 N. C. 267, it is said: "The jus disponendi is an important element of property, and a vested right protected by the clause in the Federal Constitution which declares the obligation of contracts inviolable." The same doctrine is fully held and discussed in Hughes v. Hodges, 102 N. C. 239, 9 S. E. 437, and in the numerous citations to those two cases, which will be found in the Anno. ed. This ordinance forbids a white man or a colored man to live in his own house if it should descend to him by inheritance, and should happen to be located on a street where the majority of the residents happen to be of such different race. There is no reason why the power of the county commissioners to provide for the public welfare should not be as broad as those of the town commissioners, and if, under such general authority, similar regulations are prescribed for the country districts, one who should buy or inherit property in a section where the opposite race is in the majority could not reside on his own property, and he could not sell it or rent it out except to persons of such different race, since none other could reside there. Neither a white manager nor any white tenants could reside on a farm where a majority of the tenants or hands are colored.

In Ireland there were years ago limits prescribed beyond which the native Irish or Celtic population could not reside. This was called the "Irish Pale," and one of the results was continued disorder and unrest in that unhappy island, which had as one of its consequences that more than half its population came to this country. That policy has since been reversed. But in Russia, to this day, there are certain districts to which the Jews are restricted, with the result that vast numbers of them are emigrating to this country. We can hardly believe that the legislature, by the ordinary words in a charter authorizing the aldermen to "provide for the public welfare," intended to initiate so revolutionary a public policy. Had this been intended, there would certainly have been a thorough discussion and a full consideration by the general assembly of the question whether, under the Constitution of the United States and of this state, the legislature could establish a policy which would deny to the owners of lands, either in the country or town, the right to dispose of them by sale or renting to whomsoever they saw fit as of ancient right they had been long accustomed to do, or to restrict any class of citizens from buying or renting where they wished.

Indeed, so far as the declaration of a public policy is concerned, when a few years ago labor agents began carrying out of the state the colored laborers on whom many farmers depended for the cultivation of their crops, which alone maintained the value of their lands, the legislature promptly passed chapter 75, Laws 1891, which made it indictable to exercise such vocation without having first paid a license fee of $1,000. When that act was held invalid in State v. Moore, 113 N. C. 697, 22 L.R.A. 472, 18 S. E. 342, the legislature promptly passed another, chapter 9, § 84, Laws 1901, prescribing a smaller license fee, but making it indictable to act as agent to procure laborers for another state without obtaining such license. This was upheld in State v. Hunt, 129 N. C. 686, 85 Am. St. Rep. 758, 40 S. E. 216, as was also a like act to the same purport (Laws 1903, chap. 247, § 74) in Carr v. Duplin County, 136 N. C. 125, 48 S. E. 597.

Judging by the experience of the "Irish Pale" and of the similar restrictions upon the Jews in Russia, the result of this policy might well be a large exodus, and naturally of the most enterprising and thrifty element of the colored race, leaving the unthrifty and less desirable element in this state on the taxpayers. Such a result would be contrary to the above-cited statutes, by which the legislature indicated a public policy of retaining the colored laborers in this state. The initiation by this ordinance of a public policy so little in accord with the above legislation cannot reasonably be inferred from the general expression in the charter relied upon.

There is a wide distinction between suffrage, which is not an inherent right, but which is conferred by constitutional prescription, and which is usually extended from time to time, and the inalienable right to own, acquire, and dispose of property, which is not conferred by the Constitution, but exists of natural right. There is no question that legislation can control social rights by forbidding intermarriage of the races, and in requiring Jim Crow cars, and in similar matters. It was also held in Mugler v. Kansas, 123 U. S. 623, 31 L. ed. 205, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 273, that, as the state had the right to regulate or forbid the sale of liquor, that one who had devoted his property to such purpose could not object that he is forbidden longer to so use it; but none of these interfere with the fundamental right of everyone to acquire and dispose of property by sale. The right to devise is statutory, and therefore can be modified. Re Garland, 160 N. C. 555, 76 S. E. 486. Whether, if the general assembly had passed a statute conferring on town or county commissioners the authority to make such an ordinance as this, it would have been constitutional, is not now before us. We simply hold that an act of this broad scope so entirely without precedent in the public policy of the state, and so revolutionary in its nature, cannot be deemed to have been within the purview of the legislature from the use of the words conferring authority to make ordinances for the general welfare.

There was a similar restriction of the Jews to certain quarters of the towns in the middle ages, and the quarters assigned them were called "ghettoes." If the intention of the legislature had been to establish such policy as to the colored people, either in our towns or country districts, there would certainly have been some provision prescribing the methods to be used in selecting these districts. The selection would not have been left to the arbitrary and irreviewable power of the majority of the board elected without any reference to this matter. A man whose property might be made unsalable or reduced in value by forbidding him to sell or rent it to a white man because the majority of the houses in such district were occupied by negroes certainly should have some compensation from the public for his loss. The same would be true of property just across the street from one of these ghettoes which might be established to the depreciation of his property. Then, too, both in town and country the owners of property who might be deprived of the opportunity of renting it to laboring people of color, because the majority in that section or block were white people, who did not wish to rent or buy, might make an objection to the demarkation adopted. Then, too, the designation of these localities surely would not be left to a majority of the aldermen or the county commissioners, without some right to have the facts found by a jury, and a review of the proceedings by a court of justice.

The absence of such provisions is further evidence that the general assembly did not intend to confer so broad and arbitrary a power upon the aldermen of Winston.

We therefore hold that the ordinance was adopted without authority of law, and the indictment should have been quashed.

Action dismissed.

ERROR to the District Court for Jackson County to review a judgment in de-

Headnotes by WILLIAMS, J.

Note. — Right of taxpayer to enjoin removal of teacher.

It has been held that liability to pay taxes is sufficient interest to enable a taxpayer to sue to enjoin illegal expenditure of public funds. 22 Cyc. 910. Only two cases, however, beside GREER v. AUSTIN, have been found discussing the question as to the right of a taxpayer to enjoin removal of a teacher. Both are in accordance with the ruling in GREER v. AUSTIN.

Thus, where a school board had decided to drop a teacher because of the unduly severe chastisement of a pupil, the right of taxpayers to enjoin the discharge of a teacher was denied in School Dist. v. Carson, 9 Colo. App. 6, 46 Pac. 846. The court said: "If the teacher was employed and under contract to teach a given length of time, and he was arbitrarily discharged without sufficient cause, he had an adequate and speedy remedy at law for the violation of the contract. By statute the board of school directors are empowered to employ, and, for cause, discharge, teachers. If they abuse the discretion vested in them, and discharge without cause, they are liable in damages. . . . As a taxpayer and patron of the school, all that the complainant could require was that the school should be open, under the charge of proper, competent, and qualified instructors, as provided by law, and that his children should be allowed to attend and afforded equal educational facilities with the balance. He had no authority in law or equity to compel the employment and retention of a particular teacher. If such rights were recognized and exercised in different directions by different taxpayers and patrons, the conduct of schools would be impossible. An- 51 L.R.A.(N.S.) defendants' favor in an action brought to enjoin them from discharging the plaintiff teacher from a public school. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Lawson & Dabney for plaintiffs in error.

Mr. W. T. McConnell for defendants in error.

Williams, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The only question essential for determination under this record is as to whether the powers of equity may be invoked to enjoin the officers of a school district from discharging a person employed by said officials under a valid contract to teach a school for said district for a definite term. It has been settled in this jurisdiction that a taxpayer, without showing a special private interest, may maintain an action to prevent an illegal disposition of money of a municipality or school district, or the illegal creation of a debt which he, with other property owners and taxpayers in such municipality or district, may be compelled to other teacher was immediately substituted by the board, and there was no charge that she was not properly qualified and eminently fitted for the position, and that the child of complainant was not receiving all the benefits and rights to which it was entitled."

An almost exact parallel case is Schwier v. Zitike, 136 Ind. 210, 36 N. E. 30, where the right of taxpayers to enjoin the discharge of a public school teacher was also denied. In this school trustees employed one J. as principal to teach in room No. 1 for the school year 1893, commencing on the 4th day of September of that year. On the 2d day of September, they employed one B. as principal, putting him in charge of room No. 1, and at the time of the commencement of this action he was in charge of that room, teaching therein, and excluding J. therefrom. The court said: "If Jackson, with whom the board made a contract, could not enjoin such board from dismissing him and employing another in his stead to teach the schools in the town of Batesville, it is difficult, if not impossible, to perceive how these appellants can perform that feat for him. To permit them to do so would be to permit that to be done by indirection which could not be done directly. It is now so well settled that a person cannot be enjoined from violating a contract for personal services when such contract contains no negative stipulations, that it seems not to be an open question. . . . On the other hand, we think it is equally well settled that the employer cannot be enjoined from a violation of such a contract by discharging the employee."

Generally, as to right of taxpayer, in absence of statute, to enjoin unlawful expenditures by municipality, see note to Pierce v. Hagans, 36 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1, J. D. C.

pay. It is a general rule that for wrongs against the public, whether actually committed or only apprehended, the remedy, whether civil or criminal, is by a prosecution instituted by the state in its political character, or by some officer authorized by law to act in its behalf, or by some of those local agencies created by the state for the management of such of the local affairs of the community as may be intrusted to them by law. The individual citizen does not in his own name interfere in behalf of the interest of society, but society acts through and by its properly constituted agencies. Kellogg v. School Dist. 13 Okla. 285, 74 Pac. 110, and authorities therein cited; Marlow v. School Dist. 29 Okla. 304, 110 Pac. 797, and authorities therein cited. In Thompson v. Haskell, 24 Okla. 70, 102 Pac. 700, it is said: "The case of Kellogg v. School Dist. supra, does not appear to go to the extent of permitting private individuals to restrain public officers to correct purely public wrongs, but to restrict the right of a private individual to that class of cases which involve the creation of debts illegally against, or the wrongful expenditure of moneys of, the taxpayers." The question involved in that case was as to the creation of or addition to or subtraction from political subdivisions of a county, and involved political acts. The question here, so far as the action is brought on the part of the taxpayers, is a public act involving the discharge of a teacher of a public school.

The teacher is also joined in this action. The question as to misjoinder of parties does not seem to be urged, but the joining of him in this action does not add merit to the case, for if his discharge is wrongful, he has his action at law to sue for the recovery of his salary or for damages on account of the breach of contract. School Dist. v. Ward, — Okla. —, 136 Pac. 588.

The action of the lower court is affirmed.

A blunted or rounded spike is as easy to see and understand as a dull axe, or dull hoe, or dull hand tool of any kind, and is very much more obvious, and the danger of using it more apparent, than various other defects in ladders, on account of which the courts have held injured employees could not recover.

Williams, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This suit was brought by Harry Sivley to recover damages for personal injuries, and is based upon alleged negligence of the employer company in furnishing him for use, in reaching to oil the overhead shafts and pulleys in the company's plant, a ladder about 18 feet in length, the lower end —an auger bit, the cutting points of which had become dull and blunt from use and frequent sharpening. St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. v. Mayne, 36 Okla. 48, 42 L.R.A.(N.S.) 645, 127 Pac. 474;

—a ladder used in painting houses. Philip Carey Roofing & Mfg. Co. v. Black, — Tenn. —, post, 340, 164 S. W. 1183. But in the latter case it was held that, while the ladder was a simple tool, nevertheless, where the master had notice of the defect, and directed that the ladder be used, he could not escape liability on that ground when the defect was not known to the servant, and was of such nature that it would not ordinarily be discovered by such observation as would naturally accompany its use. However, a mere direction by the employer to the employee to go ahead and use a ladder, in response to a request for someone to hold it, is not sufficient to render the master liable for an injury resulting from a defect which was not known to the employee. SIVLEY v. NIXON MIN. DRILL CO.

In Cooper v. Fleischman, 85 Misc. 1, 147 N. Y. Supp. 65, it was held that while a ladder is an instrumentality of such an ordinary nature that an employee would ordinarily recognize a defect as well as the employer, yet, where he brought the defect to the attention of the employer, who assumed to repair it, and did so in such a manner that the defect was hidden, but not of which ladder was equipped with metal spikes or brads (fixed in the upright posts to prevent the ladder from sliding) which had worn blunt and become defective.

The proof shows that plaintiff was, at the time of the accident, caused by the ladder slipping from its footing on an oily floor, between nineteen and twenty years of age, and that he had been engaged in the particular service from six to eight weeks, making use of this ladder to reach the shafting about twice a week. He testifies that he had not been notified as to and did not know the condition of the spikes; that he had had previous experience in factory work, and in the use of ladders, but not around shafts.

The trial judge, on motion of the company, directed a verdict in favor of the company. On appeal the court of civil appeals held this to be error, reversing the cause, and the defendant has brought the case here for review on writ of certiorari.

It has been ruled by courts, quite without exception, that an ordinary ladder falls within the class of simple tools in respect remedied, the employer would be liable for injury resulting from its use thereafter.

And ladders used solely as the equivalent of stairs do not come under the rule. O'Brien v. Northwestern Consol. Mill Co. 119 Minn. 4, 137 N. W. 399; Pendegrass v. St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. — Mo. App. —, 162 S. W. 712; Thompson-Starrett Co. v. Wilson, 39 App. D. C. 211.

Likewise, in Richter v. Tegtmeier, 167 Ill. App. 478, the simple-tool rule was held not to apply when plaintiff slipped on blocks allowed to accumulate on the floor where he was carrying lumber near revolving saws.

And it was held in the following cases that the simple-tool rule was not applicable to:

—a huge pair of metal tongs attached by a chain to a crane, used to lift hot metal ingots, and requiring the services of a blacksmith to keep them sharp and in repair. Colorado Fuel & Iron Co. v. Gardner, 21 Colo. App. 273, 121 Pac. 680;

—a pin maul having an inherent defect, easily discoverable by the master, but not by plaintiff. Crader v. St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. — Mo. App. —, 164 S. W. 678;

—a hammer in the hands of a fellow servant. Pushcart v. New York Shipbuilding Co. 81 N. J. L. 261, 81 Atl. 113;

—a stool used by clerks to stand upon in reaching articles on shelves, the top of which became loosened from the legs,—a defect not easily observable. Stimson v. Whitmore, 34 R. I. 581, 85 Atl. 113;

—a defectively tempered pick being used so that it necessarily struck railroad rails occasionally. Freeman v. Wilson, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 140 S. W. 413; of a defect in which the employer is held not liable, on the ground that a defect in such a simple tool must be obvious to its user, by whom any risk of danger therefrom must be held to be assumed. Cahill v. Hilton, 106 N. Y. 512, 13 N. E. 339; Marsh v. Chickering, 101 N. Y. 396, 5 N. E. 56; Blundell v. Wm. A. Miller Elevator Mfg. Co. 189 Mo. 552, 88 S. W. 103; Jenny Electric Light & P. Co. v. Murphy, 115 Ind. 566, 18 N. E. 30; Meador v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. 138 Ind. 290, 46 Am. St. Rep. 384, 37 N. E. 721; McDonald v. Lovell, 196 Mass. 583, 82 N. E. 955; Labatt, Mast. & S. § 924 (a).

The plaintiff's insistence is, however, that the fact that the ladder in this case had been equipped with metal brads or spikes at the bottom takes it out of the operation of the rule applicable to simple tools.

In Dessecker v. Phoenix Mills Co. 98 Minn. 439, 108 N. W. 516, the facts were that a ladder had been equipped with iron brads at the bottom, one of which had in some way become detached; and when the ladder was placed by an employee on an oily —a hand car used to transport a track crew from place to place. Rosellini v. Salsich Lumber Co. 71 Wash. 208, 128 Pac. 213.

In Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. v. Smith, 107 Ark. 512, 156 S. W. 166, the court sustained a verdict for plaintiff, a car repairer's helper, who was injured by a sledge hammer in the hands of a car repairer, due to a defect in the striking face of the hammer, the court saying: "There is no hard and fast rule that may be laid down as governing the liability of an employer for a defect in common tools. In view of this condition, we do not undertake to say what state of facts the rule of liability should embrace and what state of facts it should not. We deem it sufficient to say that, while the question of liability of the defendant in the case at bar is an exceedingly close one, yet, under all the circumstances adduced in evidence, it was a question of fact for the jury, and not one of law for the court."

In Herrick v. Chicago & E. I. R. Co. 257 Ill. 264, 100 N. E. 897, the simple-tool rule was held not to apply, so as to require a nonsuit in an action by a blacksmith's helper who was injured by a chip from a set-hammer which had been repaired by the blacksmith, the helper not having sufficient knowledge to determine whether the hammer had been properly repaired.

And in Ruck v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 153 Wis. 158, 140 N. W. 1074, it was held that while a punch having a handle like a hammer, and used to remove rivets by striking it with a heavy sledge, was simple in form, it was not simple with reference to its resisting qualities, or with reference to using it after the end became battered or burred, floor it slipped, causing plaintiff to fall. The court said: "A ladder of the character of this one is not a complicated instrumentality, nor were there any latent defects in the construction of the one in question. It is a simple appliance, to which the rule requiring the master to inspect for the purpose of discovering possible defects caused by its use does not ordinarily apply. . . . The least effort on his [employee's] part would have disclosed the defect, and we conclude that, on the evidence presented, the question whether defendant was chargeable with negligence was one of law for the trial court, and that it properly resolved it in favor of defendant."

Another phase (and the one here appearing) was presented in Sheridan v. Gorham Mfg. Co. 28 R. I. 256, 13 L.R.A.(N.S.) 687, 66 Atl. 576. A ladder was equipped with brads at its lower end, which brads had become dull and smooth, so that the ladder, when in use, was likely to slip on the floor. While plaintiff was standing on one of its rounds, the ladder slipped, and caused plaintiff to fall to the floor. It was held that the employee was chargeable, equally with the employer, with knowledge of the obvious imperfection of the ladder.

The court of civil appeals held that "the record tends to show that this was not an ordinary ladder. The spikes were located in the bottom of the upright pieces, and were not so obvious and patent as to be discernible by a casual observation,"—and therefore refused to class the ladder as a simple tool. This ruling was in opposition to the authorities in point, and erroneous.

It is difficult to see how the brads or spikes had the effect to remove what would otherwise be a simple tool into a class with more complicated instrumentalities, and equally as difficult to distinguish between the dulling or rounding of the points of the metal brads, and a wearing, due to use, of the lower ends of wooden upright pieces of a ladder not equipped with brads. Jenney Electric Light & P. Co. v. Murphy, 115 Ind. 566, 18 N. E. 30. The placing of the brads tended to render safer the simple instrumentality, and to hold that that act changed the rule otherwise applicable would be to discourage employers in making such provisions.

The plaintiff relies on the case of Ritt v. True Tag Paint Co. 108 Tenn. 646, 652, 69 S. W. 324, 325, which dealt with a defective ladder; but the case is not in point. There it was ruled: "The plaintiff cannot be held to have been negligent, since the proof is that the ladder had been repaired, and was apparently safe." The repairs "apparently rendered the ladder safe, and this misled plaintiff," who, while on the ladder, was 51 L.R.A.(N.S.) caused to fall by the breaking of a step or round where it had been repaired. The Ritt case, when the real point in decision is regarded, is sound and in harmony with Jones v. Pacific Mills, 176 Mass. 354, 57 N. E. 663, 8 Am. Neg. Rep. 63, and neither is in conflict with the Massachusetts case of McDonald v. Lovell, 196 Mass. 583, 82 N. E. 955, or with what is here ruled.

It appeared in plaintiff's proof that, before he ascended the ladder, plaintiff requested his foreman to have someone hold the ladder while he went up, but was told by the foreman to go ahead and use the ladder; that it had been in use for three years and had never fallen with anyone. In several of the cases cited above the rule is further declared to be, in respect of simple tools, that, since it does not rest with the employee to say that his employer has superior knowledge, the fact that the former notified the employer of its defective condition, and made use of the ladder under order of the employer, does not make a case of liability. Meador v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. 138 Ind. 290, 46 Am. St. Rep. 384, 37 N. E. 721, citing Marsh v. Chickering, 101 N. Y. 396, 5 N. E. 56, and Jenney Electric Light & P. Co. v. Murphy. And see Brewer v. Tennessee Coal, Iron & R. Co. 97 Tenn. 615, 37 S. W. 549; Brouseau v. Kellogg Switchboard & Supply Co. 27 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1052, and note (158 Mich. 312, 122 N. W. 620).

It is not necessary for us to determine that point, since it does not appear that plaintiff, Sivley, complained or gave notice of any defect. In fact, his testimony was to the effect that he was not aware of the existence of any defect; nor, on the proof, was there any order of the superior of plaintiff, given to plaintiff, which was predicated upon such a condition of the instrumentality, or upon any inspection, given in response to the plaintiff's request, or otherwise, at the time, upon which the plaintiff could have relied.

The Court of Civil Appeals erred in reversing the Circuit Court in respect of peremptory instructions. Reversed, with judgment here in accord.

TENNESSEE SUPREME COURT.

PHILIP CAREY ROOFING & MANUFACTURING COMPANY, Plff. in Certiorari,

v.

JOHN Q. BLACK.

(— Tenn. —, 164 S. W. 1183.)

Master and servant — simple tool — effect of superintendent's direction to use.

1. A master cannot avoid liability to an employee through a defect in a ladder, on the theory that it was a simple tool, if his superintendent, upon being notified of the defect, insisted that the ladder was safe, and required it to be used, and the injured employee was in fact ignorant of the defect, which was not readily discoverable.

Same — negligence of servant — manner of descending ladder.

2. The court cannot declare an employee negligent as matter of law in descending a ladder face foremost, so as to relieve the master from liability for injury by a fall through the breaking of a round of the ladder.

Appeal — insufficient instructions — reversible error.

3. A judgment for plaintiff in a negligence case will be reversed if defendant's theory of the case was not fairly presented to the jury in the instructions, which were insufficient in stating the rules of law applicable to the case.

(March 14, 1914.)

CERTIORARI to the Court of Civil Appeals to review a judgment affirming a judgment of the Circuit Court for Davidson County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries for which defendant was alleged to be responsible. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Larkin E. Crouch and Thomas H. Malone, for plaintiff in certiorari:

Plaintiff was negligent in descending the ladder.

The plaintiff's negligence in adopting the unsafe method of descent proximately caused or contributed to the accident, and bars him from any recovery.

Erskine v. Chino Valley Beet-Sugar Co. 71 Fed. 270; Kansas City, M. & B. R. Co. v. Williford, 115 Tenn. 108, 88 S. W. 178; Memphis Street R. Co. v. Haynes, 112 Tenn. 736, 81 S. W. 374; Nashville, C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Hayes, 117 Tenn. 696, 99 S. W. 362.

To recover damages in cases of this nature, the servant must not only show knowledge or negligent ignorance on the part of the master, but excusable ignorance on his own part.

Messrs. Parks & Bell and R. B. C. Howell for defendant in certiorari.

Green, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendant in error, Black, brought this suit to recover damages for injuries alleged to have been sustained by him while he was in the employ of the plaintiff in error. He was foreman of a painters' crew, and when descending a ladder from the roof of a house on which he was at work, one of the rounds broke and he had a fall, as the result of which he sues.

There was a judgment in his favor for $700 in the court below, which was affirmed by the court of civil appeals. The case is before us on writ of certiorari granted to the action of the latter court.

A motion for peremptory instructions in its favor was made by the defendant below, which was overruled by the trial court. It is with reference to this action of the trial court that the principal controversy has been waged in this court and in the court of civil appeals.

The first ground upon which the motion is predicated is that a ladder, such as the one used by defendant in error, is a simple tool, and it is insisted that defendant in error assumed the risk of its use, and the master owed him no duty of inspection in regard to the same.

The ladder which broke seems to have been a portion of a sectional ladder. There was nothing complicated about it, and only this particular section was in use when defendant in error had his fall. Such a ladder so used is a simple tool, and a servant ordinarily does assume any risk incident to its employment. We have expressly so held in the late case of Sivley v. Nixon Min. Drill Co. — Tenn. —, ante, 337, 104 S. W. 772.

It was said in this case that "an ordinary ladder falls within the class of simple tools, in respect of a defect in which the employer is held not liable on the ground that a defect in such a simple tool must be obvious to its user, by whom any risk of danger therefrom must be held to be assumed."

In the case under consideration, however, proof was introduced by plaintiff below tending to show that the superintendent of plaintiff in error had been notified of a defect in this ladder by another foreman who had formerly used it. This foreman testifies he discovered that the ladder was defective, and refused to employ it in his work; that he was questioned by the superintendent as to why he put it aside, and that he (the foreman) then called the attention of the superintendent to the defects. The foreman testifies, further, that the superintendent differed from him as to the condition of the ladder, and insisted that it was safe. All this happened a short while before plaintiff below sustained his fall.

This proof takes the case out of the authority of Sivley v. Nixon Min. Drill Co. supra, in so far as peremptory instructions are concerned.

The general principle is that a master is bound to inspect tools or appliances furnished by him to his workmen, and to keep them in sufficient repair. If, however, the tools or appliances are common or simple tools, there is an exception to this general rule. The presumption in such cases is that the servant is equally conversant with the nature of such simple or common tools, and is in as good a position as the master to discover any defects therein.

The master's opportunities for learning of a fault in a tool of this kind are no better than the opportunities of the servant. By reason of the character of such an implement, no superiority of knowledge on the part of the master exists, or can be presumed, as to defects therein. The foundation of the simple tool doctrine is the assumption that the knowledge of the master and servant must be equal.

Such a presumption cannot be indulged where the master has actual notice of a defect, where the proof shows his knowledge is superior. If the master is, as a matter of fact, cognizant that a tool with which he furnishes an employee is in such a condition as to render its use by the employee dangerous to the latter, he will be liable for an injury sustained by the employee in the use of such an implement, where the defect is not known to the employee, and is not of such a nature as to be discovered by that observation which would naturally accompany its use. Guthrie v. Louisville & N. R. Co. 11 Lea, 372, 47 Am. Rep. 286; Stork v. Charles Stolper Co. 127 Wis. 318, 106 N. W. 841, 7 Ann. Cas. 339; Mercer v. Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. 154 N. C. 399, 70 S. E. 742, Ann. Cas. 1912A, 1002, 2 N. C. C. A. 118.

In the latter case it is apparently held that the duty of a master to exercise ordinary care to furnish reasonably proper tools to his servants applies to simple, as well as to complicated, tools, and the rule is relaxed only as to the duty of inspection thereafter. See, however, cases in note following report of this decision in Ann. Cas. 1912A, 1002-1004.

Although the master is not required to inspect simple tools previously furnished to the employee, to discover defects of which the employee using such implements should be aware, and although generally no inspection of a simple tool may be necessary at the time it is delivered to an employee, yet if the master furnishes such a tool, with a dangerous defect of which he has actual knowledge, he is negligent. He should not be permitted to expose the servant to such a risk, particularly if the defect is of such a character that it might be overlooked by the servant. There is testimony in this record that the defective condition of the round of the ladder which broke was not readily discoverable.

For the reasons above stated the trial judge properly overruled the first ground of the motion to direct a verdict.

It is next urged that the injuries of the defendant in error were sustained as a result of his contributory negligence. It is said that he was descending this ladder at the time he fell, face foremost; that in this way, he put all his weight on the rounds of the ladder, and was not in a position to hold to the sides of the ladder with his hands when the round broke, as he would have been if he had come down backwards.

It is urged that when an employee has two methods in which to do his work, one of which is safe and the other dangerous, he cannot hold the master liable when he adopts the latter method and is injured. This is a correct principle; but, in the absence of proof, the court is not willing to say, as a matter of law, that the defendant in error was guilty of such contributory negligence in descending the ladder in the manner he did as to bar his recovery.

It is insisted that the proper use of a ladder is of common knowledge, and that the court should view the act of defendant in error as it would the act of a person who jumps from a moving train, and hold him guilty of contributory negligence without proof. We think, however, there might be some reasonable difference of opinion as to the proper manner in which workmen may use a ladder. They frequently ascend and descend with material and tools in their hands, without holding, and are expected so to do. While we know it would have been safer for defendant in error to have descended this ladder backwards, with his hands on the rails, yet we would not be justified, upon our own knowledge, in imputing such negligence to him, on account of the manner of his descent, under the facts and circumstances of this case, as to defeat his action.

The question of contributory negligence, as well as the question of negligence, is ordinarily for the jury. Even though the facts be undisputed, if intelligent minds might draw different conclusions as to whether, under circumstances conceded, the conduct of a plaintiff was that of an ordinarily prudent man, the matter should be left to the jury. The court should draw no inference when in doubt, but only in those cases where the evidence is without material conflict, and such that all reasonable men must reach the same conclusion therefrom. It is only in cases where the evidence is susceptible of no other fair inference that the court is justified in instructing the jury, as a matter of law, that the plaintiff has been guilty of contributory negligence which would bar his recovery. Knoxville Traction Co. v. Carroll, 113 Tenn. 514, 82 S. W. 313; Knoxville Traction Co. v. Brown, 115 Tenn. 323, 89 S. W. 319; Cummings v. Wichita R. & Light Co. 68 Kan. 218, 74 Pac. 1104, 1 Ann. Cas. 708, 15 Am. Neg. Rep. 548; Vindicator Consol. Gold Min. Co. v. Firstbrook, 36 Colo. 498, 86 Pac. 313, 10 Ann. Cas. 1108; Merchants' Ice & Cold Storage Co. v. Bargholt, 129 Ky. 60, 110 S. W. 364, 16 Ann. Cas. 965; Burch v. Southern P. Co. 32 Nev. 75, 104 Pac. 225, Ann. Cas. 1912B, 1166.

We must decline, therefore, to say that the defendant in error as a matter of law was guilty of such contributory negligence as to defeat his suit. This question should have been left to the jury under a proper charge.

The defendant below offered several requests presenting its theory as to the use of simple tools, and as to the contributory negligence of the plaintiff there. These requests were refused by the circuit judge. While, for reasons stated above, a verdict should not have been directed, the doctrine of simple tools should have been charged, with the qualifications herein indicated. His Honor did not charge the doctrine of simple tools at all, and his charge upon contributory negligence was quite meager, the theory of plaintiff in error was not fairly submitted, and the whole case went to the jury under a charge insufficiently stating the rules of law applicable thereto.

The case will accordingly be reversed, for errors in the charge, and remanded for another trial.

TENNESSEE SUPREME COURT.

FECHHEIMER-KEIFFER COMPANY,
Plff. in Certiorari,

v.

D. L. BURTON et al.

(— Tenn. —, 164 S. W. 1179.)

Bulk sales law — distribution of price among preferred creditors — effect.

One who purchases a stock of goods without complying with the bulk sales law, and whose payment is turned over to preferred creditors of the seller, is liable to the other creditors for their pro rata share of the contract price of the property, although he is entitled to credit for the pro rata share which was received by the preferred creditors.

(February 7, 1914.)

CERTIORARI to the Court of Civil Appeals to review a decree affirming a decree of the Equity Court for Putnam County in defendants' favor in a suit to hold certain of them liable as purchasers of a Note. — Right of purchaser in violation of bulk sales law, where price has been applied to payment of creditors of seller.

As to the remedy of creditors where a sale is made in violation of the bulk sales law, see note to McGreenery v. Murphy, 39 L.R.A. (N.S.) 374.

While but little authority has been found upon the question as to the rights of a purchaser in violation of the bulk sales law, where the purchase price has been applied to the payment of creditors of the seller, the decision in FECHHEIMER-KEIFFER Co. v. BURTON, to the effect that the purchaser is subrogated to the rights of the creditors who have been paid with his money, seems to be sound, and is supported by the other stock of goods from defendant Burton in violation of the bulk sales act. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. B. G. Adcock and W. Bryant for plaintiff in certiorari.

Mr. E. D. White for defendants in certiorari.

Williams, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The bill was filed by complainants, wholesale merchants, to hold liable defendants Cooper & Brown as the purchasers of a stock of goods from defendant Burton, a retail merchant, in violation of the bulk sales act (Acts 1901, chap. 133).

The value of the stock sold in bulk, without compliance with the statute's provisions, was $924.85, and that sum was paid in notes by the vendees, Cooper & Brown. Both parties were without intent to defraud, and fraud in fact is thus negatived.

Two of the three notes of Cooper & Brown were turned over to a brother of the vendor on the day of sale, and on realization he paid the proceeds to bona fide creditors of D. L. Burton. A third purchase-money note executed by the vendee firm was transferred to this brother in his own right, he being a creditor of the vendor.

The chancellor and the court of civil appeals held that, as the entire sum received for the stock of goods had been expended in the payment of this indebtedness of the vendor, D. L. Burton, complainants were cases most nearly in point. Thus, in Adams v. Young, 200 Mass. 588, 86 N. E. 942, where the defendants had purchased a stock of goods in violation of the bulk sales law,—both the seller and the purchaser, however, acting in good faith and with no actual intent to defraud creditors,—and a large part of the consideration was paid over to the holder of two mortgages on the goods, who had taken possession of a part of the property under the terms of his mortgages, and who, upon the payment of his claims, discharged the first mortgage and assigned the second to the purchaser of the goods; and the balance of the purchase price was used in paying other small debts owing by the seller, in part for some of the mortgaged property, and in part for clerical and legal services,—it was held that the plaintiff (the trustee in bankruptcy of the seller) was entitled to no relief against the defendant (the purchaser), the court saying: "One whose purchase of property has for that reason [fraud] been avoided by the creditors of the seller, being himself free from any actual fraud, may stand in the place of creditors whose demands he has paid out of the property or in consideration of the transfer to himself. . . . So, if he has paid off debts which constituted liens or encumbrances upon the property conveyed to him, he may, for his protection and reimbursement, take by subrogation the rights of the secured creditors whom he has thus paid. . . . If, instead of a discharge, he has taken an assignment of such a mortgage or other encumbrance, it will not be treated as merged, but will be upheld in his hands as a charge upon the property. . . . The merely constructive fraud of a purchaser will not prevent him from being protected in this manner, if he has not himself actively participated in the fraud. . . . The application of these principles is fatal to the maintenance of this bill. The defendants have the right to rest upon the mortgage of which they took an assignment. If it were necessary to pass upon that question, it would not be easy to avoid saying that they could rest also upon the mortgage which was paid 51 L.R.A.(N.S.) and discharged. It was their money that paid the mortgage debts. The fact that the money passed through the hands of the mortgagor, and the form of the transfer which the defendants took, cannot overcome the real effect of the transaction."

So, in McIntosh v. Owosso Carriage & Sleigh Co. — Tex. Civ. App. —, 146 S. W. 239, an appeal by the purchasers of a stock of goods in violation of the bulk sales law, from a judgment garnishing them in favor of a creditor of the seller, it appearing that there had been no intentional fraud in the sale, and that the purchasers had paid full value for the goods, partly in cash and by their notes, which they had subsequently paid to the seller, and largely by assuming two debts owing by the seller for the goods, which they had also paid prior to the institution of the garnishment suit,—the court said that, as against the seller's creditors, the purchasers "acquired no title to the goods, in excess of the debts owing on such goods and paid by them."

For a brief history of the earlier bulk sales legislation, and a full consideration of the earlier authorities as to the validity and construction, in general, of bulk sales statutes, including a few earlier cases on procedure, see note to Everett Produce Co. v. Smith, 2 L.R.A.(N.S.) 331; and for later cases as to the constitutionality of this legislation, see note to Young v. Lemieux, 20 L.R.A.(N.S.) 160.

For the later cases as to what kind or classes of property are within the operation of bulk sales statutes, see notes to Cooney, E. & Co. v. Sweat, 25 L.R.A.(N.S.) 758, and Connecticut Steam Brown Stone Co. v. Lewis, 45 L.R.A.(N.S.) 495; as to the applicability of bulk sales laws to exempt property, see note to McCormick v. Kistler, 45 L.R.A.(N.S.) 497; and as to what are "fixtures" within the meaning of bulk sales laws, see note to Bowen v. Quigley, 34 L.R.A.(N.S.) 218.

As to the effect of misrepresentations in statement the seller is required to make, as a condition of a valid sale in bulk, see note to International Silver Co. v. Hull, 45 L.R.A.(N.S.) 492.

A. C. W.

without remedy, although they received no part of the consideration sum.

It seems clear, since the sale was only fraudulent in law (Daly v. Sumpter Drug Co. 127 Tenn. 412, 424, 155 S. W. 167), that the purchasers are entitled to stand in the place of the creditors whose demands against their vendor were thus paid by the purchase-money notes, or the proceeds thereof. Those whose purchase of property has been under such a statute denounced as constructively fraudulent, and avoided by creditors of the seller, may stand in the place of other creditors whose demands have been thus paid. This was held in Adams v. Young, 200 Mass. 588, 86 N. E. 942, a case involving a sale in violation of the Massachusetts bulk sale act. Loos v. Wilkinson, 113 N. Y. 485, 4 L.R.A. 353, 10 Am. St. Rep. 495, 21 N. E. 392; Alley v. Connell, 3 Head, 578.

But does it follow that the purchasers may pay, or cause to be paid, one or more of the unsecured creditors of their vendor in full, and leave other creditors of the same grade wholly unpaid, and successfully withstand a complaint by the latter?

The recoveries of all of the creditors of the seller cannot exceed, in the aggregate, the true value of the property fraudulently passed to the purchasers, and therefore converted.

May the entire purchase price be paid by the purchaser to one creditor, leaving the others remediless, where that price was the value of the stock of goods converted?

If this may be done, it would seem that a single creditor holding a demand against the seller equal in amount to the value of the stock of goods on hand could purchase that stock without complying with the terms of the act, or contravening its provisions. In the case of Neas v. Borches, 109 Tenn. 398, 97 Am. St. Rep. 851, 71 S. W. 50, the purchaser was a creditor of the seller, but that fact was not remarked on for differentiation to save the sale there involved, which was held to be fraudulent.

In Sampson v. Brandon Grocery Co. 127 Ga. 454, 56 S. E. 48, 9 Ann. Cas. 331, it was said: "The question presented by this record is whether a sale of a stock of goods in bulk by a debtor to his creditor, in partial payment or entire extinguishment of his debt, is valid, unless the sale is made agreeably to the terms of the act approved August 17, 1903 (Acts 1903, p. 92). . . . This salutary object would not be attained if sales by the debtor to the creditor in the extinguishment of his debt were excepted. . . . But it is contended that if the act of 1903 be applied to a sale of a stock of goods in bulk by a debtor to his creditor, so much of Civ. Code [1895] § 2697, as permits a debtor to prefer a creditor by a sale without reservation of any benefit will be impliedly repealed. It is a well-recognized canon of statutory construction that a subsequent statute will not repeal a former if the two can be reconciled. Construing the act of 1903 and § 2697 together, we may easily reach the conclusion that sales of stock in bulk by a debtor to a creditor, in extinguishment of his debt, in whole or in part, are still permissible, but that such sales are null and void unless there be compliance with the terms of the act of 1903."

The same rule as to a creditor purchaser was announced in Gallus v. Elmer, 193 Mass. 106, 78 N. E. 772, 8 Ann. Cas. 1067, and assumed in the decision of other cases cited in note in 9 Ann. Cas. 332.

Both phases of the above decision by the Georgia court are approved by us as sound, when application is made of its principles to our bulk sales act and our law touching the right of an insolvent debtor to prefer a creditor. If the preference may not be made directly by way of a bulk sale to the creditor, it would seem that the preference of one, with consequent exclusion of other creditors, cannot be reached by indirection in the manner presented on this record.

The true theory appears to us to be that declared by the supreme court of Washington in Fitz Henry v. Munter, 33 Wash. 629, 74 Pac. 1003, where, in speaking of a like act, it was said: "The object of this law was to hold the goods of debtors under such circumstances as a trust fund for the benefit of all the creditors, and to hold the purchaser in possession as a trustee for such creditors. This being so, the cause will have to be reversed, with instruction to distribute the funds pro rata to all of the creditors who are parties to the suit."

See also Kohn v. Fishbach, 36 Wash. 69, 104 Am. St. Rep. 641, 78 Pac. 199; Appel Mercantile Co. v. Bark, 92 Neb. 669, 675, 138 N. W. 1133; Guaranty Title & T. Co. v. Pearlman (D. C.) 144 Fed. 550. But see, seemingly contra, National Grocer Co. v. Plotter, 167 Mich. 626, 133 N. W. 493.

In Gallus v. Elmer, supra, the Massachusetts court said, in reference to such a statute, that it was its purpose to prevent alienation by a merchant of his stock of goods "away from his creditors in general." A prime purpose of the statute was to prevent preferences of creditors by and through bulk sales. Any other view and ruling would render the act the easy instrument of inequality and injustice, if not of frauds, differing only in kind from those it was meant to prevent.

The rule of distribution pari passu to creditors of the grantor has been applied, and justly, in cases involving subrogation, where the conveyance was fraudulent under test of common-law principles, and where no lien had been fixed by one or more of them. Robinson v. Stewart, 10 N. Y. 189, 196; Chatterton v. Mason, 86 Md. 236, 37 Atl. 960.

Since subrogation is a remedy invented by courts of equity, they will move to administer it where the result will be an equitable one, but not to work injustice to another in the defeat of an equal equity. American Bonding Co. v. National Mechanics' Bank, 99 Am. St. Rep. 480 note; Knaffle v. Knoxville Bkg. & T. Co. 128 Tenn. —, 50 L.R.A.(N.S.) 167, 159 S. W. 838.

The right of the defendant purchasers, in this case in equity, therefore, was to be subrogated to the rights of the creditors, paid by the proceeds of sale, to a pro rata share of the value of the stock of goods.

Complainants' rights are, by parity of reasoning, not to a recovery in full, as contended by them, but to a recovery from appellee firm of the pro rata distributable to them.

Writ of certiorari granted complainants; reversed, with remand for further proceedings not inconsistent with what is herein ruled.

VERMONT SUPREME COURT.

BARTON SAVINGS BANK & TRUST COMPANY

v.

I. STEPHENSON et al.

(— Vt. —, 89 Atl. 639.)

Alteration of instruments — changing date of note.

1. Crossing out the date of a note and writing another above it cannot be regarded

Note. — Alteration of date of note.

The general rule stated in the note to Lombardo v. Lombardini, 32 L.R.A.(N.S.) 515, to which the present note is merely supplementary, to the effect that a change of date is a material alteration, finds support in the following recent decisions: Pensacola State Bank v. Melton, 210 Fed. 57; Fry v. Jenkins, 173 Ill. App. 486; Bodine v. Berg, 82 N. J. L. 662, 40 L.R.A.(N.S.) 65, 82 Atl. 901, Ann. Cas. 1913D, 721; Cornog v. Wilson, 231 Pa. 281, 80 Atl. 174; Baldwin v. Haskell Nat. Bank, 104 Tex. 122, 133 S. W. 864, 134 S. W. 1178, reversing — Tex. Civ. App. —, 124 S. W. 443; Schubert v. Schubert, 168 Ill. App. 419.

To so change the date of a note as to bring it within the statute of limitations is a material alteration. Schubert v. Schubert, supra.

In Baldwin v. Haskell Nat. Bank, 104 Tex. 122, 133 S. W. 864, 134 S. W. 1178, 51 L.R.A.(N.S.)

as mere memorandum of the time from which interest is to be figured, rather than an alteration of the instrument.

Same — alteration by comaker.

2. Alteration of the date of a note by one of several makers to whom it has been intrusted for delivery, before delivering it, and without the consent of the comakers, avoids the instrument.

Same — materiality.

3. Change of date of a note by one of several comakers to whom the instrument has been intrusted for delivery cannot be regarded as immaterial because it was intended to give the instrument the date to which interest had been paid on a prior note which it was intended to renew; at least, as to persons not parties to the old note.

Bills and notes — alteration — presumption as to time.

4. An indorsee of a note containing an alteration in its date cannot rely upon the presumption that the alteration was made before its execution, to establish the validity of the instrument, if the alteration was in fact made under circumstances which avoid it.

(February 14, 1914.)

EXCEPTIONS by plaintiff to rulings of the Orleans County Court made during the trial of an action on a promissory note which resulted in a judgment against defendant Stephenson alone. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Young & Young, for plaintiff:

The intent with which the "December 1st" was written and "June 1" lined out was material. It is not the fact that an instrument is altered, that makes it void. It is the intent that gives the act its character and avoids the instrument.

Bigelow v. Stilphen, 35 Vt. 521; Smith v. Dunham, 8 Pick. 246; Adams v. Frye, 3 reversing — Tex. Civ. App. —, 124 S. W. 443, a note bearing interest from maturity was executed to a bank, and a controversy arising as to whether it was intended to bear interest from date, the cashier wrote in a blank after the printed word "maturity," the word "date" in pencil. It was held that the alteration thus effected was material, and that its legal effect could not be defeated on the ground that it was a mere memorandum. The court said: "Was the alteration material? The court of civil appeals held not. This holding seems to have been based on the theory that there was no difference between the expressions "maturity" and "maturity date." If, determined in the light of all the facts, and having reference to the contentions of the several parties, it should be held that the inserted word 'date' was intended not to supersede the printed word 'maturity,' and to express a different intention from that evidenced by the language

Kennedy, 63 Pa. 187, 3 Am. Rep. 541.

"December 1st" was written above "June 1" and lines drawn through "June 1" in furtherance of an honest purpose to show the exact intent of each maker when he signed the note, namely, to renew the exact amount due upon the first note when the note in suit was delivered to the payee, and the note remained the valid note of all defendants.

Derby v. Thrall, 44 Vt. 413, 8 Am. Rep. 389; Murray v. Graham, 29 Iowa, 520; Barlow v. Buckingham, 68 Iowa, 169, 26

The law presumes the change, if change it is, to have been made before signature. The payee and plaintiff were in no fault in relying on this presumption and accepting the note.

An alteration in a promissory note, which makes it conform to the true intention of the parties, if honestly made, with no intent of procuring any advantage, will not vitiate the note.

McRaven v. Crisler. 53 Miss. 542.

The note in its present form was used to accomplish, and did accomplish, the exact as it stood, but was to be read in harmony with such printed word and as meaning the same thing, the addition of the word 'date' would be but idle surplusage, and there would be some fair warrant for the opinion of the court of civil appeals. But it seems to us clear that this was not the intention of the cashier, nor do we believe that there is any testimony in the record which presents this view. Nor do we think in the light of the situation, presented by the contention of the respective parties can this intention be gathered from the instrument. It is a rule of almost universal application that 'where, as in the use of printed forms, a contract is partly printed and partly written, and there is a conflict between the printing and the writing, the writing will prevail.' 9 Cyc. 584. Again while, as used, there may be no irreconcilable repugnancy in the use of the words together, 'maturity date,' . . . and as applied to the controversy here involved, it is utterly unreasonable to conclude that no change was wrought or intended to be wrought in the instrument sued on by the insertion of the word 'date.' If the note had been originally drawn so as to bear interest from date, and if thereafter, without the consent of the bank, plaintiff in error had inscribed in a blank space left in the note the word 'maturity,' so as to make same read, if both words are to be considered as parts thereof, 'date maturity,' could such a change be upheld on the ground that it meant the same thing as originally written? We cannot think so. In any event, it cannot be denied that the insertion of the word 'date' left ambiguous and uncertain what was, when the note was signed, left beyond doubt clear 51 L.R.A. (N.S.)

and explicit. Nor do we think that the legal effect of the evident alteration can be defeated on the ground that it was a mere memorandum. As we view the matter, it is quite a different alteration from a mere marginal memorandum, which is sometimes treated as no part of the note proper, but simply as a memorandum for information or convenience."

In Pensacola State Bank v. Melton, 210 Fed. 57, the court declared that a statutory provision that any alteration which changes the time of payment of a negotiable instrument is a material alteration was but a declaration of the common law.

In Ensign v. Fogg, — Mich. —, 143 N. W. 82, where the date of a note was alleged to have been altered, it was held that, there being nothing suspicious upon the face of the instrument beyond the fact that an erasure was manifest, the presumption was that the alteration was made before the note was signed.

And in Corrog v. Wilson, 231 Pa. 281, 80 Atl. 174, a note was held properly rejected as evidence of a debt in the absence of proof that an alteration in date was made before delivery. The court said: "When it clearly appears on the face of a writing that it has been altered in a material part, it is incumbent on the party producing it to account for the alteration, and until this is done it is not admissible in evidence. This rule is more stringent when applied to negotiable paper than to other written instruments, and in relation to it there is no presumption of innocence, and the burden of explaining any apparent material alteration is cast on the holder thereof."

purpose and intent of all the defendants in making it.

In writing "December 1st" above "June 1," Stephenson was agent of all the defendants in making the note conform to their intention, or what he did was the act of a stranger.

Under the circumstances of this case, Stephenson had authority to make the change which he did make.

If Stephenson was not defendants' agent in so doing, his act was that of a stranger, was not an alteration, but a mere spoilation, and the note remained a valid note of all defendants as of June 1, 1908.

Munson, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The suit is upon a note, the body of which is as follows: "On demand after date for value received, we each as principal, jointly and severally, promise to pay the Barton National Bank or order, at their banking rooms in Barton, Vermont, $7,000, with interest payable semiannually on the 1st day of June and December each year." The note bears the payee's indorsement to the plaintiff. There are ten signers to the note, all of whom are defendants. The date of the note as originally drawn was June 1, 1908. The face of the note shows a change by drawing lines in ink across "June 1," and writing above this the words "December 1st." The part thus crossed remains perfectly legible.

From May, 1904, until the giving of the note in suit, the Barton National Bank held a note identical in terms with the note in suit, which was signed by defendant Stephenson and nine others, three of whom had deceased before the new note was given, and six of whom became signers on the new note and are defendants herein. The remaining signers on the new note were procured on the requirement of the bank to take the place of the former signers who had deceased. The note in suit was prepared by the cashier of the bank after the interest on the old note had been paid to June 1, 1908, and was mailed to Stephenson for the required signatures July 10, 1908. Several letters urging attention to the matter were written to Stephenson in the next four months. December 3, 1908, he paid the interest on the old note to December 1st. The note in suit was delivered to the bank by mail in exchange for the old note March 10, 1909. March 15, 1909, the plaintiff bank purchased from the liquidator of the Barton National Bank all its assets, including the note in suit. The first note was not presented to the commissioners on the estate of either of the three signers who had deceased. The three signers of the new note who were not on the first note are Horace S. Richardson, Homer W. Tillotson, and J. S. Brahana. Richardson and Tillotson were sons of deceased signers of the first note, and Brahana was the brother of a deceased signer. Richardson testified that he understood, at the time he signed, that his father was on the previous note. Nothing further appears as to any knowledge of these signers regarding the first note. The signatures to the note in suit were procured at different times from July, 1908, to March, 1909. Subsequent to the signing of the note, and just before sending it to the bank, Stephenson, made the change above described, without the knowledge, authorization, or consent of any of the other defendants, unless the law implies such authority or consent from the conduct of the parties. Stephenson testified that he made the change to have the note correspond with the date to which interest had been paid on the old note.

The declaration contains the general counts and four special counts. The first special count declares on the instrument as a note dated June 1, 1908; the second declares on it as a note dated December 1, 1908; and the third declares on it as a note delivered to the Barton National Bank on the 10th day of March, 1909, without alleging a date. The plaintiff recovered a judgment against Stephenson, and the other defendants had judgment for their costs. In speaking of the defendants, the reference will be to the nine defendants who had judgment. The case antedates the operation of No. 99, Acts of 1912, known as the negotiable instruments act.

The plaintiff claims that the court should have held, or permitted the jury to find, that the words "December 1st" were a mere memorandum of the time from which interest was to be figured, and not an alteration of the date. It is true that entries may be made on the face of a note, which, if made to serve the purposes of a memorandum, and without an intention to alter the instrument, will not affect its validity. Carr v. Welch, 46 Ill. 88; Maness v. Henry, 96 Ala. 454, 11 So. 410. If Stephenson had written these words in pencil or red ink above the date and without crossing it out, the entry could doubtless be treated as a mere memorandum; but the writing of one in connection with the crossing out of the other, both in the same durable substance, forbids this construction. An inspection of the note shows an alteration in fact, and Stephenson's testimony as to his purpose in making it cannot convert it into a mere memorandum.

The general proposition that any material alteration of a note will render it void cannot well be questioned. The rule governing the subject of the alteration of writings has been stated in these terms: "Any material alteration in a written contract, made without the consent of the party sought to be charged thereon, at any time after its execution by him, renders it void as to him, even in the hands of an innocent holder." The more recent statements of the rule confine it to changes made by a party to the writing or one claiming under him. Notes in 10 Am. Dec. 267, and 86 Am. St. Rep. 82. A material alteration is one which makes the instrument speak a language different in legal effect from that which it originally spoke; an alteration which produces some change in the rights, interests, or obligations of the parties to the instrument. 1 Greenl. Ev. § 565; Note in 86 Am. St. Rep. 86. An alteration in the date of a writing, if it results in altering the legal effect of the instrument, as by changing the day of maturity, is a material alteration. Wald's Pollock, Contr. 871; 2 Cyc. 201. The date of a note ordinarily evidences the inception of the undertaking, fixes the time of payment, and determines the period of limitation; and when this is the case, any change in the date will impart to the note a new legal effect and operation. 2 Dan. Neg. Inst. §§ 1376, 1377; Newman v. King, 54 Ohio St. 273, 35 L.R.A. 471, 56 Am. St. Rep. 705, 43 N. E. 683; Lisle v. Rogers, 18 B. Mon. 528; Miller v. Gilleland, 19 Pa. 119.

But the plaintiff urges upon several grounds, that while a change in the date of a note may ordinarily be material, it cannot be so regarded in the circumstances of this case. The specific claims presented will be best stated and considered in connection with some reference to the cases. In referring to the authorities upon this subject, it is important to notice the relation sustained to the writing by the one making the alteration. In many of the cases the alteration was made by the payee of the note after its delivery. In other cases, as in the case submitted here, the alteration was made by one of several makers, after the note had been signed by others, and before it was delivered. In cases of the first class, the question manifestly relates to the effect of an alteration in a completed and existing contract. In cases of the second class, it may be said, as to those who had previously signed, that the alteration comes in to prevent the completion of a contract, rather than to avoid a contract which has come into existence. This view is presented by the defendants, and will be found in the reasoning of several decisions. Fay v. Smith, 1 Allen, 477, 79 Am. Dec. 752; Draper v. Wood, 112 Mass. 315, 17 Am. Rep. 92; Blakey v. Johnson, 13 Bush, 197, 26 Am. Rep. 254.

The argument of the plaintiff seems to raise the question whether Stephenson is to be regarded as a party to the writing within the meaning of the rule. Authorities are quoted which say that an alteration, to avoid an instrument, must be made by one who is entitled to some right or benefit under it, and that a joint promisor or maker is not such a party. Note in 17 Am. Rep. 100; Fullerton v. Sturges, 4 Ohio St. 529. But the rule is generally taken to apply to any party to the instrument; and it has been specifically held in numerous cases that an alteration by one obligor or principal, without the consent of his co-obligor or surety, discharges the latter. 2 Cyc. 150, 151, 154; Montgomery v. Cross-thwait, 90 Ala. 553, 12 L.R.A. 140, 24 Am. St. Rep. 832, 8 So. 498; Britton v. Dierker, 46 Mo. 591, 2 Am. Rep. 553; Greenfield Sav. Bank v. Stowell, 123 Mass. 196, 25 Am. Rep. 67; Goodman v. Eastman, 4 N. H. 455; Wood v. Steele, 6 Wall. 80, 18 L. ed. 725. The writer of the note in 17 Am. Rep. 98, remarks that the case last cited was apparently not very well considered; but the decision has since been frequently cited by the state courts, and been recognized as authoritative by the court which rendered it. Mersman v. Werges, 112 U. S. 139, 28 L. ed. 641, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 65. And in Jones v. Bangs, 40 Ohio St. 139, 48 Am. Rep. 664, it was remarked that all that was said by the writer of the opinion in Fullerton v. Sturges on the law relating to a material alteration was obiter. It is only in the case of a note that has been delivered that it can properly be said that an alteration, to be destructive, must be made by, or by the authority of, one who takes some benefit under it.

It is now almost universally held that the alteration of a written instrument by a stranger will not render it void; but courts have had some difficulty in determining who shall be considered a stranger. There is a class of cases where a note is procured by an agent, delivery to whom is delivery to the payee, but whose subsequent authority is limited to the custody and transmission of the writing; and alterations made by these persons are treated as the acts of a stranger. In this class are Bigelow v. Stilphen, 35 Vt. 521; Equitable Mfg. Co. v. Allen, 76 Vt. 22, 104 Am. St. Rep. 915, 56 Atl. 87. The plaintiff claims that Stephenson had authority as agent of the other defendants to change the date, and claims further that, if he had no such authority, his act was the act of a stranger and of no effect.

There is nothing in the relation ordinarily existing between the principal makers of a note, or between principal and surety, that authorizes one to change the writing after it has been signed by the other. Note in 86 Am. St. Rep. 107. No authority to alter will be presumed from the mere fact that one leaves the note with the other to be delivered. Blakey v. Johnson, supra. And it is said in general terms in the note above cited that no agency to alter will be implied from any other agency, special in its nature. See Walsh v. Hunt, 120 Cal. 46, 39 L.R.A. 697, 52 Pac. 115. No special argument is made in support of the claim of agency; and the question is apparently advanced for decision to clear the ground for the further claim that, if Stephenson had no authority to make the change, his act was the act of a stranger and left the note unimpaired.

This further claim is based upon the fact that by the terms of the note each signer assumed the liability of a principal. It is said that each of the other principals left the note with Stephenson to be delivered to the bank, and that, as regards that purpose, his relations to the note and to the other principals were the same as they would have been in the case of an ordinary messenger. This cannot be so. Stephenson was a party to the note, and was holding it for delivery for himself as well as for the others. The other signers intrusted it to his possession in his capacity as comaker, and his acts in connection with that possession cannot be accounted acts of a stranger.

But the plaintiff claims that the change of date in this instance was an immaterial alteration, because its effect was simply to make the note conform to what all the makers intended it to be. The courts of several states recognize the doctrine that there may be special circumstances from which the law will imply an authority to alter. Note in 86 Am. St. Rep. 116. The cases are mostly those of alterations by the promisee; and the alterations are generally justified upon the ground that they were made to correct a mistake, and thus make the writing conform to the intention of the parties. These alterations have included the correction of mistakes in the date, the completion of defective statements of the amount of the debt and the period of credit, and the correction of errors in the name of the payee. Among the cases of the latter class is Derby v. Thrall, 44 Vt. 413, 8 Am. Rep. 389. There the payee of a note, who was known to both debtor and surety, and to whom the surety understood the note was being given, was commonly called Frank, and the debtor had him designated as Franklin in the note as drawn, supposing that to be his first name. His name was in fact Francis E., and the debtor permitted him to alter the note in that respect on receiving it. The court treated this as an immaterial alteration. See also Ames v. Colburn, 11 Gray, 390, 71 Am. Dec. 723; Duker v. Franz, 7 Bush, 273, 3 Am. Rep. 314; Boyd v. Brotherson, 10 Wend. 93; Conner v. Routh, 7 How. (Miss.) 176, 40 Am. Dec. 59; Cole v. Hills, 44 N. H. 227.

The plaintiff argues that the change made here simply carried out the understanding of the makers, and that the case is within the holding in Derby v. Thrall. Six of the defendants were signers on the old note; and their purpose in signing the note in suit was not to create a new obligation, but to continue an old one. They knew that this was to be done through an exchange of one note for another, and must have expected that the business would be so transacted as to maintain a continuous liability. This implied that the new note was to be so framed as to commence where the former note ended, and not be such as to show a duplication of interest for a six months' period. The note as originally prepared was drawn to correspond with the situation as it then existed,—with the June interest day past and the interest paid. During the delays incident to procuring the signatures of the required number, another interest day passed, and the additional six month's interest was paid, and the date of the note was changed to correspond with the altered situation. The change was not the correction of a mistake; for there was no mistake in the date as first entered. The same considerations which determined the date in the first instance called for the subsequent change. This change in the date, in connection with the payment of six months' interest, exactly maintained the situation which these six defendants contemplated when they signed the note.

The cases above referred to doubtless afford some support to the plaintiff's contention regarding these matters, as applied to the six defendants; but the decisions of other courts of equal authority deny the right of one party to a writing to alter it, even though the alteration makes it conform to the understanding of all the parties. If we were to sustain the claim of an implied authority upon the case presented, it would greatly extend the application of the rule adopted in Derby v. Thrall. But we are not called upon to determine this question, for it is obvious that the above reasoning has no application to the three defendants who were not parties to the first note, and no point was made in the court below which suggested any ground of recovery not applicable to all the signers. No claim was made to the court in any form at any stage of the trial that left room for the theory that there might be a recovery against some of the nine defendants and not against all. The charge of the court, in treating the right to alter as depending upon consent, evidently referred to consent in fact, and not by implication of law.

The plaintiff also contends that the change in the date is immaterial, because it in no way altered the rights or liabilities of the parties. It is argued that the course of the transaction was such that the change did not effect the operation of the statute of limitations. The note was not completed as to the signatures and delivered to the bank until March 10th, more than three months subsequent to the date of the note as altered. It is said that the date of the delivery was the first day when suit could have been brought on the note, and that it was this that determined the expiration of the period of limitation, and not the change in the date. It is not necessary to take up the inquiry in this form. It is true that Stephenson would have had the right to deliver the note when he did, if nothing more than the delay had intervened. But this writing had ceased to be, or had failed to become, the note of the defendants, because of the alteration before the delivery was made.

It is said further that, while the change might, in one possible contingency, have deprived defendants of the defense of the statute, as it is, they have suffered, and can suffer, no possible harm from it. This argument fails to recognize the true import of the rule. Any alteration which may in any event alter the rights, duties, or obligations of the party sought to be charged is material in the legal sense. It is enough that in some circumstances which might have supervened the alteration might have been prejudicial. Woodworth v. Bank of America, 19 Johns. 418, 10 Am. Dec. 239; Miller v. Gilleland, 19 Pa. 119, 124;

Soaps v. Eichberg, 42 Ill. App. 375. Moreover, the authorities are practically unanimous in holding that the question whether the alteration was beneficial or prejudicial to the party not consenting is immaterial. Mahaiwe Bank v. Douglass, 31 Conn. 170; Gardner v. Walsh, 5 El. & Bl. 83, 24 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 285, 1 Jur. N. S. 828, 3 Week. Rep. 460.

It is claimed that the alteration, if material, will not prevent a recovery, because it was made with an honest purpose and intent. There are cases which hold that an alteration made by a payee through some misunderstanding and for an honest purpose will not bar his recovery, if the original language of the instrument remains perfectly legible. But the great weight of authority sustains the general proposition that a material alteration will avoid the instrument, although innocently made. Master v. Miller, 2 Smith, Lead. Cas. 9th Am. ed. 1153; Green v. Sneed, 101 Ala. 205, 46 Am. St. Rep. 119, 13 So. 277; Aldrich v. Smith, 37 Mich. 468, 26 Am. Rep. 536; Eckert v. Pickel, 59 Iowa, 545, 13 N. W. 708; Davis v. Eppler, 38 Kan. 629, 16 Pac. 793.

In this state it is presumed in the first instance that all alterations in an instrument were made before or at the time of its execution, and the plaintiff argues that it was not in fault in relying on this presumption and accepting the note. But this presumption was not conclusive, and could not be relied upon as a protection when the time of the alteration was questioned in evidence. It could better be said, as is claimed by the defendants, that the plaintiff was put upon inquiry by the appearance of the note. The bank must have known that the change in the date afforded an opportunity for raising some question regarding the note, and it cannot well urge its good faith to establish the validity of the instrument.

Plaintiff claimed a ratification of the change by some of the defendants, including Tillotson, at a certain interview at the bank. Tillotson was called as a witness for the defense, and testified as to the time when and the circumstances under which he signed the note. In cross-examination, and without objection, he produced a letter received from the bank, and testified that he went to the bank at the time named in the letter, but that he went at Stephenson's request, and not in response to the demand for payment. He was then asked whether he did not understand that he was called upon to pay the note, and whether the letter that he had received from the bank had something to do with his going there, which questions were severally objected to, and were excluded, with the suggestion that the inquiry had better be had in connection with the plaintiff's case in rebuttal. This disposition of the matter was within the court's discretion.

This specifically disposes of or sufficiently covers all the points relied upon. The plaintiff's motion for a verdict was properly overruled, and the case was correctly submitted upon evidence properly received. Judgment affirmed.

WEST VIRGINIA SUPREME COURT OF APPEALS.

CITY OF CHARLESTON et al.

v.

SAMUEL D. LITTLEPAGE, Judge, et al.

(— W. Va. —, 80 S. E. 131.)

Municipal corporation — employment of agent — form of contract.

1. The employment of an agent or attorney to perform a special service for a municipal corporation need not, in the absence of a statute requiring it, be evidenced by a formal ordinance, by-law, or resolution, nor is it essential that it be in writing.

Prohibition — application to lower court.

2. The rule under which a supervising court sometimes requires an applicant for a writ of prohibition first to make application to the lower court for discontinuance or vacation of the proceeding or action complained of, on the ground of lack of jurisdiction, is a discretionary one of courtesy and deference to the court below, and does not apply if it appears in any manner that such court has acted deliberately, or has considered the question of its jurisdiction and intends to proceed.

Courts — jurisdiction — pleading.

3. Where the jurisdiction of a court depends upon the existence of facts, it has no right or power to proceed or act upon a pleading which does not substantially set forth such facts, and, if it has acted upon such insufficient pleading, its claim of right to time for consideration of the sufficiency thereof does not justify or sustain its action in refusing to vacate the void order.

Injunction — against municipal action.

PETITION for a writ of prohibition to restrain respondents from enforcing an injunction which attempted to restrain petitioners from consideration of and action upon an ordinance granting a franchise to a water company, and contracting with it for a water supply. Writ awarded.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. J. E. Chilton and John Baker White for petitioners.

Messrs. B. T. Clayton, Jones, Murphy, & Ballard, Morgan & Morgan, and O. J. Van Fleet for respondents.

Poffenbarger, P., delivered the opinion of the court:

The circuit court of Kanawha county having provisionally enjoined the city of Charleston, the members of its board of affairs, and council, from consideration of a certain ordinance and action thereon, granting a franchise to the West Virginia Water and Electric Company, securing to it privileges in the city streets and alleys for pipe lines for supplying the city and its inhabitants with water, obligating the city to take a certain number of hydrants at specified rentals, and prescribing rates and regulations for supply of water to the inhabitants of the city, and from passing said ordinance, it being then pending in the council, the city and others of the defendants applied to this court for a writ of prohibition to restrain the judge of said court and the plaintiffs in the said bill from enforcing the injunction and from further procedure upon the bill.

Before this action was taken, certain members of the council and the West Virginia Water & Electric Company appeared and filed demurrers to the bill. Chilton, MacCorkle, & Chilton tendered a demurrer on behalf of the city, the board of affairs, and council, which was objected to on the ground of alleged lack of authority in the attorneys to appear for the city, and the court took the objection under advisement. Thereupon and on the same day, four members of the council moved the court to dissolve the injunction, which motion the court overruled. The return sets up the alleged failure of the city, its board of affairs, and council, to appear and demur to the bill or move to dissolve the injunction, as matter for abatement of the rule, and an affidavit was filed showing a search of the records of the meetings of the board of affairs had disclosed no order or entry appointing or employing J. E. Chilton, a member of said law firm, who actually appeared for the city, an attorney for the board of affairs, or any authority in him to appear on behalf of the city in said cause, or to appear for it in this proceeding to prohibit the prosecution of the injunction bill.

The effort to show such lack of authority apparently proceeds upon the assumption that the employment of the attorney must have been made a matter of record. He is not acting in the capacity of an officer, either elective or appointive. He is a mere employee or agent, and a municipal corporation, in the absence of a statutory restriction upon its powers, may make verbal contracts for such employment, just as private corporations and individuals may. "The contract need not be in writing, except where so required by statute or ordinance. So the employment, in the absence of statutory or charter provisions, need not necessarily be by a formal ordinance, by-law, or resolution. . . . An implied request for services, as well as an implied promise to pay therefor, may be raised against a municipality, the same as against an individual, by circumstances." 28 Cyc. 586. A statute requiring all officers not otherwise elected to be elected by the general council does not apply to mere clerks and employees, or laborers, whose appointment may be made in such manner as the council shall designate. Lowry v. Lexington, 113 Ky. 763, 68 S. W. 1109. That such contracts, to be valid, need not be made matter of record, is well established. Ross v. Madison, 1 Ind. 281, 48 Am. Dec. 361; Langedale v. Bonton, 12 Ind. 469; Indianapolis v. Skeen, 17 Ind. 628; McCabe v. Fountain County, 46 Ind. 383; Logansport v. Dykeman, 116 Ind. 15, 17 N. E. 587; Wilt v. Redkey, 29 Ind. App. 199, 64 N. E. 228. A verbal employment of an attorney was made in Board of Excise v. Sackrider, 35 N. Y. 154, and the court found no fault with the employment on account of its form, or rather for lack of writing or matter entered of record, but declared the action of the attorney in bringing the suit void, because the commissioners had not first determined to institute it, but had left it in his discretion to do so. As the board of affairs clearly had the power to make a verbal contract of employment with the attorney to represent the city, the failure of its record to disclose an order, resolution, or entry of such employment does not disprove its existence, and no other evidence is offered. When an attorney appears for a client, there is a presumption in favor of his employment which must be overcome with proof before the court can deny him the privilege of representing his client. State v. Ehrlick, 65 W. Va. 700, 23 L.R.A. (N.S.) 691, 64 N. E. 935; Mullan v. United States, 118 U. S. 271, 30 L. ed. 170, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1041; Western P. R. Co. v. United States, 107 U. S. 526, 108 U. S. 512, 27 L. ed. 621, 806, 2 Sup. Ct. Rep. 802, 862. The general rule is that the question of an attorney's authority to represent an alleged client can only be raised on a motion directly made for that purpose, and supported by affidavit, after notice of the motion. 4 Cyc. 931. In view of these principles and authorities, it is clear that the authority of the attorney to appear here for the city of Charleston has not been successfully denied or questioned.

If the circuit court had cognizance of the matter in which the attorney appeared, the judge thereof would likely have been entitled to time for consideration of the objection informally made; but, if the cause was not within its jurisdiction, he could not bring it within it by his claim of right to time for consideration of the objection. Courts always pass upon questions of their own jurisdiction at their peril, and an erroneous decision on that point avails nothing. However, as the court's alleged lack of jurisdiction was brought to its attention by the demurrer of four members of council and the corporation seeking the franchise, and the motion of the four members of the council to dissolve the injunction, it is immaterial whether the city properly filed its demurrer or not. It is not the purpose of the rule, under which we sometimes require want of jurisdiction in the lower court to be brought to its attention as a condition precedent to the application for the writ of prohibition, to require the question of jurisdiction to be there litigated and decided for review here, but only to give that court an opportunity to correct its act in excess of its jurisdiction, due to misapprehension or oversight or some other adventitious circumstance. The rule is a mere exercise of the discretion of this court, and is not in any sense rigid or arbitrary. Its application is clearly unnecessary in any instance in which the intention of the inferior court to act beyond its jurisdiction is made apparent in any way. The rule was first announced by this court in Board of Education v. Holt, 51 W. Va. 435, 41 S. E. 337, and it was there characterized as a rule of courtesy, or deference to the judge below. In Board of Education v. Holt, 54 W. Va. 167, 46 S. E. 134, it was not applied because deliberate action on the part of the judge was apparent. It was applied in Jennings v. Judge, 56 W. Va. 146, 49 S. E. 23, because it was apparent the decree complained of had been inadvertently entered. At least there was nothing to show it had not been so entered. The necessity of application to the court below in any case was denied in Swinburn v. Smith, 15 W. Va. 483; Hein v. Smith, 13 W. Va. 358; Culpeper v. Gorrell, 20 Gratt. 484. Here it appears beyond question that the court's alleged want of jurisdiction had been brought to its attention. Demurrers to the bill, sufficient to raise the jurisdictional question, had been filed, and the court had overruled a motion to dissolve the injunction, made by the parties to the bill, having a right to appear and make the motion. Hence there is a clear lack of just grounds for application of the discretionary rule of courtesy.

Suing as residents, citizens, qualified voters, householders, and freeholders, the plaintiffs charged in their bill intent and purpose on the part of the council of the city to create an unconstitutional debt by the passage of the ordinance. This charge was founded upon provisions in the proposed ordinance or franchise binding the city to rent from the company 170 fire hydrants at an annual rental of $38 each, payable at the rate of $9.50 quarterly for each hydrant, making a total of $1,615 per quarter; such rentals to be paid during the life of the contract or franchise, an absolute period of thirty years and an additional conditional one of twenty years. This contract, if consummated, would impose an annual charge for water hydrants of $6,460, and there is no suggestion of insufficiency of the revenue or income of the city to pay it. It does not impose an indebtedness of 30 or 50 times the amount, which, added to the existing indebtedness, might make a sum in excess of that permitted to the city by the Constitution and statutes. Allison v. Chester, 69 W. Va. 533, 37 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1042, 72 S. E. 472, Ann. Cas. 1913B, 1174. As this provision does not create an indebtedness within the statutory or constitutional limitations, nothing in the charter of the city requires the matter to be submitted to a vote of the people, and the charge of invalidity or excess of authority, based upon failure so to submit the proposition, is wholly unsustained and without foundation. That the contract is intended to run beyond the terms of office of the present council and board of affairs does not make the passage thereof an ultra vires act, for nothing in the charter or general statutes prohibits the making of such a contract. The bill contains a number of allegations as to excessive or extravagant charges for service; but these are all matters clearly within the jurisdiction and power of the council. A provision for the purchase of the plant at the expiration of thirty years is said to be illegal because it requires the city to pay for the plant on the basis of its productive value; but this allegation is contradicted by the provision itself, exhibited with the bill. It gives the city an option of purchase "at a fair valuation," to be determined by arbitration; but the arbitrators are authorized to take into consideration the productive value of the waterworks company's rights and privileges and property, but not the value of the unexpired term of the franchise. A charge of perpetuity in the franchise is founded upon a provision requiring the company, at the expiration of the franchise, to continue to furnish water to the city and its inhabitants at the rates and upon the conditions therein prescribed until other rates may be agreed upon. Clearly this provision contemplates nothing more than continued operation at the option and will of the city. It is a provision for the benefit of the city and its inhabitants. It enables them to obtain water from the company at the expiration of the franchise, or pending settlement of the terms of purchase, in case of necessity therefor, due to the inability of the city or its unpreparedness to obtain water from other sources. The right of the company to occupy the streets and furnish water is expressly limited to fifty years at the most, and the right to shorten this period by purchase is reserved to the city. Notwithstanding the charge of insolvency of the applicant for the franchise, the ability to perform the service required of it is clearly a question for the council. The city is not bound to pay anything unless the services are performed. Moreover, failure to comply with conditions and covenants in favor of the city and its inhabitants is made a ground of forfeiture by the terms of the franchise. Neither the charter nor any statute prescribes any standard or measure of financial ability of persons or corporations applying for franchises. A clause in the franchise providing a scheme or method of co-operation between the applicant and the city for the licensing of plumbers is said to amount to a delegation of the police powers of the city, but an examination of this provision shows a reservation of full control of these licenses by the city. There is no surrender of its power of revocation of licenses, and applicants have a right to appeal to the board of affairs in cases of denial of their applications by the company. A charge of exclusiveness in the franchise and intent to establish a monopoly is founded upon a provision binding the city not to maintain or operate any waterworks plant or system in the city, except the system now owned by the waterworks company. This provision would fall under the rule of strict construction. Parkersburg Gas Co. v. Parkersburg, 30 W. Va. 435, 4 S. E. 650, and, under that rule, it would not be construed as denying to the city power to grant a rival franchise. Its plain purpose is to prevent the city from becoming itself a rival of the grantee of the franchise. The bill contains no charge of fraud or corruption on the part of the council, but it says large and powerful influences have been brought to bear through the public press and otherwise upon the members of the council, and that deceit, fraud, and misrepresentations have been resorted to in order to deceive the people. There is nothing in this charge inconsistent with honest action on the part of the council. Hence the allegation has no semblance of a charge of fraud or corruption on their part.

In the argument, sufficiency of the allegations of the bill to show acts ultra vires, or to make out a case of fraud, was not vigorously insisted upon. Their insufficiency was rather tacitly admitted, but the right of the court below to let the injunction stand pending consideration of the sufficiency of the bill was insisted upon and constituted the shibboleth of the argument. This position is altogether untenable. Though not often so expressed in terms by the courts, the rule is that, in passing upon the question of its own jurisdiction, a court always acts at its peril. Its decision upon that question affords it no protection from supervisory process from a higher court, and confers no right upon the parties in whose favor the decision was rendered. Had not the injunction been awarded and the exercise of jurisdiction on the bill made effective, the judge of the circuit court could no doubt have taken time for consideration of the question. He could deliberate as to whether he would act. But he had already acted upon the bill and granted the relief prayed for. If the bill conferred no jurisdiction, his claim of right to time for consideration of the demurrer came after action, and, insisting upon the right to consider, he refused first to undo what he had done without authority. Being wrongfully in the domain of another, he insisted upon staying there pending consideration of his right of occupancy. Though it may not have been expressly stated in the return to the rule or in argument in the case of Board of Education v. Holt, 51 W. Va. 435, 41 S. E. 337, such was the position of the judge of the circuit court in that case. He refused to entertain a motion to dismiss, and postponed the hearing to a future time. This was a tacit, if not express, assertion of right to time for consideration. This court denied any such right by saying his action in refusing dismissal was equivalent to a determination in favor of jurisdiction, and subjected him to the writ of prohibition. Such appears to have been the interpretation of the rule in Jennings v. Judge, 56 W. Va. 146, 49 S. E. 23, in which the circuit court was accorded mere opportunity to vacate a void decree. It says to the effect that, if the judge refuses to do so upon request, he will be immediately subjected to the writ of prohibition. To warrant interposition by the writ of prohibition, it is only necessary to show that the inferior tribunal is actually proceeding or about to proceed in some matter in which it has no rightful jurisdiction. Hassinger v. Holt, 47 W. Va. 348, 34 S. E. 728; High, Extr. Legal Rem. § 780. Thus stated by courts everywhere, the terms of the rule preclude right to time for consideration after action, and authorize prevention of action without any allowance of time for consideration. In other words, a court proceeded against by prohibition decides in favor of its own jurisdiction at its peril, whether its decision be in the form of an act done or a claim of right to time for consideration, with intent to act pending that consideration. Its action is not sustained by reason of the necessity of legal questions in the process of the unauthorized act. In McConiha v. Guthrie, 21 W. Va. 134, the lower court, in affirming the right of a railroad company to take land within 20 feet of a dwelling, found it necessary to pass upon intricate questions of statutory interpretation and construction. Nevertheless this court awarded prohibition. In Ensign Mfg. Co. v. Carroll, 30 W. Va. 532, 4 S. E. 782, the action of the court below in perpetually enjoining a judgment involved many intricate questions; but the necessity of their decision afforded no protection from the writ of prohibition. The proposition thus affirmed is fundamental and its soundness so apparent and self-evident that it is seldom questioned.

That allegations of fact, when necessary to vest jurisdiction in a court, must be sufficient, is an obvious corollary of the proposition just asserted. To say the court may act upon insufficient allegations, because they may be made sufficient by amendment, is clearly inconsistent with the rule or principle. The facts stated do not confer jurisdiction, and ability to amend is mere matter of surmise and conjecture. Nothing in the view of the court establishes it. Hence it is not a fact within the knowledge of the court. If it is permitted to act under such circumstances, it clearly acts without jurisdiction. To permit action upon such a bill or pleading will enable the court at any time to exercise jurisdiction in cases in which it has none. If it has power to retain for amendment, and act upon the pleading, pending the process of amendment, the time allowable for amendment would be within its discretion, and not reviewable. It might take a week, a month, or a year, during which there would be action without jurisdiction shown. The power to proceed at all depends upon certain facts, and they are not shown and may never be. If a court could act upon such a pleading, there would never be any lack of jurisdiction except in those cases in which it is denied by some statute or principle of law, and is in no sense dependent upon facts.

Assuming for the purposes of this case, without deciding it, that citizens and taxpayers may enjoin the council of a city from passing an ordinance, because the proposed act, when done, will be one ultra vires, and that this may be done without any conclusive showing that the pending ordinance will be passed, or an averment of facts showing intent on the part of the council to pass it, as contradistinguished from a mere claim that it will be, and that citizens and taxpayers, without showing any special interest or injury peculiar to them and distinct from that which the general public will suffer, will suffer by reason of the act, the question raised by the bill is whether or not citizens and taxpayers may enjoin a city council from proceeding to consider and act upon a proposed ordinance without a disclosure of lack of power or jurisdiction in the council to consider and act upon it. In other words, the question is whether citizens and taxpayers may, by an appeal to the court, control the discretion, judgment, and action of a city council within its own jurisdiction. That they cannot do so is plainly apparent. A municipal corporation is vested by law with certain powers which it may exercise as freely as a court may exercise its own jurisdiction, or an individual his own right respecting his property and privileges accorded by law. Within the limitations prescribed by law, a citizen may do what he pleases with his property and make such contracts as he sees fit. His discretion respecting these matters, whatever it may be called, is beyond the power of control by courts. So is that of a municipal council. Such matters as have been intrusted to it or are determinable by its discretion, no matter whether that discretion is legislative or administrative, belongs to it and to no other tribunal. If its discretion is reviewable or controllable by the citizens under a referendum statute, their right of veto or control is a limitation upon the city's powers; but, if power has been vested in the city without any such limitation, the absence thereof affords no ground for intervention or control by the courts. If a municipal corporation is exceeding its powers, courts may, under some circumstances, intervene by injunction or otherwise, and prevent such action. What these circumstances are and what interest the citizen must have in order to confer such right upon him, it is not necessary here to inquire. It suffices to say that, in those instances, the jurisdiction of the court commences with the lack of jurisdiction in the city or its governing body, and the court cannot proceed until it has been shown. In the absence thereof, it has no power to interfere by certiorari, appeal, injunction, or any other remedy. County Ct. v. Boreman, 34 W. Va. 87, 11 S. E. 747; County Ct. v. Boreman, 34 W. Va. 362, 12 S. E. 490; County Ct. v. Armstrong, 34 W. Va. 326, 12 S. E. 488; Miller v. County Ct. 34 W. Va. 285, 12 S. E. 702; State ex rel. Boggs v. County Ct. 33 W. Va. 589, 11 S. E. 72; Fleming v. Guthrie, 32 W. Va. 1, 3 L.R.A. 53, 25 Am. St. Rep. 792, 9 S. E. 23. Nor has equity jurisdiction to enjoin every illegal act on the part of a governing body or public officer. Mann v. County Ct. 58 W. Va. 651, 52 S. E. 776; Morgan v. County Ct. 53 W. Va. 372, 44 S. E. 182. Ordinarily, in the absence of a statutory right of interference, a citizen must show, in addition to the illegality, an injury to himself from the illegal act, peculiar and distinct from that suffered by the public in general.

Upon these principles and conclusions, the writ of prohibition prayed for was awarded.

L. H. GRUBBE

v.

W. F. LAHAY et al., Appts.

(156 Wis. 29, 145 N. W. 207.)

Payment — note of one partner — release of firm.

An express agent who, after delivering to one member of a firm C. O. D. packages

Note. — Note or other commercial paper of individual partner as payment of firm debt which he had not previously assumed.

This note is supplemental to an earlier note on the same question, to Burdett v. Hayman, 15 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1019.

It should be observed that cases involving settlement of firm debts by individual paper upon dissolution of the firm are ex- 51 L.R.A.(N.S.)

without payment of the charges, contrary to the directions of the other partner, takes the duebill or note of the partner to whom delivery was made in satisfaction of the debt of the firm, thereby discharges the obligation of the other partner.

(February 3, 1914.)

APPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Outagamie County in plaintiff's favor in an action to recover a loss sustained by him in delivering to one member of a firm C. O. D. packages without payment of the charges, contrary to the directions of the other partner, which plaintiff was required to make good to the express company. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. E. T. Fairchild, with Mr. Francis S. Bradford, for appellants:

Wells Fargo knew, when it accepted the goods for shipment, that there were others than Lahay interested in the contract, and of course their authorized agent knew the same fact. It had no right to breach this contract without the consent of every person interested; but, having done so, neither it nor the man who stands in its place can recover.

Usher v. Waddingham, 62 Conn. 412, 26 Atl. 538.

Whether or not Grubbe accepted Lahay's duebill or note in full satisfaction and payment of the debt is a question for the jury.

Eastman v. Porter, 14 Wis. 40; McDonald v. Provident Sav. Life Assur. Soc. 108 Wis. 213, 81 Am. St. Rep. 885, 84 N. W. 154.

There was a waiver on the part of Grubbe as against the firm, and the relinquishment of a known right.

Pabst Brewing Co. v. Milwaukee, 126 Wis. 120, 105 N. W. 563; Dunn v. Superior, 148 Wis. 645, 135 N. W. 145; Swedish American Nat. Bank v. Koebernick, 136 Wis. 473, 128 Am. St. Rep. 1090, 117 N. W. 1020; Voss v. Northwestern Nat. L. Ins Co. 137 Wis. 502, 118 N. W. 212.

Mr. Julius P. Frank, for respondent:

The rule that every action must be prosecuted in the name of the real party in interest is imperative; but this rule is satisfied when it is shown that the party suing cluded from this as well as the former note on this question.

In general as to payment by commercial paper, see note to A. Leschen & Sons Rope Co. v. Mayflower Gold Min. & Reduction Co. 35 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1.

Since the preparation of the former note on this question the general rule therein indicated that a promissory note made by one partner alone for a debt of the firm before dissolution does not, if he had not is the one who has the right to control and receive the recovery.

Landauer v. Espenhain, 95 Wis. 169, 70 N. W. 287; Chase v. Dodge, 111 Wis. 70, 86 N. W. 548; Palmer v. Banfield, 86 Wis. 441, 58 N. W. 1090; Gross v. Heckert, 120 Wis. 314, 97 N. W. 952; 14 Enc. Pl. & Pr. 710.

As a general rule, prima facie the acts of every partner who does an act for carrying on in the usual way business of the kind carried on by the firm in which he is a member binds the firm, though in point of fact such acts were not authorized by the other partners.

Seaman v. Ascherman, 57 Wis. 547, 15 N. W. 788.

In commercial partnership the power of a partner to bind the firm may generally be determined by the court as a question of law.

22 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 147; Judge v. Braswell, 13 Bush, 67, 26 Am. Rep. 185, 11 Mor. Min. Rep. 508.

An individual promissory note of a partner, given for a partnership debt, does not operate as a payment of such debt, and does not release the other partners therefrom, unless the creditor agrees to accept such note as a payment of the debt, and to release the other partners.

Burdett v. Greer (Burdett v. Hayman) 63 W. Va. 515, 15 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1019, 129 Am. St. Rep. 1014, 60 S. E. 497, 15 Ann. Cas. 935; Hœflinger v. Wells, 47 Wis. 628, 3 N. W. 589.

previously agreed to assume the debt, release the other partners from the debt, unless the creditor agrees to accept it as payment and release the other partners, was followed in Craswell v. Pure Bred Cattle Commission Co. 148 Iowa, 9, 126 N. W. 908. It was said that no discharge or satisfaction or release is to be implied from the mere acceptance of such a note.

It was held also in Craswell v. Pure Bred Cattle Commission Co. supra, that testimony of the maker of the note as to whether the other members of the firm understood that the giving of the note was a settlement of the indebtedness of the firm was properly excluded in an action against the firm for the amount of the debt.

And in Lee v. Larkin, 125 App. Div. 302, 109 N. Y. Supp. 480, it was held that a partner was liable on an original note given for an indebtedness of the firm, although other partners had executed renewal notes which had not yet been paid, and the original notes had been returned in exchange for the new note. The rule, it was said, was well settled, that the individual note of one of two partners will not operate as payment of the partnership debt unless expressly received as payment; that the individual note thus given is treated the same as if a debtor should give to his

Barnes, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendants were copartners doing business at Appleton under the firm name of Lahay & Company. Their business consisted of taking orders for $16 suits of clothes made by the International Tailoring Company of Chicago. The plaintiff was the agent of the Wells Fargo Express Company at Appleton. The defendant Pierce lived in Milwaukee, and took no active part in the management of the business. He first directed that the clothes be shipped on open account to the firm, but, learning that Lahay was not paying the bills as he should, undertook to protect himself by directing the shipments to be made by express, C. O. D., and they were so made. Grubbe, without Pierce's knowledge or consent, and against the rules of his employer, delivered goods to the amount of $418 to Lahay without collecting the amount called for on delivery of the goods. He was required by the express company to make good this sum, and sues both partners to recover his loss. The court directed a verdict in plaintiff's favor. Grubbe was advised by Lahay that Pierce was a partner in the business and was responsible, but testified that he did not know whether he was so informed before or after the credit was furnished. He also testified that before the credit was extended he knew that Pierce was in the firm. On July 25, 1912, Grubbe took a duebill signed by W. F. Lahay for the amount of the account. Later creditor the note of a third person; the rule in that regard being that where a creditor accepted the obligation of a third party for a debt contracted contemporaneously, there was a presumption that it was taken in payment, and the burden of proving the contrary rested upon him who asserted it; but that where the obligation was received for a precedent debt, the presumption was that it was not taken in payment, and the burden of proof shifted accordingly.

It was also held in Lee v. Larkin, supra, that the return of the original note in exchange for the new note was not sufficient to change the presumption that the new note was not taken in payment of the debt.

In Union Stove Works v. Robinson, 113 N. Y. Supp. 608, it was held that a finding that a note by a partner had been received in discharge of the debt of the firm was sustained by the evidence, and would not be disturbed, the partner who gave the individual note testifying that it was given and accepted as payment of the balance due from the firm, it appearing that the note had been indorsed and discounted by the creditor, and no evidence of a return or offer to return the note being given.

R. E. H.

he took a note signed by Lahay for the amount due, and attempted to negotiate it. He was asked if he took the note in settlement of the indebtedness, and replied: "No, sir; I took it as an accommodation note to pay the account." He also testified that he did not take Lahay for the amount of the bills, but took Lahay & Company. One Steidl, who had been employed in defendants' store, testified that Grubbe wanted to learn Lahay's address because he thought Lahay was honest, and he might get $20 or $25 on account from him from time to time. Lahay testified that plaintiff accepted a duebill signed by him individually for the amount of the claim, and agreed to take him (Lahay) for the amount of the debt. The note was destroyed, and it does not appear when it became due.

Under this testimony a jury might find that plaintiff accepted the duebill and note of Lahay for the amount of the debt with the understanding and agreement that Pierce should be released. Where a creditor accepts an evidence of indebtedness from one of two persons jointly liable, and informs the debtor who gives such evidence that he accepts him for the debt, the inference may reasonably be drawn that the creditor intends to release the other debtor. It was for the jury to draw such inference in this case, if the alleged agreement was valid.

The briefs on file give us no assistance on the most difficult question in the case. Numerous authorities hold that where a creditor accepts the note or obligation of a third person under an agreement to discharge one primarily liable, the agreement is valid. Challoner v. Boyington, 83 Wis. 399, 53 N. W. 694; Willow River Lumber Co. v. Luger Furniture Co. 102 Wis. 636, 78 N. W. 762; Davenport v. Schram, 9 Wis. 120; Allis v. Meadow Spring Distilling Co. 67 Wis. 16, 29 N. W. 543, 30 N. W. 300; First Nat. Bank v. Case, 63 Wis. 504, 22 N. W. 833. There are authorities which hold that the taking by a creditor of a note or obligation of one partner under an agreement to discharge a copartner jointly liable does not preclude the creditor from proceeding against all the partners to collect the debt. It is said that the party giving the obligation is simply agreeing to pay his own debt, and that the creditor receives no benefit from the promise made by him to release one of his debtors, and therefore it is nudum pactum. Cole v. Sackett, 1 Hill, 516; Waydell v. Luer, 5 Hill, 448; Frentress v. Markle, 2 G. Greene, 553; Farly v. Burt, 68 Iowa, 716, 28 N. W. 51 L.R.A.(N.S.)

35; Walstrom v. Hopkins, 103 Pa. 118; Morrison v. Kendall, 6 Ind. App. 212, 33 N. E. 370. The preponderance of authority is, however, to the contrary. The English cases hold that the taking of a note or obligation of one partner for a partnership debt, coupled with an agreement to accept the same as a payment and to discharge the other parties liable for the debt, does in fact discharge them. Thompson v. Percival, 5 Barn. & Ad. 925, 3 Nev. & M. 167, 3 L. J. K. B. N. S. 98, 19 Eng. Rul. Cas. 728; Lyth v. Ault, L. R. 7 Exch. 669, 21 L. J. Exch. N. S. 217. These cases hold that the transaction constitutes an accord and satisfaction.

Chief Justice Marshall, in speaking of the discharge of one of two joint debtors in the manner above specified, says: "The note of one of the parties, or of a third person, may, by agreement, be received in payment. The doctrine of nudum pactum does not apply to such a case; for a man may, if such be his will, discharge his debtor without any consideration. But, if it did apply, there may be inducements to take a note from one partner, liquidating and evidencing a claim on a firm, which might be a sufficient consideration for discharging the firm." Sheehy v. Mandeville, 6 Cranch, 253, 264, 3 L. ed. 215, 219.

The following cases hold directly or inferentially that where the note or obligation of one partner is tendered to and accepted by the creditor, and the latter agrees to look to such partner alone for his debt, the remaining partner or partners are discharged: Collyer v. Moulton, 9 R. I. 90, 98 Am. Dec. 370; Motley v. Wickoff, 113 Mich. 231, 71 N. W. 520; Harris v. Lindsay, 4 Wash. C. C. 271, Fed. Cas. No. 6,124; Wadhams v. Page, 6 Wash. 103, 32 Pac. 1068; First Nat. Bank v. Cheney, 114 Ala. 536, 21 So. 1002; Hoopes v. McCan, 19 La. Ann. 201; Lewis v. Davidson, 39 Tex. 660; Burdett v. Greer (Burdett v. Hayman) 63 W. Va. 515, 15 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1019, 129 Am. St. Rep. 1014, 60 S. E. 497, 15 Ann. Cas. 935. Other cases which lean in the same direction, but which were decided on somewhat different facts, are: Venable v. Stevens, 94 Ga. 281, 21 S. E. 516; Hellman v. Schwartz, 44 Ill. App. 84; Rusk v. Gray, 83 Ind. 589; Stone v. Chamberlin, 20 Ga. 259; Frye & Bruhn v. Phillips, 46 Wash. 190, 89 Pac. 559, 93 Pac. 668.

There seems to be but one case decided in this court which involves the question under consideration. Hæfingier v. Wells, 47 Wis. 628, 3 N. W. 589. In this case it is held that, where the individual note of one partner is taken for a loan made to a firm, the presumption is that it was not taken in payment. In the opinion it is said: "And if the jury or the court should find as a fact that the money was borrowed by and loaned to the firm, and upon its credit, then the taking of the individual note of one member of the firm would not be a payment of such firm debt, unless it was affirmatively shown that such note was taken in payment of the same." The case of Sheehy v. Mandeville, supra, is cited to the proposition quoted, and the court evidently intended to follow Chief Justice Marshall's decision and hold that such an agreement as we are considering would not be nudum pactum.

Considering what our own court has said upon the subject and the authorities elsewhere, we think it should be held that, if plaintiff accepted a duebill or note from Lahay for the amount of the firm debt, agreeing expressly at the same time to accept Lahay solely for the debt, such acceptance and agreement made a valid contract, which operated to discharge Pierce.

If it should be conceded that there was no valid consideration to support such an agreement, we still think the question of whether or not such an arrangement had been made should have been submitted to the jury. Surely the plaintiff had the right to waive his claim against Pierce. There are some equitable considerations which might well induce him to do so. Pierce had tried to protect himself against the very thing that happened, by directing the goods to be shipped C. O. D., and it was only because plaintiff failed to do what Pierce had a perfect right to assume he would do that Pierce became liable. Some of our cases have defined a waiver to be an intentional relinquishment of a known right. Monroe Waterworks Co. v. Monroe, 110 Wis. 11, 22, 85 N. W. 685; Swedish American Nat. Bank v. Koebernick, 136 Wis. 473, 479, 128 Am. St. Rep. 1090, 117 N. W. 1020; Dunn v. Superior, 148 Wis. 636, 645, 135 N. W. 145. Other cases have gone still farther, but for present purposes the cases cited go far enough. If it should be found that plaintiff made the agreement claimed with full knowledge of the facts, it might also be found that he waived his claim against Pierce. Consaulus v. McConihe, 17 N. Y. S. R. 538, 2 N. Y. Supp. 89, and id. 119 N. Y. 652, 23 N. E. 1150.

EX PARTE WONG WING.

(— Cal. —, 138 Pac. 695.)

Constitutional law — limiting hours of labor — laundry.

Forbidding labor in a public laundry from 6 P. M. to 7 A. M. is not an unconstitutional.

Note.—Constitutionality of legislative limitation of hours of labor.

In line with EX PARTE WONG WING, upholding an ordinance limiting hours of labor in a public laundry to eleven hours a day, the constitutionality of the woman's ten-hour law of 1909, making ten hours in every twenty-four the labor limit for women in any mechanical establishment, factory, or laundry, is upheld in People v. Bowes-Allegretti Co. 244 Ill. 557, 91 N. E. 701, as applied to a paper box manufacture, on the strength of W. C. Ritchie & Co. v. Wayman, 244 Ill. 509, 27 L.R.A.(N.S.) 994, 91 N. E. 695, set out in earlier note in 35 L.R.A.(N.S.) 628.

So, an act limiting the employment of females in certain establishments, including hotels, is held in Ex parte Miller, 162 Cal. 687, 124 Pac. 427, not an improper police regulation as being unreasonable and unnecessary for the promotion and preservation of health; nor is it special legislation because there are other equally injurious occupations followed by women that are not regulated, such as employment in lodging and boarding houses; nor does the exemption of persons employed in harvesting, curing, canning, or drying perishable fruits or vegetables from the operation of the law make an improper discrimination; nor does the act, the general subject of which is the regulation of female employment, embrace two subjects because of the subdivision by the particular details stated in the title.

So, an Indiana statute which prohibits the employment of a person under sixteen years of age in a manufacturing establishment for more than sixty hours in any one week, or for more than ten hours in any one day, except for the purpose of making a shorter day of the last day of the week, is held in Inland Steel Co. v. Yedinak, 172 Ind. 423, 139 Am. St. Rep. 389, 87 N. E. 229, not invalid as class legislation, the classification being natural, just, and reasonable.

So, a statute restricting the right to employ laborers in manufacturing and repairing establishments to ten hours per day except in cases of emergency, or where pubtutional interference with liberty or property rights.

(January 16, 1914.)

APPPLICATION for a writ of habeas corpus to secure petitioner's release from custody to which he had been committed for violation of an ordinance limiting the hours of labor in public laundries. Writ discharged.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Leon Samuels, William M. Madden, and Knight & Haggerty for petitioner.

Mr. Maxwell McNutt for respondent.

Per Curiam:

Petitioner attacks as unconstitutional a certain ordinance of the city and county of San Francisco which limits the hours of labor in public laundries.

Wong Wing was charged with and con-lic necessity requires, does not deprive the proprietors of their liberty or property without due process of law, deny them a remedy by due course of law, or the equal protection of the law, nor abridge their privileges or immunities; nor is such a statute void for unreasonableness. State v. J. J. Newman Lumber Co. 102 Miss. 802, 45 L.R.A.(N.S.) 851, 59 So. 923, affirmed on rehearing, on suggestion of error, in 103 Miss. 263, 45 L.R.A.(N.S.) 858, 60 So. 215; Buckeye Cotton Oil Co. v. State, 103 Miss. 767, 60 So. 775.

The law limiting the hours of labor of minors and women in factories other than canning establishments, to nine hours a day and fifty-four hours a week, was held constitutional in People ex rel. Hoelderlin v. Kane, 79 Misc. 140, 139 N. Y. Supp. 350, as applied to candy factories, the exception as to canning establishments not rendering the law invalid as class legislation. "The power of the legislature," said the court, "to create a class consisting of women only, and limit their hours of labor, is established in Muller v. Oregon, 208 U. S. 412, 52 L. ed. 551, 28 Sup. Ct. Rep. 324, 13 Ann. Cas. 957 [set out in 12 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1131]. That the limitation may be to fifty-four hours a week is decided by State v. Somerville, 67 Wash. 638, 122 Pac. 324 [set out in 40 L.R.A.(N.S.) 894] and Withey v. Bloem, 163 Mich. 419, 35 L.R.A.(N.S.) 628, 128 S. W. 913; and in these two cases the regulation was held valid as applied to the manufacture of paper boxes and seals for locking freight cars, occupations apparently as light and innocuous as candy making."

The employment of women for more than ten hours in any day or more than fifty-six hours a week in any manufacturing or mechanical establishment may be forbidden, as is done by Massachusetts Laws 1909, chap. 514, § 48, which makes the exception that a different apportionment of the hours may be made for the sole purpose of making a shorter day's work for one day of the week, without infringing the liberty of contract assured by the 14th Amendment to the Federal Constitution. Riley v. Massachusetts, 232 U. S. 671, 58 L. ed. —, 34 Sup. Ct. Rep. 469, same case below discussed in 40 L.R.A.(N.S.) 893.

So, forbidding the employment of women at a time other than is stated in the notice, which the employer must post in a conspicuous place, as is done by Massachusetts Laws 1909, chap. 514, § 48, regulating the 51 L.R.A.(N.S.)

hours of labor for women, is not such an arbitrary and unreasonable provision as to be wanting in the due process of law secured by the 14th Amendment to the Federal Constitution. Ibid.

An amendment seeking to enlarge the number of callings in which the hours of employment of women is limited by a former act is held in People v. Chicago, 256 Ill. 558, 43 L.R.A.(N.S.) 954, 100 N. E. 194, Ann. Cas. 1913E, 305, not to be in conflict with a constitutional requirement that no act shall embrace more than one subject, which shall be expressed in its title, because the title merely recites that it is an act to amend certain sections of the former act and the title, while the amendment of the title appears as a section of the statute.

But a statute as follows: "That no factory manufacturing establishment, office building, warehouse, workshop, or any business establishment keeping open or running day and night, shall permit, except in case of emergency, or compel, the stationary firemen therein employed to work consecutively in any one day more than eight hours; that a full day's labor shall be composed of eight hours and no more; provided that the provisions of this act shall not apply to stationary firemen or assistants employed in the petroleum industry or in any cotton gin or any sugar plantation or in the sawmill industry," is held in State v. Barba, 132 La. 768, 45 L.R.A.(N.S.) 546, 81 So. 784, to be repugnant to the 14th Amendment of the Constitution of the United States in that said act denies the liberty of contract in relation to labor, and the equal protection of the laws guaranteed by said Amendment, as construed by the Supreme Court of the United States. The expressed exemption in the act of steam plants, such as oil refineries and sawmills, works an unjust discrimination against other plants operated by steam; and the division of such plants into two classes, the one running day and night, and the other running day or night, is clearly arbitrary, and furnishes no reasonable basis for discriminating against the former in the matter of the hours of labor.

victed of misdemeanor consisting of a violation of the provisions of § 1 of ordinance No. 144 (new series) of the board of supervisors of said city and county, and of § 4 of said ordinance as amended by § 1 of ordinance No. 2298 (new series) of said board, in that he ironed clothes in a public laundry between the hours of 6 o'clock P. M. of a certain day and 7 o'clock A. M. of the following day. The 1st section of the ordinance No. 144 prescribes that on and after the passage of that by-law it shall be unlawful for any person, firm, or corporation to establish, maintain, or carry on the business of a public laundry or a public washhouse where clothes or other articles are cleaned for hire within the limits of San Francisco, without having first complied with the conditions thereafter specified. Section 4 as amended is as follows: "No person or persons owning or employed in the public laundries or public washhouses provided for in § 1 of this ordinance shall wash, mangle, starch, iron, or do any other work on clothes between the hours of 6 o'clock P. M. and 7 o'clock A. M. nor upon any portion of that day known as Sunday."

The sole question presented by this writ relates to the reasonableness and constitutionality of the hours of labor prescribed by § 4 as amended. We are not concerned with that part of the section prohibiting work on Sunday, nor with another provision of the ordinance requiring that public laundries which open upon a public thoroughfare shall be so constructed as to permit an unobstructed view of their interiors during working hours. Our only task is that of determining whether or not the limitation of the hours of labor in public laundries within the city and county of San Francisco to the period between 7 o'clock in the morning and 6 o'clock at night is an unreasonable exercise of the police power. This court and the Supreme Court of the United States have declared constitutional an ordinance very similar to the one before us, where the restriction upon the hours of labor required the cessation of work in public laundries between the hours of 10 o'clock P. M. and 6 o'clock A. M. Ex parte Moynier, 65 Cal. 34, 2 Pac. 728; Barbier v. Connolly, 113 U. S. 29, 28 L. ed. 924, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 357; Soon Hing v. Crowley, 113 U. S. 707, 28 L. ed. 1146, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 730. The principles announced in those cases have been so frequently upheld, and the authorities themselves have been so often cited, that extended discussion of the opinions is quite unnecessary. In the opinions in those cases of the courts discussed the police power of the municipal government to require cessation of work in public laundries for eight hours out of every twenty-four while the ordinance here attacked by petitioner seeks to prohibit labor in such places for thirteen hours every day. It is settled law that such ordinances operate alike upon all persons and property similarly situated, and that the motives impelling the legislators who adopt such regulations are immaterial, unless it appear that the laws operate inequitably. We are therefore to determine whether the limitation of the time of labor in public laundries to eleven hours each day is a restriction so unreasonable that it invades the constitutional rights of persons engaged in the laundry business. We cannot say that it does. Very many, perhaps a majority of, occupations, employments, and forms of business in San Francisco are conducted during less than eleven working hours a day. The authority of the municipal legislature to prescribe hours of cessation from labor in laundries must be conceded, under the authorities cited above, and we think the fair measure of the extent of that power is the usual period of business activity in similar sorts of employment. We cannot say, therefore, that the restriction of the hours of activity provided in the ordinance here attacked is an unconstitutional exercise of the legislative will of the board of supervisors of the city and county of San Francisco.

Let the writ be discharged, and the prisoner remanded.

KENTUCKY COURT OF APPEALS.

LOUISE GERNERT, Appt.,

v.

CITY OF LOUISVILLE.

(155 Ky. 589, 159 S. W. 1163.)

Eminent domain — establishment of grade of city street on country road — liability.

That a highway running through suburban property has been improved by the county authorities does not prevent the construction of a street upon another grade,

Note. — Grading street formerly used as a country highway as initial establishment of grade within rule as to municipal liability for changing grade.

As shown in the note to Dickenson v. Okolona, 36 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1194 and previous notes referred to therein, one line of authorities holds that a municipality is not liable for consequential damages result-when the property is taken into the city limits, from being an original construction within the rule that the municipality is not liable for injury to abutting property by the original establishment of the grade of a street.

(October 30, 1913.)

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Common Pleas Branch, Fourth Division, of the Circuit Court for Jefferson County, in defendant's favor in an action brought to recover for damages to plaintiff's property by a change in the grade of a street. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Augustus E. Willson and Richard Priest Dietzman, for appellant:

As Jefferson county had once fixed the grade of the Bardstown road, the city of Louisville, after annexing that road, is liable for damages to abutting property owners if it changes that established grade, for:

Had the county instead of the city changed the grade, it would have been liable for such damages.

Layman v. Beeler, 113 Ky. 221, 67 S. W. 995; Moore v. Lawrence County, 143 Ky. 450, 136 S. W. 1031.

The city is merely the governmental successor of the county as to annexed territory.

Louisville v. Hall, 28 Ky. L. Rep. 1064, 91 S. W. 1133.

The change of grade of the Bardstown road was a change of grade, and not the fixing of the original grade, under § 242 of the Kentucky Constitution.

Louisville v. Hegan, 20 Ky. L. Rep. 1532, 49 S. W. 532; Barfield v. Gleason, 111 Ky. 491, 63 S. W. 964; Owensboro v. Hope, 128 Ky. 524, 15 L.R.A.(N.S.) 996, 108 S. W. 873; Henderson v. McClain, 102 Ky. 402, 39 L.R.A. 349, 43 S. W. 700; McHenry v. Selva, 99 Ky. 232, 35 S. W. 645.

Mr. Pendleton Beckley, with Mr. Leon P. Lewis, for appellee:

When a county road is taken into the city limits by annexation, and the grade of that road is fixed for the first time by the city in converting it into a city street, such establishment of the grade and making of the street is original construction within the rule exempting municipalities from liability for consequential injury growing out of the original construction of streets.

ing from a change of grade unless it is a change for a grade previously established. Whether a grade established on a country highway is an established grade within this rule, so as to render a municipality which has afterwards included the highway within its limits liable for a change therefrom, is the question discussed in the present note. There is very little authority on the question.

In Harman v. Bluefield, 70 W. Va. 129, 73 S. E. 296, where the corporate limits of a municipality were extended so as to include a county road, and the road was used thereafter by the public on the natural grade as a public street for about two years, it was held that the city would be considered as having adopted the street as a public street, and that it was liable for a change of grade thereafter. It was stated that it is not necessary that the city should have first, by ordinance, established a grade line and afterwards changed it to constitute liability, but that the use of the street as above stated was tantamount to an adoption of the grade thereof.

The court in Cincinnati v. Williams, 8 Ohio Dec. Reprint, 118, 9 Ohio L. J. 243, after stating that there can be no recovery by an abutting owner except for a change from a former grade, holds that where a turnpike company had established a public road, and afterwards such road was included within the limits of a municipality, abutting owners who had improved their property with reference to the established grade were entitled to damages against the municipality for a change.

In Youngstown v. Moore, 30 Ohio St. 133, the rule of municipal liability is stated as follows: "Where the corporation fails or neglects to fix any grade, and none is established for a street save that of a county road, and the lot owner improves his lot with reference to the then state of the road and street as used and kept in repair by the village or city in front of his lots, and is guilty of no negligence, but uses ordinary discretion, care, and judgment in making his improvements, having reference to the probable future improvements and street grades of the village or city, and with reference also to the right of the municipal authorities to make reasonable and proper grade for the street, and he is afterwards injured by a grade caused to be made by the village or city authorities, he will be entitled to receive a just compensation for the injury so sustained even though the grade that causes the injury is a reasonable and proper one. The converse of this principle is true. If, when he made his improvements, he was careless, and for want of proper care, discretion, and a judicious exercise of judgment in placing his improvements, he is injured by a grade made in the proper exercise of corporate power, he cannot recover for such injury."

A borough was held liable in Norristown's Appeal, 3 Walk. (Pa.) 146, for changing the grade of an old township road which had been used for many years by the son, 111 Ky. 491, 63 S. W. 964; Owensboro v. Singleton, 33 Ky. L. Rep. 775, 111 S. W. 234; Philpot v. Tompkinsville, 148 Ky. 511, 146 S. W. 1093; Hosmer v. Gloversville, 27 Misc. 669, 59 N. Y. Supp. 559.

The actual making of a road by the county or by private individuals does not constitute original construction so as to save the property owners from assessment when the street is made subsequently under the orders of the municipality.

Beeler, 113 Ky. 221, 67 S. W. 995.

Hobson, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Louise Gernert has owned since March, 1899, a contract of land on the Bardstown road; prior to June, 1908, the property was located outside of the corporate limits of the city of Louisville, but the city boundary has been extended, and the property has since then been in the city limits. More than twenty years before that time, the Bardstown road was a public highway of Jefferson county and under the supervision and control of the fiscal court, and had been graded and macadamized as a county highway by the agents of the fiscal court; the road having been constructed according to the grade fixed by the fiscal court. After the city limits were extended so as to include the property, the city of Louisville converted the Bardstown road at that point from a macadamized highway into an asphalt street, and in the construction of the street raised the grade of the road in front of her property from 3 to 6 feet. She brought this suit against the city, alleging the above facts, and also alleging that by reason of the change of the grade of the street her property had been greatly damaged in that the salable value of the property has thereby been decreased. The city demurred to the petition; the circuit court sustained the demurrer, and, she declining to plead further, dismissed the action. She appeals.

The ground on which the circuit court sustained the demurrer to the petition was that, when the city established for the first time the grade of the street, it was not liable for damages done the property by rea-public at a grade which was adapted to all purposes for an ordinary highway, the court stating that this was a change of grade for which the borough was answerable in damages. It is not clear, however, that any claim was made that this was an initial change of grade which would not render the borough liable.

In Hutchinson v. Parkersburg, 25 W. Va. 226, a municipality was held liable for a change of grade in a turnpike, which had been included within the limits of a municipality, to an owner who had improved his property abutting upon the turnpike before it was included within the municipality. The decision here, however, does not rest upon the fact that the road was an established turnpike, but upon the fact that the plaintiff had improved his premises; and it is stated that the liability of the municipality would have been the same if the improvements had been made on no public road. The court, after referring to the case of Johnson v. Parkersburg, 16 W. Va. 426, 37 Am. Rep. 779, in which it was stated that if the improvement of the plaintiff had been made before the street was made or the grade fixed at all, what his right would be in that case was not decided, as the question did not arise in that case, continues: "And we deem it improper in this case to decide what the plaintiff's rights would be if his improvements had been made after the street was made, but before the grade of it was fixed at all; for such question does not arise in this case, 51 L.R.A.(N.S.) either as alleged in the amended declaration or as proven."

In Hosmer v. Gloversville, 27 Misc. 669, 59 N. Y. Supp. 559, a town road on which the plaintiff's premises abutted was included in a municipal corporation. Under the law of this state, the owner of premises abutting upon a town highway was entitled to no compensation for a change of grade. A provision in the municipal charter was to the effect that when the grade of any street had been established and a record made thereof, and such street or part thereof graded accordingly, such grade should not be changed except upon certain conditions unless compensation be made to the owners of the property injured by the regrading. The new grade was established by the municipality as soon after its inclusion in the corporation as the needs of the locality demanded, and it was held that under the charter provision above mentioned there was no liability for such change.

The rule announced in GERNERT v. LOUISVILLE is approved in Erlanger v. Cody, — Ky. —, 166 S. W. 202, where a macadamized public highway of many years' existence was included within the limits of a town upon its incorporation. In this case, however, the municipality had established the grade for making sidewalks, and the establishment of this grade was held to be such an establishment of the grade of the highway as to render the municipality liable for a subsequent change therefrom.

W. A. E.

son of the establishment of the grade of the street. In Owensboro v. Hope, 128 Ky. 524, 15 L.R.A.(N.S.) 996, 108 S. W. 873, it was held that a lot owner is not entitled to recover from a city for consequential damages to a lot adjacent to a street because of the establishment of the original grade of the street, when not done negligently. That case was followed in Owensboro v. Singleton, 33 Ky. L. Rep. 775, 111 S. W. 284, and Philpot v. Tompkinsville, 148 Ky. 511, 146 S. W. 1093. But it is insisted that these cases do not control here, because they rest upon the ground that, where a street is dedicated or acquired by condemnation, it is implied that it may be graded so far as necessary to fit it for the intended purposes, and that it must be presumed that the injury to the property from the grading was considered at the time the right of way was acquired either by the dedicator or by the injury in fixing the damages. It is insisted that, the grade of the highway having been fixed once by the fiscal court, it could not thereafter be changed by the county authorities without compensating the owner for such incidental damages as she sustained (Layman v. Beeler, 113 Ky. 221, 67 S. W. 995; Moore v. Lawrence County, 143 Ky. 450, 136 S. W. 1031), and that the city, having succeeded to the rights of the county, is equally without power to change the grade of the street without compensating the owner for the damages sustained. But the mistake in this argument is in assuming that the city simply succeeds to the rights of the county. The city derives its power from the commonwealth, and it is not limited to the rights possessed by the county. While it is true that the precise reason assigned for the decision in Owensboro v. Hope, does not apply here, similar principles do apply.

The legislature of the state has power to define what shall be urban property and what shall be county property. It has the power to define the limits of the cities and towns of the commonwealth. All persons hold their property subject to this power of the legislature to include it within the boundary of a city when the public necessity so requires. City property is subject to burdens and enjoys benefits not possessed by country property. The including in a city of property which has theretofore been without the city is the act of the state.

When property is thus included in a city, it stands just as any other property within the city. The public highway becomes ipso facto a street of the city. Louisville v. Hall, 28 Ky. L. Rep. 1064, 91 S. W. 1133. The construction of a street upon such a highway is not a reconstruction of it, but an original construction, and the property owner is liable for the cost. McHenry v. Selvage, 99 Ky. 232, 35 S. W. 645; Sparks v. Barber Asphalt Pav. Co. 129 Ky. 769, 22 L.R.A.(N.S.) 877, 130 Am. St. Rep. 492, 112 S. W. 830. The construction of the street is one of the incidents to the including of the property within the city limits, and is one of the burdens which the state places upon the city in establishing its boundaries so as to include the property. The city does not succeed merely to the rights of the county in the highway, but it holds the highway under the authority of the state just as it holds any other street, and with all the powers over it and rights in it which it may exercise as to its other streets. Danville v. Fiscal Ct. 106 Ky. 608, 51 S. W. 157.

All purchasers of suburban property in the vicinity of a growing city purchase with the knowledge that, as the city grows, the property may be taken into the city. The increased price which the property will then bring is often the inducement for the purchase. Country property is sold by the acre, city property by the front foot. They also know there are burdens which city property must bear, but which are not borne by country property. One of these burdens is the cost of converting the country highway into a city street. They cannot complain that this cost is assessed against their property, although it would have been exempt from such a charge had it not been taken into the city. The fixing of the grade is a necessary incident to the proper construction of the street, and they can no more complain of the grade being fixed than of the street being constructed. Both are necessarily incidental to the conversion of the property from country property into city property. As all property is held subject to the police powers of the state to include it in a city when the public good so requires, no owner has ground of complaint that his property is properly taken into the city, and he must take the benefits with the burdens. The burden of the grading of the street rests on the same ground as the burden of constructing the street, and he can no more recover damages of the city for one than the other.

One who buys property in the vicinity of a city, adjacent to a highway, must know that if the land is taken in the city the highway will become ipso facto a city street; and he must know that when it becomes a part of the street system of the city it must be given a grade to conform with the other streets and the necessities of city travel. He buys his property with notice that these things may be done. When the land covered by the highway was dedicated as a county highway, it was so dedicated with the knowledge that, if the highway was taken into the city, it would become a city street and be subject to all the incidents of any other street. No new servitude has therefore been imposed. All that has happened was within the reasonable contemplation of the parties when their rights were acquired. The city is therefore not liable to appellant for establishing the grade of the street. There is no charge that the work was done negligently. In Henderson v. McClain, 102 Ky. 408, 39 L.R.A. 349, 43 S. W. 700, the court expressly reserved the question whether damages could be recovered upon the original establishment of the grade of a street; that question not being presented by the record. In Louisville v. Hegan, 20 Ky. L. Rep. 1532, 49 S. W. 532, the facts were similar to Henderson v. McClain, and the ruling in that case was followed. In McHenry v. Selvage, 99 Ky. 232, 35 S. W. 645, the question was not presented by the record or before the court.

Judgment affirmed.

HATTIE N. B. DUSBIBER, Appt.,
v.
FLORENCE A. MELVILLE et al.

(— Mich. —, 146 N. W. 208.)

Will — conditional bequest — living apart from husband.

A condition in a bequest to a woman who, at the time of making the will, was living apart from her husband, that she should have the money in case she was compelled to live apart from him, and support herself, to be paid as soon as the executor shall be convinced that it is impossible for her to live with her husband, is reasonable, and not void on the ground of public policy as an inducement to destroy the marriage relation.

(March 26, 1914.)

APPEAL by complainant from a decree of the Circuit Court for Saginaw County in favor of defendants in a suit for the construction of the will of Thomas E. Briggs, Deceased. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. W. F. Denfeld, for appellant:

The paragraph of the will to be construed constitutes a condition precedent, is illegal and void, and the performance of the condition was the sole motive for testator's making the bequest, which, being illegal, entirely defeats the bequest made to her "strictly on this condition."

The condition in the will the law will always and without regard to circumstances defeat, as contrary to public policy, immoral, and therefore illegal.

The condition being immoral, against public policy, and a restraint upon marriage, and for that reason impossible of performance, the gift will fail.

Bird, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

After the death of Thomas E. Briggs, of Saginaw, his last will and testament was found to be in the following form:

"I, Thomas F. Briggs, of the city of Saginaw, Michigan, being of sound and disposing mind and memory, do make, publish, and declare this as and for my last will and testament, hereby revoking all former wills by me at any time heretofore made.

"My will is that all my just debts and funeral expenses shall be paid out of my estate as soon after my decease as shall by my executor hereinafter named be found convenient.

"I understand that Florence A. Melville, of Saginaw, Michigan, has been compelled by the extreme cruelty of her husband, to leave her home and that she cannot live with him because of his cruelty toward her. Now, my will is, that in case she shall be compelled to live apart from her said husband, Frederick Melville, and shall have to support herself, that I give, devise, and bequeath to her, the said Florence A. Melville, the sum of $2,000, to be paid to her by my executor, out of my estate, as soon as executor shall be convinced that it is impossible for the said Florence A. Melville to live with her husband, Frederick Melville; said payment of said $2,000 shall be in lawful money of the United States of America.

"I give, devise, and bequeath to my sister Hattie Nora Bell Duabiber, of Hamilton, Ohio, all of the rest and residue of my estate, real, personal, and mixed, of which I shall die seised and possessed, or to which I shall be entitled at my decease, to have and to hold the same forever.

"And lastly, I do nominate and appoint Lincoln E. Bradt to be the executor of this, my last will and testament."

The parties in interest cannot agree as to the construction which should be given to the clause in the will defining the conditional legacy to Florence A. Melville. To secure a judicial construction of that clause, this bill was filed. The testator was a bachelor, and he left an estate of the value of $6,000. It appears that he and Mrs. Melville were very friendly, and were in each other's company a great deal during the last two or three years of his life. The interest which they manifested in each other, without doubt, led to the trouble between Mrs. Melville and her husband, and later to divorce proceedings, which were pending at the time of testator's death. The will was executed only a few days prior to his death.

It is contended by complainant, the sister of testator, that the condition annexed to 51 L.R.A. (N.S.)

the gift is void on the ground of public policy, because it offers an inducement to Mrs. Melville to live separate and apart from her husband. The position of the defendant is that the condition is a reasonable one, and therefore valid, but that, in the event the condition is found to be void, Mrs. Melville would then take the legacy free and clear of the condition. The chancellor who heard the case came to the conclusion that the condition was a reasonable one, and upheld the validity of the provision.

The legacy with which we have to deal does not vest under the terms of the will until the executor determines that the legatee cannot live with her husband; it is therefore a condition precedent. It appears to be pretty well settled by the authorities that, where a condition precedent is annexed to a gift of personal property which prohibits marriage absolutely or unreasonably, the condition is void, and the legacy becomes absolute in like manner as if no condition were attached. 1 Story, Eq. Jur. § 280; 2 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 933.

It will be noted that this rule is unlike the one which applies to devises of real estate which impose conditions precedent. Conant v. Stone, 176 Mich. 654, 143 N. W. 39.

It also appears to be settled by the more recent authorities that, where a condition precedent is annexed to a bequest of personal property, and imposes only a partial and reasonable restraint upon the marriage of the legatee, and there is a bequest over, the condition is valid. 2 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 933; 1 Story Eq. Jur. § 280; Phillips v. Ferguson, 85 Va. 509, 1 L.R.A. 837, 17 Am. St. Rep. 78, 8 S. E. 241; Ransdell v. Boston, 172 Ill. 439, 43 L.R.A. 526, 50 N. E. 111; Born v. Horstmann, 80 Cal. 452, 5 L.R.A. 577, 22 Pac. 169, 338.

The question is therefore presented as to whether the condition imposed on the legacy to Mrs. Melville is a reasonable one. The testator, knowing that the inevitable was near, made this provision for Mrs. Melville only eight days before he passed away. At the time he made the will he was cognizant of the fact she was living separate from her husband, and that she had begun divorce proceedings against him. It is not unreasonable to suppose that he felt that he owed her some duty to provide for her if she could not live with her husband after he was gone. If she could and did live with him again, she would be provided for, and would be in no need of his bounty. If she could not, she would then need the legacy which he gave to her. Considered from this viewpoint, I am impressed that the condition is not an unreasonable one, especially in view of fact that she is not to be the judge as to whether she can live with her husband, but that determination lies with the executor. She might decide that she could not; but that would not entitle her to the legacy. The executor might conclude otherwise, and, if he did, she could not get it, even though she actually lived away from her husband. Had she been made the judge instead of the executor, it would present a somewhat different case. This view of the condition is supported by the cases of Ransdell v. Boston, and Born v. Horsmann, supra.

I am of the opinion that the chancellor reached the right conclusion, and the decree will be affirmed. Defendants will receive their costs in this court.

1. The granting of a motion for new trial will not be upheld upon a ground other than that specified by the court, if counsel points out no other prejudicial error in the Note. — Effect of provision that jury shall determine the law and the facts in libel cases.

This note supplements the one appended to Oakes v. State, 33 L.R.A.(N.S.) 207, where the earlier cases are collected. See also Diener v. Star-Chronicle Pub. Co. 33 L.R.A.(N.S.) 216.

The constitutional provision that the jury in libel cases shall determine the law and the facts does not eliminate the requirements that the issues be made up and the same procedure followed as in the other cases, and that the rules of evidence be likewise followed. Meeker v. Post Printing & Pub. Co. — Colo. —, 135 Pac. 457.

The constitutional provision of Missouri is that the jury are to determine the law of libel "under the directions of the court," and in Patterson v. Evans, — Mo. —, 162 S. W. 179, it was held that the provision does not preclude the court from advising the jury as to what, under the law, is libelous, but it is better to include in an instruction of this kind the qualification as to the jury's right to determine for themselves the law, though it does not follow that such qualification must in all cases appear in each instruction in which the court tells record but leaves the court to find one if it exists.

Libel — duty of jury to follow instructions.

2. Where, under the Constitution, the jury, under the direction of the court, are to determine the law and the facts in actions for libel, a new trial cannot be granted because of the refusal of the jury to follow an instruction that the matter complained of is libelous per se.

APPEAL by defendants Butte Miner Company et al. from an order of the District Court for Silver Bow County granting a new trial in an action brought to recover damages for an alleged libel. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. George F. Shelton, Fred J. Furman, A. J. Verheyen, and M. P. Gilchrist, for appellants:

The death of Mr. Kelly, before judgment in his favor, abates the action unless saved by statutory provision.

the jury what the general law of libel is, and what their duty is under it. Where the instructions taken as a whole could not have mislead the jury as to their power, they are sufficient in that respect.

Under this constitutional provision it is the province of jury, under the instructions of the court, to construe the publication charged to be libelous. Cook v. Globe Printing Co. 227 Mo. 471, 127 S. W. 332.

The court can direct a nonsuit but cannot force a verdict for plaintiff. Kerone v. Block, 144 Mo. App. 575, 129 S. W. 43; Patterson v. Evans, supra.

In State v. Tolley, 23 N. D. 284, 136 N. W. 784, it was held that a constitutional provision that in all civil and criminal libel trials "the jury shall have the same power of giving a general verdict as in other cases; and in all indictments or informations for libels the jury shall have the right to determine the law and the facts under the direction of the court as in other cases," does not make the jurors the judges of the law, but merely gives them the right to render a general verdict upon the whole case, and prevents the court from requiring them to return a special verdict upon the facts.

Messrs. D. M. Kelly and Canning & Geagan for respondent.

Holloway, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Action for damages for libel. Upon the trial of this cause, at the instance of the plaintiff, the court gave instruction No. 2, as follows: "You are instructed that the article complained of in this action is libelous in itself, and, under the law and the evidence, you should find for the plaintiff and against the defendants, Butte Miner Company and J. Lawrence Dobell, and award him such damages as, in your judgment, are just and fair under the circumstances." Notwithstanding this direction, the jury returned a general verdict in favor of the company and Mr. Dobell. Plaintiff moved for a new trial upon three grounds: Insufficiency of the evidence, that the verdict is against law, and error in law occurring at the trial. The motion was sustained, and a new trial granted in an order as follows: "This day the motion of the plaintiff for a new trial herein is by the court granted, solely and entirely upon the single ground presented to this court that the jury disregarded and refused to obey the instruction of the court to find a verdict for the plaintiff." The appeal is from that order.

Counsel for respondent in their brief suggest that the order should be upheld, if it can be done upon any ground of the motion. That rule, however, applies only to a case where the order is a general one, not disclosing the particular ground upon which the court acted, or to a case where counsel have invoked the provisions of the act for the compensation of errors (§ 7118, Rev. Codes). In this instance counsel did not except to the order of the trial court, 51 L.R.A. (N.S.) which, in effect, overruled their motion upon every other ground save the one designated in the order. But, assuming counsel's position to be correct, they do not indicate to us any error in the record claimed by them to be prejudicial to the plaintiff, other than the one upon which the trial court acted, and they cannot expect the members of this court to go through a record of more than 500 pages in a microscopic search for some error which they do not suggest exists there.

The one question before us is: Were the jurors bound by the trial court's instruction No. 2? In Murray v. Heinze, 17 Mont. 353, 42 Pac. 1057, 43 Pac. 714, this court held that in all cases, except libel, the jury are bound by the instructions of the court, and a verdict in disregard of them will be set aside as against law. That decision has been affirmed, repeatedly, and if in any given instance the exception noted above has been omitted in the statement of the rule, it was mere oversight. There has never been any intention on the part of the court to modify the rule as there expressed; so that, in the investigation of the question before us, we are not embarrassed by any conflicting statements heretofore made by this court; indeed, the question has never been presented directly before this. In Paxton v. Woodward, 31 Mont. 195, 107 Am. St. Rep. 416, 78 Pac. 215, 3 Ann. Cas. 546, it was suggested, but decision was reserved, as the question was not so directly involved that its determination was necessary to the proper disposition of the appeals in that case.

Section 10 of article 3 of the Constitution of Montana contains this provision: In all suits and prosecutions for libel, the truth thereof may be given in evidence; and the jury, under the direction of the court, shall determine the law and the facts." In its general scope, it is not new to the law. Prior to 1792, the law of libel in England was in an unsatisfactory, if not uncertain, state, and, for the purpose of setting at rest all questions as to the province of the jury in the trial of a libel case, the Parliament passed what is known as the Fox libel act, entitled "An act to remove doubts respecting the functions of juries in cases of libel" (32 Geo. III. chap. 60). The act was by its terms made applicable only to criminal libels. It provides that the trial court shall give the jury instructions as in other criminal cases, but that the jurors may determine for themselves the question of libel or no libel. The act will be found in its entirety in Odgers on Libel & Slander, 2d ed. p. 710.

In Capital & C. Ban: v. Henty, L. R. 7 App. Cas. 741, the judicial committee of the privy council, considering the effect of the Fox act upon the practice in England, said: "Since Fox's act at least, however the law may have been before, the prosecutor or plaintiff must also satisfy a jury that the words are such, and so published, as to convey the libelous imputation. If the defendant can get either the court or the jury to be in his favor, he succeeds. The prosecutor, or plaintiff, cannot succeed unless he gets both the court and the jury to decide for him."

In Ogders on Libel & Slander, 2d ed. p. 604, the proceeding in the trial of a criminal libel after the enactment of the Fox act is tersely stated as follows: "The judge, of course, may still direct the jury on any point of law, stating his own opinion thereon, if he thinks fit; but the question of libel or no libel must ultimately be decided by the jury."

Commenting upon the practice in England before the passage of the Fox act, under which the courts reserved to themselves the right to determine the question of libel or no libel, Judge Cooley in his Principles of Constitutional Law, 292, says: "This doctrine was overruled by statute in England, and the jury are now permitted to judge of the whole case, and to decide, not merely upon the responsibility of the publication, but upon the animus with which it was made, and whether within the rules of law the publication is libelous. The instructions of the judge upon the law become under this rule advisory merely, and the jury may disregard them if their judgment is not convinced."

That these authorities correctly interpret the statutory law of libel in England would seem to be beyond controversy.

Early in the history of this country, like provisions, applicable only to criminal prosecutions for libel, were enacted. Most of them have found expression in state Constitutions. For instance, in Alabama the Constitution (art. 1, § 13) provides "that in all indictments for libel, the jury shall have the right to determine the law and the facts, under the direction of the court," and a like provision is found in Arkansas, California, Connecticut, Delaware, Kentucky, Maine, Michigan, Mississippi, New Jersey, New York, North Dakota, Pennsylvania, South Carolina, Tennessee, Texas, and Wisconsin, and in the statute law of Iowa and Kansas. In every instance, however, it is limited to criminal libels.

Upon the question before us, it is idle to cite cases from states which have no provision of Constitution or law respecting the functions of a jury in the trial of a libel case. In the absence of any such provision, the general rule that the court's instructions are binding upon the jury would prevail (Gregory v. Atkins, 42 Vt. 237); and this would be the rule also in the trial of civil cases for libel in the states enumerated above, where the provision is limited to criminal libels. But a decision from any one of those states in a criminal prosecution is a precedent and valuable, to the extent that the reasoning of the court appeals to us, and indicates the general view as to the purpose of a provision of this character.

The Constitution of California provides: "In all criminal prosecutions for libels, . . . the jury shall have the right to determine the law and the fact." In People v. Seeley, 139 Cal. 118, 72 Pac. 834, the court said: "This provision in the Constitution is contained in nearly all the state Constitutions. The occasion for such provision was that in the early rulings of the courts the jury were required to confine their attention to the facts, and the court determined conclusively the libelous or innocent character of the publication. This doctrine was long ago overruled in England, and the jury are now permitted to judge of the whole case, and to decide not only as to the fact or publication, but upon the animus with which it was made, and whether, within the rules of law, the publication is libelous. The judge has the right to instruct the jury, but his instructions are advisory only. The jury could disregard the instructions and bring in a verdict even contrary to the evidence. They are the sole judges of the law as well as of the fact."

In State v. Heacock, 106 Iowa, 191, 76 N. W. 654, after referring to the section of the Iowa Code conferring upon juries in criminal libel cases the power to determine the law as well as the facts, it is said: "But the legal right of a jury, in a criminal prosecution under the sections quoted, to determine the law which should govern the verdict, even though a decision in conflict with the charge of the court be reached, cannot be doubted. The sections gave to the jury in such cases not merely the power, but the right, to make such a decision; and the jury was not required to follow the charge of the court, which must be regarded as advisory, and not conclusive as to the duty of the jury."

In Pennsylvania the constitutional provision applicable to criminal libels reads: "In all indictments for libels the jury shall have the right to determine the law and the facts, under the direction of the court, as in other cases." In Pittcock v. O'Niell, 63 Pa. 253, 3 Am. Rep. 544, the court, after quoting the provision above, said: "There can be no doubt that both in criminal and civil cases the court may express to the jury their opinion as to whether the publication is libelous. The difference is that in criminal cases they are not bound to do so, and, if they do, their opinion is not binding on the jury, who may give a general verdict in opposition to it, and, if that verdict is for the defendant, a new trial cannot be granted against his consent. As our declaration of rights succinctly expresses it, the jury have the right to determine the law and the facts in indictments for libel as in other cases."

In Kansas it is provided by statute that, in all indictments or prosecutions for libel, the jury shall have the right to determine the law and the facts; and in State v. Verry, 36 Kan. 416, 13 Pac. 338, it is said: "Of course the court is not to abdicate its power and duty of instructing the jury upon the law of the case. The charge should be as full and complete as in cases where the jury are to implicitly take and follow the law laid down by the court. By reason of the learning and experience of the judge who presides, as well as the authority with which he is invested, the jury will doubtless heed and highly regard his opinion, as they should do, and will incline to adopt it rather than a contrary view presented by counsel; but the instructions which he gives are only advisory, and the jury are not in duty bound to accept and follow his views."

The foregoing are in harmony with the English cases, and indicate very clearly the purpose of the rule and the power intended to be conferred by it upon juries in criminal prosecutions for libel. In the Constitution of each of the following states, Colorado, Missouri, South Dakota, and Wyoming, is a provision similar to that quoted above from our own Constitution, which applies to all libel cases, civil as well as criminal. In Ross v. Ward, 14 S. D. 240, 86 Am. St. Rep. 746, 85 N. W. 182, the trial court had directed a verdict for plaintiff, leaving to the jury only the question of the amount of damages. After referring to the authority conferred upon the jury in the trial of a libel case, either civil or criminal, the court said: "The fact that the jury shall have the right to determine the fact and the law under the direction of the court seems to have been overlooked by the learned circuit court. The court, it is true, may direct the jury by stating to them what constitutes a privileged communication as laid down in the law, but whether or not the communication is privileged is a matter to be determined by the jury. This provision of the South Dakota Constitution is self-executing. To the lawyer familiar with the early decisions of 51 L.R.A. (N.S.)

the English courts upon the subject of libel and slander, the importance of this provision will be apparent. In our view of the case, therefore, the court had no right to take from the jury the question of whether or not the communication in this case was privileged."

Under a constitutional provision identical with our own, the Missouri courts have held consistently that the question of libel or no libel is for the jury; that it is the province of the trial court to advise the jury; but that the jury are not bound by the instructions, so far as the question of libel or no libel is concerned; and that a general verdict for a defendant concludes the case. Duncan v. Williams, 107 Mo. App. 539, 81 S. W. 1175; Sands v. G. W. Marquardt & Sons, 113 Mo. App. 490, 87 S. W. 1011; Arnold v. Jewett, 125 Mo. 241, 28 S. W. 614; Heller v. Pulitzer Pub. Co. 153 Mo. 205, 54 S. W. 457; Ukman v. Daily Record Co. 189 Mo. 378, 88 S. W. 60.

The question has not been before the Supreme court of Colorado directly, so far as our investigation discloses. In Hazy v. Wotke, 23 Colo. 556, 48 Pac. 1048, an order of the trial court granting a nonsuit was reversed, and some observations, by way of dictum, upon the power of the court in libel cases are made, but nothing is said which is out of harmony with the declarations of any of the courts referred to above.

The question does not appear to have been considered by the Wyoming court; and we have not found any authority contrary to the views expressed above from any state having a constitutional or statutory provision conferring upon juries in libel cases the power to determine the law as well as the facts. The authorities cited are entitled to respectful consideration from us. But, even if there were not any authorities upon the subject, we would be compelled to the same conclusion as they express; for any other decision of the question would render the language of our Constitution meaningless. It was unnecessary for the framers of our Constitution to make any declaration upon the subject at all, if it was intended that the court's instructions as to the libelous character of a publication should be binding upon the jury; for that would be the rule in the absence of any declaration. The history of these peculiar provisions, which make the trial of a libel case sui generis, discloses beyond all controversy that the purpose of their enactment has always been to confer upon juries a power not otherwise available to them, and that, to the extent of determining whether a particular publication is or is not libelous, the court's instructions shall be advisory only and may be disregarded by the jury. Except as to the question of libel or no libel, the authority of the trial court has not been curtailed, and in every other respect the trial of a libel case proceeds as any other.

It follows that the jury in this instance were not bound by instruction No. 2; that a decision contrary to that instruction is not a decision contrary to law, but, under the Constitution, is very clearly a verdict according to law as determined by the jury. The refusal of the jury to follow the advice of the court in this instance was not a ground for granting a new trial. In the absence of any prejudicial errors occurring at the trial, the general verdict in favor of defendants should have concluded this case.

The order granting a new trial is reversed.

I. Introduction.

This note is supplemental to a note on the same question to Re Taylor, 45 L.R.A. 136. It excludes the question whether a sentence is excessive, and is concerned only with the question of the effect of such a sentence. The question of practice in such cases is governed largely by statute, but the cases as reported frequently omit reference to the particular statutes, partly due, no doubt, to earlier decisions which have determined the matter, and which are collected in the earlier note. This note is, in general, confined to cases in which the effect of an excessive sentence has arisen as a point for consideration, and does not attempt to include all cases in which sentences have been adjudged excessive, and, without special consideration of the matter of procedure, some remedy has been applied.

II. General rule.

Supplementing 45 L.R.A. 137.

As will appear by reference to the earlier note, the weight of authority is in accord with RE CICA, to the effect that the fact that a sentence imposed by a court of competent jurisdiction is excessive, assuming that the punishment is of the kind appropriate to the offense, does not render the been committed for violation of municipal ordinance. Denied.

Statement by Hanna, J.:

This was a petition for a writ of habeas corpus. The petitioners allege that, on the 18th day of November, 1913, a complaint was filed before J. M. Gauna, a justice of the peace in precinct No. 20 of Colfax county, attempting to charge an offense against the petitioners under a city ordinance of the city of Raton; said ordinance being designated as ordinance No. 133 in said complaint, but charged to have been ordinance No. 135 in the return and answer of the sheriff to the writ of habeas corpus. On the day the complaint was filed, the petitioners were sentenced to sixty days in the common jail of Colfax county, and to pay a fine of $25, and to pay costs amounting to $7.50 each, and a commitment was issued accordingly. The petitioners were, in accordance with the mandate of the so-called commitment, taken into custody by Abe Hixenbaugh, sheriff of Colfax county, and by him imprisoned in the county jail on the 18th day of November, 1913, and there they remain.

The sheriff, by way of response to the writ, filed his return thereto. Thereupon the petitioners moved to quash the return and discharge the prisoners upon the petition and return of the officer. The return, which was designated "Return and Answer," admitted all the material allega-entire sentence void, but that it is void only as to the excess, if the valid and invalid parts are separable. entitled to a new trial because of an excessive sentence.

III. Effect of application for habeas corpus.

a. In general.

As to designation of wrong place of imprisonment as ground for discharge upon habeas corpus, see note to Re Tani, 13 L.R.A.(N.S.) 518.

As to whether habeas corpus is a proper remedy in a case of excessive sentence, the rule was laid down in Bandy v. Hehn, 10 Wyo. 167, 67 Pac. 979, 15 Am. Crim. Rep. 395, that "jurisdictional facts alone are to be considered. If the court had jurisdiction of the person and of the subject-matter, and to render the particular judgment in question, the inquiry is at an end, and, however erroneous the judgment may be, the applicant will be remanded into custody. If, upon the other hand, the court had jurisdiction of the person and of the subject-matter, but was without jurisdiction to render the particular judgment, then such judgment is void,—is, in effect, no judgment at all,—and the applicant must be discharged." It was accordingly held in this case that the prisoner would be discharged where he had pleaded guilty to petit larceny, but was erroneously sentenced to imprisonment for grand larceny.

And in Ex parte Burden, 92 Miss. 14, 131 Am. St. Rep. 511, 45 So. 1, the rule was laid down that whenever a sentence is merely excessive or erroneous or irregular, the writ of habeas corpus would not lie, but that the defendant must appeal; but that whenever the sentence for the particular offense is void for want of power to pronounce that particular sentence, the defendant may secure release by habeas corpus. In other words, the court was of the opinion that the true test as to whether habeas corpus was a proper remedy was whether the sentence imposed was of the kind or character authorized by law for the offense, in which case habeas corpus would not lie, even though the sentence tions of the petition, except the averments with respect to the ordinance upon which the prosecution was based in the justice court.

Messrs. Elmer E. Studley and A. C. Voorhees, petitioners:

Justice courts, under the laws of this state, are courts of limited jurisdiction, and their records must show affirmatively their power to act.

24 Cyc. 497; Crain v. United States, 162 U. S. 625, 40 L. ed. 1097, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 952; State v. Wood, — Mo. App. —, 71 S. W. 724; Ex parte Walton, 2 Okla. Crim. Rep. 437, 101 Pac. 1034; State v. Gray, 37 N. J. L. 368, 1 Am. Crim. Rep. 556.

This judgment would be void if rendered by a court of general jurisdiction. For stronger reason, it is void when rendered by a justice of the peace.

Unless the court rendering the judgment had jurisdiction to render the particular judgment, it is a nullity.

Black, Judgm. § 258; 21 Cyc. 296; Ex parte Gudenoge, 2 Okla. Crim. Rep. 110, 100 Pac. 39; Ex parte Webb, 24 Neb. 238, 51 Pac. 1027; Re Graham, 138 U. S. 461, 34 L. ed. 1051, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 363; Re Stewart, 16 Neb. 193, 20 N. W. 255; was excessive, whereas relief might be granted by habeas corpus if the court exceeded its jurisdiction by imposing a sentence not appropriate to the nature of the offense.

It was accordingly held in Ex parte Burden, supra, that habeas corpus was a proper remedy where, on a verdict for a misdemeanor, a sentence was pronounced as for a felony, by imprisonment in the penitentiary for a term of years. It was held, however, that the defendant was not entitled to an absolute discharge, but should be remanded to the lower court for proper sentence.

In distinguishing between a void judgment, from which a defendant would be released on habeas corpus, and a merely excessive judgment, from which he would not be released, the court in Re Fanton, 55 Neb. 703, 70 Am. St. Rep. 418, 76 N. W. 447, said: "If, upon a conviction for burglary, the court should sentence the accused to be hanged, the judgment would be void for want of jurisdiction of the court to impose a sentence of that kind in that case. But it would be otherwise if the court should adjudge an imprisonment in the penitentiary for a longer period than fixed by statute for the crime of burglary. In the latter case, the sentence would be erroneous merely, but not void. In the one case, the court had no jurisdiction to impose that particular kind of a sentence upon conviction of burglary, while in the other the statutory kind of punishment was meted out, although the time of imprisonment exceeded the statutory bounds. A sentence of a different character than that authorized by law to be imposed for the crime of which the accused has been found guilty is void, while a sentence which imposes the statutory kind of punishment is not absolutely void, although excessive. In the former case, the entire punishment is invalid, while as to the latter the excessive portion is alone erroneous, and not void in such a sense as to be available on habeas corpus, at least until after the valid portion of the judgment has been executed."

supra, that one would not be discharged on habeas corpus from a sentence of imprisonment in the penitentiary for eight years, for a crime the maximum penalty for which was confinement for seven years, at least where the maximum penalty allowed had not been served.

b. Sentence void, prisoner discharged or remanded for proper sentence.

Supplementing 45 L.R.A. 139.

Where the sentence imposed is void, because of a kind which the court was not authorized to impose, the prisoner is entitled, as indicated under III. a, supra, on application for habeas corpus, to discharge or remand for proper sentence; and the cases of Bandy v. Hehn and Ex parte Burden, under that subdivision, illustrate the rule.

Under the following circumstances, it was held that a sentence of imprisonment was void, and that the prisoner should be discharged on habeas corpus:

—where, after conviction for a misdemeanor, the defendant was sentenced to the penitentiary for fourteen years as for a felony. State v. District Ct. 35 Mont. 321, 89 Pac. 63;

—where a fine of $100 was imposed, and in default of payment the defendant was sentenced to and was confined in the penitentiary, when the violation of the ordinance in question could not be prosecuted as for a criminal offense, but by civil action only, and the court had jurisdiction only to impose a fine of $50. People ex rel. Kane v. Sloane, 98 App. Div. 450, 90 N. Y. Supp. 762;

—where, without authority, the court ordered imprisonment of the defendant until he had secured payment of the judgment. Re Comstock, 10 Okla. 299, 61 Pac. 921;

—where a sentence was imposed that the defendant be imprisoned and pay a fine of $200, and the only legal punishment was a fine of $100, the court saying, also, that so much of the sentence as imposed a fine in excess of $100 was void. Re Burns, 113 Fed. 987.

In Re Sullivan, 3 Cal. App. 193, 84 Pac. 781, a discharge on habeas corpus was granted, where an original sentence of fine, and of imprisonment in the state prison on default of payment, was valid to the extent of the fine; but the trial court, after issuance of the commitment, and after its authority was exhausted, on motion of the district attorney, vacated the judgment and imposed a sentence of imprisonment in jail on default in payment of the fine.

Where a sentence of imprisonment for contempt was unauthorized, except for the purpose of enforcing the payment of a fine, it was held in State ex rel. Holland v. Miesen, 98 Minn. 19, 106 N. W. 1134, 108 N. W. 513, that the prisoner would be discharged from imprisonment on habeas corpus, but, his conviction being valid, he would be remanded to the proper court for sentence.

And where the only punishment authorized was a fine or imprisonment, but the defendant was sentenced to work on the chain gang, it was held in Littlejohn v. Stells, 123 Ga. 427, 51 S. E. 390, that, on application for writ of habeas corpus, an absolute discharge should not be granted, but the defendant should be remanded for proper sentence.

c. Discharge refused.

1. In general.

Supplementing 45 L.R.A. 145.

For instances where an absolute discharge on habeas corpus was denied although the sentence imposed was void, but relief was granted by remanding the prisoner for proper sentence, see Ex parte Burden, under III. a; State ex rel. Holland v. Miesen and Littlejohn v. Stells, under III. b, supra.

Also, in People v. Quartararo, 76 Misc. 55, 133 N. Y. Supp. 985, where one who pleaded guilty to a crime, the maximum penalty for which was six months imprisonment, was sentenced to prison for eleven months, of which he served three, it was 51 L.R.A.(N.S.)

Mr. Orle L. Phillips, for the State:

Where one has been tried and convicted in the superior court, he will not be released by habeas corpus because he was not arraigned and did not plead in such court, since, as such errors do not go to the jurisdiction of the court, it is not subject to collateral attack.

Winslow v. Green, 155 Ind. 368, 58 N. E. 259.

The only question which is one of jurisdiction is, Did the complaint charge an offense known to the law? If so, no matter how defective, it is not ground for relief by habeas corpus.

Ex parte Williams, 121 Cal. 328, 53 Pac. 706; Re Marshall, 6 Idaho, 516, 56 Pac. 470; Ex parte Stacey, 45 Or. 85, 75 held that he would not be discharged on habeas corpus, but would be remanded to the lower court for sentence as though no judgment had been entered on his plea, the proper remedy from the judgment of the lower court being by appeal.

And in People ex rel. Schali v. Deyo, 103 App. Div. 126, 93 N. Y. Supp. 80, where a sentence was illegal in that the minimum was excessive, it was held on an appeal from an order dismissing a writ of habeas corpus, that the writ should be reinstated and the prisoner produced before the trial court for sentence. It appears in this case that the prisoner had not served the legal minimum. But on appeal, in 181 N. Y. 425, 74 N. E. 430, the minimum term imposed was held not necessarily excessive, though the court indicated that the prisoner would be entitled to discharge after service of the legal term, if by reason of the earning of commutation the minimum should prove excessive in extending beyond the maximum as reduced by commutation.

Where a justice of the peace had jurisdiction to sentence to imprisonment in the county jail, but erroneously added to such a sentence the clause "at hard labor," it was held in Re Burkell, 2 Alaska, 108, that a discharge upon habeas corpus would not be granted, as it did not appear that the sentence as to hard labor was being enforced.

In Re Vitali, 153 Mich. 514, 126 Am. St. Rep. 535, 116 N. W. 1066, it was held that one who was serving a life sentence for murder in the second degree would not be discharged on habeas corpus on the ground that the sentence was void because not complying with the indeterminate sentence law, which repealed the statute allowing a sentence for life as a punishment for murder in the second degree; since habeas corpus should not be permitted to perform the functions of a writ of error.

Under statute forbidding a court on application for habeas corpus to inquire into the legality of any judgment or process whereby the party is in custody, or to discharge him when the term of commitment has not expired upon any process issued on

Pac. 1060; Gibson v. Gilman, 71 Kan. 320, 80 Pac. 587; Re Peraltarcavis, 8 N. M. 27, 41 Pac. 538; Tanner v. Wiggins, 54 Fla. 203, 45 So. 459, 14 Ann. Cas. 718.

If a court has jurisdiction to sentence one to imprisonment or to pay a fine, and inflicts both punishments, the prisoner will nevertheless not be discharged so long as he has neither paid the fine nor served the term.

28 Cyc. 306.

But even where the sentence is not severable, the sentence is not void absolutely, so the prisoner will be entitled to discharge upon habeas corpus, but valid so far as it is in keeping with the statute, and void only as to the excess.

DeBara v. United States, 40 C. C. A.

a final judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction, it was held in Re McNaught, 1 Okla. Crim. Rep. 528, 99 Pac. 241, that one serving a life sentence for manslaughter would not be discharged on habeas corpus on the ground that the sentence was excessive, such penalty being permissible under the law. The court indicated that where, as in this instance, the penalty imposed was not of an entirely different character from that authorized, the remedy for an alleged excessive sentence was by an appeal, and not by habeas corpus proceedings.

Where one sentence to pay a fine and costs was denied the right to secure payment thereof and ordered committed until the same was paid, it was said in Ex parte Stanfeal, 29 Ohio C. C. 604, affirmed in 78 Ohio St. 24, 84 N. E. 419, 14 Ann. Cas. 138, that although the penalty was thus made more oppressive than was warranted by statute, yet it was only an irregularity, which might be corrected by proceedings in error, and not by habeas corpus. To the same effect is Re McAdams, 21 Ohio C. C. 450, 11 Ohio C. D. 780.

In People ex rel. Price v. Hayes, 151 App. Div. 561, 136 N. Y. Supp. 854, where it was contended that the sentence exceeded the maximum penalty allowed by law, the court, although upholding the validity of the sentence, said that even if it had been erroneous or the court had not the power to pronounce it, the prisoner would not be entitled to relief by habeas corpus.

That the original sentence, before modification on motion of the government counsel, exceeded the authority of the court in requiring service at hard labor, is not ground for release on habeas corpus. Harlan v. McGourin, 218 U. S. 442, 54 L. ed. 1101, 31 Sup. Ct. Rep. 44, 21 Ann. Cas. 849, affirming 180 Fed. 119.

The fact that the minimum term was excessive was held in Ex parte Melosevich, — Nev. —, 133 Pac. 57, not to be sufficient ground for discharge on habeas corpus. In this instance a sentence of from two or three years was imposed, instead of the legal term of from one to fourteen years, 51 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Hanna, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The petitioners contend that the judgment rendered by the justice of the peace, upon which the commitment is based, was void for the following reasons: First, because there was no arraignment of the defendants; second, because the judgment sentencing each of the defendants to sixty days in the county jail and to pay a fine and the decision on the habeas corpus application was rendered nearly ten months after sentence. A statute provided that the board of pardons might at any time after expiration of the minimum term release the prisoner on parol. But in this instance the court was of the opinion apparently that the provisions of the statute in regard to the indeterminate sentence should be read into the judgment, giving the prisoner the right, at the expiration of the minimum fixed by statute, to apply for parol; and also that his rights were sufficiently protected, because, independent of statute, he could apply for and obtain relief from the board of pardons.

Under statutes providing that upon the hearing of a writ of habeas corpus, the court must remand the prisoner if it appears that he is in custody by virtue of the final judgment of a competent tribunal, and prohibiting inquiry into the legality of a judgment, but authorizing the appellate court to correct a judgment on appeal, it was held in People ex rel. Bretton v. Schleth, 68 Misc. 307, 123 N. Y. Supp. 686, that a prisoner whose term of sentence was excessive would not be released on habeas corpus, but that the proper remedy was by appeal. Whether the prisoner had served the legal term at the time of his application for release does not appear.

2. Until legal sentence is served.

Supplementing 45 L.R.A. 148.

The general rule is well settled in accord with RE CICA, that a prisoner is not entitled to discharge on habeas corpus because of an excessive sentence, where he has not suffered that part of the penalty which the court could legally impose, and the valid and invalid parts are separable. That case, it should be observed, dealt only with such a separable sentence as imposed both fine and imprisonment, neither of which the applicant for writ of habeas corpus had satisfied, and only one of which was authorized as a penalty. But the recent cases general-of $25 and costs was excessive, and beyond the power of the court to impose.

In considering the first ground of objection to the judgment, it is necessary to admit the well-settled principle that the writ of habeas corpus is not a writ of error, nor does it, except when perverted, discharge the functions of a writ of error. 2 Freeman, Judgm. § 620; Hurd, Habeas Corpus, 2d ed. 328.

Pursuant to this principle it has been quite universally held that errors or irregularities in the course of the proceedings at or anterior to the trial, which, if presented to an appellate court by way of appeal or writ of error, must necessarily result in the reversal of the judgment, are not sufficient, for that reason, as grounds ly appear to hold that a sentence which imposes a longer term of imprisonment than that authorized is separable in the sense that before the prisoner has served such term as the court was authorized to impose, he will not be released on habeas corpus. Re Chase, 18 Idaho, 561, 110 Pac. 1036; Martin v. District Ct. 37 Colo. 110, 119 Am. St. Rep. 262, 86 Pac. 82; Martin v. District Ct. 37 Colo. 119, 86 Pac. 85; Re Richards, 150 Mich. 421, 114 N. W. 348; Ex parte Foster, — Or. —, 138 Pac. 849; Re Blystone, 75 Wash. 286, 134 Pac. 827; Harris v. Lang, 27 App. D. C. 84, 7 L.R.A. (N.S.) 124, 7 Ann. Cas. 141; Connella v. Haskell, 87 C. C. A. 111, 158 Fed. 285; De Bara v. United States, 40 C. C. A. 194, 99 Fed. 942 (on subsequent application to the United States Supreme Court for writ of habeas corpus, 179 U. S. 316, 45 L. ed. 207, 21 Sup. Ct. Rep. 110, the sentence was regarded as not being excessive).

In Re Blystone, 75 Wash. 286, 134 Pac. 827, where the maximum legal penalty was twenty years imprisonment, and the minimum from six months to five years, but the court imposed a sentence of from fifteen to twenty years, it was held that at least before the expiration of the five-year term, the prisoner would not be released on habeas corpus.

And in Re Richards, 150 Mich. 421, 114 N. W. 348, where a sentence was imposed of not less than six nor more than seven years, and a statute provided that the minimum term of imprisonment should not exceed one half of the maximum, discharge on habeas corpus was refused to one who had not yet served the legal minimum, the sentence being regarded as valid at least for three and a half years minimum.
